THESE were the chief male deities which we find worshipped by the Gauls; some others they had likewise adopted, such as Mithras, from the Persians (A), Neptune, Erebus, and Orcus, supposed both to be the same with Pluto; Bacchus, and some others, whom they adopted from the Greeks and Romans, concerning which we know very little, either of their worship, or of the notion which the Gauls had of them. As to their goddesses, the chief of them were, Diana, or Luna, Juno, Minerva, Venus, Proserpine, Arduina, whom we take to be the moon, as we hinted a little higher, and Cybele, a statue of which was dug up at Paris with a head crowned with a kind of hexagonal temple, and was particularly in great veneration in the city of Autun, and whose priests were, it seems, all castrated in honour of her (B), and from thence called Galli (C). Before we close this section, it will be necessary

(Z) These last are known to have been heaps of stones, and other obstacles, of which the highways were either cleared by his command; or in honour of him, as he was thought the god that presided over them. Whenever, therefore, any traveller met with any such, he took them up, and carried them till he found one of these heaps, which were in great numbers, and flung it in among the rest; by which means they grew larger, and higher, and were called by his name (37).

The author of the vulgate version has alluded to this custom, where he makes Solomon say (38), that "He who doth honour to a foolish man, is like him "that throws a stone in one of Mercury's heaps." But the text in the original has no such allusion, but only compares the latter to one that binds a stone in a sling. These heaps were generally gathered up at some cross-ways, and places where roads divided, and where there generally stood a terminus, or figure at half body; at the foot of which they threw those stones (39).

These served, likewise, to remind people of the heavy curses which this deity was thought to inflict on those who abused travellers, or refused to put them in the right way (40). Their representing him of no sex, as he was the god of commerce and riches, was, in all likelihood, to intimate, that neither of them were confined to either sex, but that both had an equal title to his protection and blessing; and we may add, that it might be likewise done in a modest opposition to the Greeks and Romans, who represented him as ambisexual, and with a spear in one hand, and a staff in the other (41).

(A) It appears from several antient monuments and inscriptions, that Mithras, the Sun, and Mercury, were worshipped, among the Gauls, as one and the same deity; at least, Mithras being the sun, among the Persians, is often represented as conjoined with him, that is, with a sun over his head, and sometimes on his breast, and with this inscription, Mercurio soli sacrum. Hence the author of the Gaulish religion has been at the pains to collect a number of other arguments, to prove that those two deities were looked upon here as one and the same, or, at most, as associated both in their virtues, and in their worship. And might not this be on account of the great and constant nearness the two planets, which bear these names, have to each other (42)?

(B) This appears, from what we read in the acts of Syphrianus, a zealous christian since sainted, who, being brought before the governor of that city, for refusing to worship her idol, on a day in which her statue was carried about in procession, alledged, among other reasons for his refusal, that he could not acknowledge a deity, whose mysteries and worship consisted in a shameful and unnatural castration. But whether these Galli, or priests, were Gauls, or sent for from Phrygia, or elsewhere; or whether the Gauls, who appear to have had an abhorrence for all kinds of mutilations allowed of these Galli; or whether they did not rather belong only to the Romans, as some authors believe (43), we shall examine in the next note.

(C) That Cybele, or the mother of the gods, as she is called, was a deity of Syrian, and not of Gallia extract, is universally acknowledged. So that if her worship was introduced into Gaul, it was either by force, or in imitation of the Greeks and Romans. If we consider their abhorrence to all mutilations, we shall hardly think that they could willingly give into such a kind of worship as this, which required every priest, and encouraged every votary of the goddess to become an eunuch, as Heliogabalus is said to have done, in one of his mad fits (44). We are, moreover, told, that those Galli were had in such abhorrence, that no other people would converse with them; and that they were put upon the level with sorcerers, gladiators, and hangmen (45); so that they necessary to give our readers some account of the Gaulish druids, bards, &c. and of such of their doctrines and tenets as have not been yet touched upon, at least as far as we can gather them from ancient authors; for it cannot be expected, that we should know much concerning that set of men, considering that they made a mystery of their religion and philosophy, and a constant rule never to commit any thing relating to either to writing^m.

We have already observed, that the order of the druids had the sole care of all religious matters, which they so artfully and dexterously introduced into every other concern, both public and private, that nothing could be done without their approbationⁿ; and that this absolute sway of theirs lasted till at least some time after their conquest by the Romans. They were called by several names (D), besides that of druid, of which we have given the etymon in a former volume^o. Their antiquity is looked upon of the same date with the brachmans of India, magi of Persia, the Chaldees of Babylon and Assyria, and, in a word, with the oldest sects of philosophers^p. And, indeed, considering their vast distance from each other, and the conformity of their doctrine, we can suppose no other but that they all received it from the same hand, viz. from Noah and his immediate descendants, and carried it had no other way of living, but by carrying their goddesses about, and begging charity for her sake; all which was most opposite to the genius of the Gallie nation.

Accordingly, St. Jerom has a passage which plainly intimates, that the Romans forced this emaculated priesthood upon the Gauls, and called those eunuchs Galli, in order to fix a perpetual ignominy upon that nation, for having taken their metropolis, and besieged their capital (46). And we are told, by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, that no Roman took that office upon him, but that they had a Phrygian male and female to perform it. This might be true, in part; and if what is reported of Heliogabalus, who became one of them, be to be credited, it will only shew, that he minded the laws and customs of Rome no more in this case, than he did in all others (47).

However, St. Jerom seems to have been mistaken in his derivation of the word gallus and galli; which, if we may believe Pliny, and other Roman authors, were so called from a river of that name in Phrygia (48); and, in particular, Ovid, who, probably, to expose the unnatural castration of these priests, tells us, that the waters of that river had such a dangerous quality, that whosoever drank of them did run stark mad (49). But be that as it will, the contemptible name of Gallus may well enough have been given to the Gauls by way of pun upon their national one, let those priests have been called so on any other account. So that, upon the whole, if any Gauls were ever seen in that office, they must needs be supposed to have been forced into it by their imperious conquerors: but, after all, this worship of Cybele, though established in Gaul, as well as in Rome, may yet, for aught appears, have been countenanced by the latter, and disapproved by the former.

Before we close this note, it will not be amiss to mention a noble testimony which a Roman writer gives of this aversion of the Gauls to mutilation (50); where, having amply expatiated on their known valour and bravery, their contempt of difficulties and dangers, and even of death, he adds, "We never find any of them do, as some of us do in Italy, cut off their thumbs, for fear of going to the wars,

" and upon which account they call us, in derision, "Murci."

To understand the sting of this saying, it must be observed, that Murcia was reckoned, amongst the Romans, the goddess of cowards and idle fellows; whence her infamous votaries were called Murci (51). And from this shameful custom of cutting off their thumbs, to disqualify themselves for service, came the old Gallie word poltron, from pollex and tronco, which is still retained to this day, by many other nations besides the French.

(D) One of them was that of Semnothesi (52), given to them, doubtless, on account of their greater veneration for, and knowledge of, the godhead. Diodorus Siculus gives them that of Saronides, on account of their great regard to such old oaks as were decayed, and stripped of their bark; for that is the meaning of that word, according to Hesychius.

A Gaulish antiquary, not content to derive that of druid from the Celtic derw, an oak, compounds it with that and hud, enchantment; whence he inters the Greek dryades to have come (53): but though they are charged, and that perhaps justly, to have used many such practices, and in a most inhuman manner; yet it is not reasonable to think that they would add so odious a syllable to their name: neither can the Greeks or Romans be supposed to have done it, because the monosyllable, being Celtic, was unknown to them. Dryades was, therefore, no more than a Greek termination of the word druid.

The last name we shall take notice of was, that of Senani, which we hinted above was, probably, taken up by them as more pleasing to the Romans, it properly signifying a wife or venerable man; as their druidesses were called senoe, and senes (54). This was probably done in imitation of the sect of gymosophists, who agreed with them in many things, particularly, in having their societies composed of males and females, like the Gaulish druids, in studying philosophy, astrology, prying into futurity, living in celibacy, and the like (55). These were by the Greeks called Semnones; the Gauls, among whom the ma was, and is still, in many provinces, pronounced like nn, called them Semnones, and, in the Latin termination, Sennoni and Sennani.

a each to the different places of their dispersion; for they can never be imagined to have communicated it to each other, as there could be no communication or commerce between them in those early times; at least the druids of Britain, of whom we shall speak in the next chapter, and from whom the Gauls received all their religion and philosophy, cannot be supposed to have had it from any of these foreign sects, to whom they were utterly unknown. The Gauls, tenacious as they were till their conquest, of their religion, laws and customs, never belyed their origin, but owned themselves to have received all from the British druids: thither they sent their own to be instructed. Here was the grand seminary where they received their instruction, and here was the seat of the arch-druid, or head, and high-priest of their religion; to whom they appealed, as to their dernier resort, in all doubtful and controverted cases. It were, therefore, absurd to suppose, as some have done, either that these travelled into such vast remote parts to learn their doctrines from the semnes of India, or any other sects; or much less, as others too eagerly contend, that these travelled into Gaul and Britain to learn theirs from them. And it is much more reasonable to derive that great resemblance which is observed between them all, from those antient times, when they were, in some measure, but one people, or great family; and that each carried, and carefully preserved them in those parts of the world where they settled themselves (E).

AMONG other instances of the excessive power of the druidish tribe, Cæsar mentions one^a, by which we may guess at the rest, viz. that they chose the annual magistrates of every city, who had during that year the supreme authority, and sometimes the title of king. And yet these could do nothing without their approbation and advice, not so much as call a council; so that, notwithstanding their great pomp and state, says another author, they were but the creatures and slaves of the druids^b. They used the same arbitrary power in their courts of judicature, and all other cases; and were every-where esteemed as the chiefs of every Gaulish commonwealth, and had the sole management and instruction of youth in every thing but the training up in the art of war. For in this last respect the druids, and their disciples, were not only exempt from going to war unless they pleased, but from all kind of tribute likewise^c; and this did not a little increase their credit with the people, as well as the number of their disciples. For their order was not fixed to any particular families or nation of Gaul, but every man had power to stand candidate for it, and, if approved by the society, was admitted into it. As for their grand druid, he was chosen from amongst them by the plurality of votes; and, when any dispute arose, it was often terminated here, as in other cases, by the sword, as we shall have occasion to hint in the sequel. We have already observed, that they made it a part of their religion not to commit any thing to writing, but to couch all their mysteries and learning in verse; and these, it seems, were multiplied in time to such a number, that it took some of them twenty whole years to learn them all by heart. And Cæsar assigns these two reasons for this custom, viz. that their doctrines might appear more mysterious, by being unknown to all but themselves; and, secondly, that having no books to recur to, they might be the more careful to preserve them in their memory^d. And what contributed much to this last was, their living in separate societies, chiefly in woods, and observing a constant celibacy.

The three grand fundamentals of their religion consisted, 1. In their worship of the gods; 2. In abstaining from all evil; and, 3. In behaving with intrepidity upon

(E) Some antient Roman authors, such as Cæsar, Valerius Maximus, Am. Marcellinus, &c. have indeed affirmed, that the druids learned their doctrines from Pythagoras; and the same some have affirmed of Numa (56), though he was of so much older date. But we have formerly observed, that Pythagoras had made a voyage into Gaul, and had learned a great deal of his from them, as he did also from the brachmans (57). The truth is, Pythagoras was in such high esteem, that no man was hardly esteemed wise, or learned, that was not his disciple (58). And the Gaulish druids, being found to have many doctrines in common with him, were of course supposed to have received them from him. Though that of the transmigration of souls, which was likewise attributed to them, doth not appear to have been at all held by them, and it is likely that philosopher brought it from those of India.

all occasions*. In order to enforce this last, on which they valued themselves most, a they taught the immortality of the soul, and a life after this, of bliss or misery, according as they had lived. And this inspired them with incredible courage, and contempt of death, of which we shall give some pregnant instances in its due place. This notion of a future life was so firmly believed by the people, that we are told they used to bring the account-books of the deceased into his grave, or, if he was burnt, into the fire, that he might make such use of them in the next world, as would make his life more easy and comfortable there†. Several other ridiculous customs are recorded of them, with respect to this notion of a future life, which can hardly be credited, and which, for that reason, we shall just mention in the margin(F). They also pretended to great skill in some branches of geography and astronomy, b such as the knowing the bigness and form of the earth, the motions of the planets, their influence, and that of the stars; from which they assumed a knowledge of the divine will, to pry into futurity‡, and to foretel strange events. And if that passage which Diodorus Siculus has preserved to us out of Hecateus§, and which the reader may find in the margin(G), be to be depended upon, and that the druids of Brittain, for that seems to be the island meant by that author, could, as with telescopes, shew the moon nearer, and discover therein mountains, rocks, &c. it cannot but be supposed that they had made greater progress in these arts and sciences than is generally imagined. The nineteen years converse of Apollo, which is the cycle of the sun, and the notion of the moon's opacity, of its mountains, rocks, &c. argue c them to have been no bad astronomers; and if they had really any instruments to draw the moon nearer, and make such discoveries upon its surface, we may conclude them to have been pretty good artists for those early times. Pliny adds, that they studied natural philosophy, and practised physic^b. This last consisted chiefly in the knowledge and use of simples, but they soon found out a way to render it more intricate and mysterious, by intermingling astrology, and other superstitious trash, amongst it. The configuration of the planets must be consulted, the herb must be gathered with one hand, and not with the other; the hand must be covered with the opposite lappet of the man's robe; he must be dressed in white, his feet washed and unshod, and a great deal more to the same purpose; but all which rather betrays d that author's fondness of exposing the Gauls, than to inform mankind. To give one instance for all, the reader needs but hear what he says of their serpents egg, which, as it is related by him, would scarcely, upon any other account, be worth inserting in this history, but that, whilst we give him the substance of it in the margin(H), we shall endeavour to strike out a more probable and advantageous meaning

(F) They are said to have lent and borrowed money, &c. in order to repay it in the next world; to have sent letters to the deceased person, by flinging it into the fire, or into his grave (59). There have been also found in those ancient sepulchres, on Salisbury plain, spoken of before, some small plates of silver, and other metals, engraved with a kind of old writing, which are supposed to have been sent from the living to the dead by this conveyance. But these, and such-like ridiculous customs, seem rather invented by those authors in disparagement of the Gaulish nation, and are justly laughed at (60).

(G) This passage is to the following purport: That there is, according to that author, a northern island of considerable bigness, little less than Sicily, situate over-against the Celts, and inhabited by those whom the Greeks call Hyperboreans. It is fruitful, pleasant, and dedicated to Apollo; that god, for the space of nineteen years, used to come and converse with them, and, which is more remarkable, they could (as if they had the use of telescopes) shew the moon very near them, and discover therein mountains, &c. He concludes, that over their sacred grove and temple there presided a set of men called (by the then Greeks, it is supposed) Boreads, who were their priests and rulers.

From the author's description and situation of this island, every body will easily perceive that it could be no other but either Great Britain or Ireland; for the Mona, or Anglesey of Rouland (61), is vastly too small and inconsiderable to have been meant here. It is mentioned as known to the Greeks, as well it might, by means of the tin which the Phœnicians fetched from it, of which we shall speak in due time. The author adds, that one Abaris, who became afterwards a disciple of Pythagoras (62), went from hence into Greece, and contracted an intimacy with the Delians. And might he not be supposed to have followed that philosopher from Gaul thither? But we submit that to the reader.

(H) According to his fabulous account, this egg, which was unknown to the rest of the world, was formed by the scum of a vast multitude of serpents twisted and conjured up together. As soon as they began to hiss, it was raised up into the air, and must be caught before it touched the ground; and he that a ing of this pretended piece of superstition, than that author could, or was, perhaps, willing to do.

We must first take notice of an antient Gaulish monument in the great cathedral of Paris, on which this ceremony of catching the egg is represented pretty near in the same manner as Pliny has given it. Another has been found in Italy, on which are carved two serpents, the one holding the egg in its mouth, and the other shaping and polishing it with its spittle. If the reader remembers what has been said in the cosmogony of the world, at the entrance of this work ^d, of the Phœnicians and Egyptians looking upon the egg to be the principle of all things; that it was represented as coming forth out of the mouth of a serpent, the emblem of the God-head, or perhaps rather of wisdom; and if we add what Plutarch observes, that the theology of the antients did ascribe to the egg the priority of time, and the seed of all things; he will easily decypher a much sublimer meaning in the mythology of this egg, than that Roman author could, or was perhaps willing to see in it, either from those emblematic monuments, or fabulous reports, from which he took his ridiculous account. For it must be further observed, that the druids were very fond of wrapping up all their learning, and even their moral precepts, in such kinds of mysterious and enigmatic figures. However, we would not deny but after their power came to dwindle, as it began to do from the coming in of the Romans, they might slacken apace from their antient purity, and make a trade of such superstitious fooleries as they would have despised whilst in the height of their wealth and sway, when nothing could well tempt them to it. It is, doubtless, to these latter times, that we must suppose the antient comedy, called Querulus, or Aulularia, which exposes the druidish knavery with so much wit and sharpness, to have referred to; and perhaps, also, that which another author says of them^e, that in their lectures of morality they gave this for a maxim, that the fertility of their fields depended upon their riches, and the largeness of their revenues. One doctrine, he tells us, they taught, that fire and water would at length absorb all things.

BEFORE we leave this subject, we must not omit saying something of their famed druidesses, and the great esteem they were in among the Gauls, as well as among the Germans^f. We have already shewed, that antiently the Gaulish women bore a great sway in this country, of which the druids, in time, stripped them; but it is likely, that the druidesses held still great part of their own credit, especially on account of their being thought endowed with the spirit of prophecy; for we cannot find, that they were famed for any thing else, and some of them, we find, were among the lowest rank of people. Witness Dioclesian's hostess, who, when he was but a private man in the Roman army, then in Gaul, foretold him that he should become emperor after he had killed a boar, or, rather, Aper, as the issue shewed it a little time after. We have seen, likewise, in the Roman history, that their emperors were not above consulting, and being advised by them; particularly Severus and Aurelian, the latter of whom asking some of them how long the empire should last in his family, they made no difficulty to tell him boldly, that that of Claudius would one day become the most illustrious^g. We shall not take upon us to inquire how they caught it must immediately get on a fleet horse, and ride for his life, from the fury of the serpents, which pursued him till a river stopped them short. The egg was then to be flung into the water, with a golden ring, which they fastened about it, and must swim on the surface with it. Its virtues were then almost as numberless as those of Fortunatus's cap, a great many of which our author mentions, as well as its colour and shape; and concludes with telling us, that the emperor Claudius caused a Gaulish nobleman to be put to death merely for having been found with one of these eggs in his bosom, and which, it seems, he wore there with a view of gaining a law-suit in which he was engaged (63).

to confirm, in a great measure, what Pliny has related, by assuring us, that in several parts of Dauphiné, especially one place he names near the confines of Savoie, there is such a prodigious concourse of all kinds of serpents from the 5th of June to the 15th of August, that there is not one to be seen for the space of ten miles round the place. He adds, that the ground where they assemble is left covered with a kind of scum, which fills one with horror. But he says, that no care had been taken to inquire after the story of the egg, whether it was fact, or only an imposture of the druids. If any thing could persuade us that the antient Gauls could give into such ridiculous superstitions, it would be the seeing of them so easily swallowed by the modern ones.

came by this extraordinary gift, or whether it was real, or a mere cheat and pretence; only we would observe, that the latter cannot be supposed, without allowing at the same time, that the druids themselves were likewise imposed upon by them; else it is not likely they would have allowed them to reign so long, and bear such sway in all religious and civil matters, contrary to the practice of the Indian brachmans, and other sects of antient philosophers, who never admitted their women into any of their mysteries^k. There were three classes of druidesses in Gaul, the chiefest of which was of those who kept a perpetual virginity; for these were thought to have the spirit of prophecy. The next was that of those, who, though married, were yet obliged to abstain from the matrimonial intercourse, except one single time in the whole year, in which they were allowed to go and have children by them; after which, they returned to their office, which was, to assist the druids at their religious functions. The last were a kind of attendants, or servants, on the others; and this we learn rather from some antient monuments and inscriptions^l, than from antient authors, who have said little more of them than that they were prophetesses. Both druids and druidesses pretended to a great knowledge in astrology, calculated peoples nativities, erected figures, and foretold strange things, both by that, and, much more, by their inhuman auguries; of which bloody custom, we shall give a specimen in the margin (I): but those which were styled prophetesses, were thought to have a gift superior to the rest, and which was looked upon as supernatural; these were called by some superior title, such as that of dame was heretofore among us; and were in the highest request, not only among their own people, but likewise among foreign nations. As for the others, they were much less regarded, and their night-assemblies about ponds and marshes, to worship and consult the moons, and some other forceries they pretended to use, made them be looked upon as downright witches, canibals, lamia, pylboniffæ, stria, and every thing that is black and horrid, by christian authors, from the sixth century downwards^m.

their office.

The next order amongst them, in great esteem, was that of the bards. Some authors have, indeed, confounded them with the druids, and looked upon the former to be only a more modern name given to them. But there is a passage in Strabo which quite explodes that notion, where he saysⁿ, that the druids were in the highest power, and gave laws to the vates, eubages, and bards, who were every-where to give them place, when they pleased to challenge it, and were not allowed to do any thing without their consent and approbation. Besides, we are told by that, and a number of other authors, that these bards were so called from their office, which was, to sing the praises of their heroes^o, and to accompany their songs with musical instruments. And we are told, that their compositions were held in the highest esteem, as the most effectual means of eternizing the memory of those who had the merit or good fortune to be celebrated in them. One of the authors last quoted adds, that they could at any time put a stop to a whole army's engaging, by their interposition: so great a power had wisdom, and the muses, over those barbarians^p. It was their business to accompany the Gaulish armies with their songs, which were generally calculated to inspire them with valour and intrepidity, with the love of liberty, and contempt of death^q. During the onset, they used likewise to give

(I) It appears, by comparing what antiquaries have been able to collect from some antient Gaulish monuments concerning this bloody ceremony, with what Strabo says of it (65) as it was practised among the Cimbri, who were a branch of the old Celts, that there was no material difference between them in this respect. We shall, therefore, give the purport of what that antient author has left us of it, which is as follows:

The druidesses were, on these occasions, like the druids, clothed in white tunics, fastened with hooks, and girt with a brass girdle, and without shoes. As soon as the Cymbrians had taken any captives, these women flew upon them with drawn swords in their hands, and threw them down; thence they dragged them to a large capacious labrum, or cistern, by the side of which was a kind of foot-stool, on which the druidess then officiating stood, who plunged a long knife into the breast of each of these unfortunate wretches, one after another, as fast as they were brought; and from the flowing of their blood she formed her predictions. The other druidesses, who assisted, took up the breathless bodies, opened and examined their entrails, and from thence likewise foretold some new things, which were immediately communicated to the whole army or council, and as readily believed.

- a some loud shouts, sometimes as of victory, other times to intimate their danger, in case they did not fight valiantly, or were ready to give way. So that though they did not really fight themselves, they were so intermingled with the army, that they ran, in some measure, the same risque with those that did (K). By this means they were eye-witnesses of the behaviour of the combatants, and either celebrated their praises in their songs, or censured those that had not done their duty. And as these might in time degenerate, and be often bribed to extol those who had been faulty, or in praising either too much or too little, for favour or interest, it is thought they acquired the name of parasites^r. But this seems very inconsistent with what we read of the great esteem they were in, unless we allow that epithet to have antiently carried a more favourable meaning than it doth now (L). To these two orders we may add those of the vates and euvates, or eubates, which seem to have been still inferior to that of the bards; but whether they were so to each other, or the same under two names, is not easy to guess, with that little light we have from antient authors. All that can be conjectured upon the whole, is, that the druids presided over all religious matters, and bore a great sway in those of a civil nature. The bards were the recorders of all transactions, and treasured up in their poetic compositions the knowledge of things and persons, and communicated as much of it to the laity, by their songs, as the druids thought proper. The vates and euvates might be singers of these bardish compositions, and be further retained in the families of the great, to celebrate their praises and heroic acts; but as the druids were more known to strangers than the rest, their name was given to all indifferently, by antient historians.
- b Diodorus and Cicero seem to mention a fifth sort, viz. the saronides; but we have shewn, a little higher, that it was but another name for that of the druids, as the learned Bochart has fully proved^s. As for the flamens, or flamines, though they have been supposed to have belonged to the druidish order, yet bishop Stillingfleet has sufficiently disproved them to have been of Celtic or Gaulish extract. They were of the Roman kind, and of much later date than either druids or bards. We have spoken of them in a former volume, and to that, and the learned prelate above quoted, we shall refer our readers; and close this section of the Gaulish religion with observing, that, in spite of all the severe edicts of the Roman and Christian monarchs, there were still very visible traces of it, and of the very worst part of the druidish rites practised not only long after the settling of christianity in Gaul, but even to the middle of the sixth century, as appears by a notable instance of it, which we shall give in the margin (M).

(K) This may be inferred from what we read of one of them, named Pomponius, a man in great esteem, both as a bard, and a poet; who finding himself in great danger from the enemy, made a vow to Mars, their great protector, to sacrifice to him a boar, if he escaped safe (66). It was likewise, as we formerly hinted, customary among their generals, upon all such occasions, to vow to that god all the plunder, and even the prisoners of war, if they came off victorious.

(L) This epithet, though by length of time become a term of reproach, might not carry so harsh a meaning in our author; if it had, it is hardly credible those bards could have kept up their credit so long, and in so brave and warlike a nation. But, in our opinion, that name was given only to an inferior set of bards, who are judged to have been a kind of clients, or solduri, who entered themselves into the service of some noblemen or generals, and bound themselves to live and die with him, and whose business it was to sing the praises of their patrons, in poems composed by the bards, before numerous crouds of people, who never failed to surround and listen to them (67).

(M) This fact is taken from Procopius, who was himself an eye-witness of it, and is as follows: Theoderic I. having penetrated into Italy at the head of a considerable army, and taken possession of the bridge of Pavia, his men offered in sacrifice the wives and children of the Goths, whom they had surprised, and cast their bodies into the river, as the first-fruits of that war. "For, says he, the Franks, though christians, do still observe a great many of their antient superstitions. They offer up human victims, and use many execrable rites in their auguries." And another author, who lived till the latter end of the seventh century, has a long catalogue of such superstitions, against which, as he was a bishop, and since sainted for his piety, he forewarns his christian flock. The reader may see the passage at length in the authors quoted below (68).

Of the antiquity, government, laws, learning, arts, sciences, commerce, and customs, of the antient Gauls.

WE have already spoken at large of the origin and antiquity of the Gauls, in the history of the Celtes, their ancestors^a; of their migrations and settlement in Europe, and of their antient monarchical government there^b. How and when it came afterwards to dwindle, and split itself into that variety of forms in which the Romans found them afterwards, were in vain to inquire after, considering their inbred contempt of learning, and that they kept neither history nor records but what was couched in the songs or ballads of their bards and druids, who kept them, as much as possible, from public knowledge, and only sung or repeated them on certain times, or upon particular occasions, rather to stimulate the people to an imitation of their heroes, than to preserve any regular series of their transactions. All that can be offered concerning this great change, would be only such conjectures as are obvious to every reader; which may, therefore, be easily spared here, since all our intelligence, concerning this their new government, must be fetched from hints and scraps of such foreign authors who have written of them, since they became more known to their neighbours, and of which this is the best account that can be given.

THE Gauls were by this time (though still under the same name, using the same language and customs, and governed by the same general laws) under different governments, some of which were monarchical, others aristocratical, others partly so, and partly democratical, and these were, by way of distinction, called free^c. Tacitus reckons no less than sixty-four of these cities, or, as Cæsar better explains it^d, regions, or districts, who were under this kind of government. These little commonwealths were chiefly governed by the advice of the nobles, but antiently every year they chose a magistrate for civil, and a general for military affairs^e; yet these, as well as those that were under a kingly government, observed one constant law, to call every year, at a certain time, a general council of the whole nation; in which, whatever related to the common interest of the whole nation, was debated and settled. And, indeed, these warlike people were in no small need of such a general council, since they made war one of their chief employments, and were no sooner free from a foreign one, but they immediately fell a quarrelling among themselves: so that, to prevent these intestine broils, the chief business of that grand assembly was, to find out some plausible pretence for carrying it against some of their neighbours, either to pull down those that were over-grown, and raised their jealousy, or to protect the oppressed, or furnish some allies with a number of auxiliaries, and such-like^f. The free commonwealths had, moreover, a law common to them all, that whoever heard any report, or common rumour, among their borderers, which concerned the common interest, they were obliged to acquaint their magistrates with it, and to conceal it from the people. The magistrates were to conceal what they thought proper, and acquaint the people with the rest; for it was not lawful for any person to talk of matters that related to the whole community, but in the council^g. All that can be gathered, relating to this grand assembly, out of the same historian, the reader may see in the subsequent note (A). Upon the whole, then, this grand council

(A) The Gauls, says that conqueror (1), demanded that a general council of their whole nation should be summoned, and that it might be done by his consent. A council was, accordingly, assembled at Bibracte, where was a vast concourse from all parts of the nation (2). And elsewhere he tells us, that he summoned that Gaulish council to meet in the spring; and the previri, senones, and carnuti, not coming with the rest, he adjourned it to meet at Paris (3.)

Among them who opposed his measures, were, Dumnorix, one of the chiefs of the Æduan commonwealth, against whom he had sent an order to

- a council was the dernier resort of the Gauls, wherein every thing relating not only to peace and war, but to property, boundaries, territories, distribution of plunder, and such-like, between district and district, was finally determined. For if, for instance, after some successful victory, or excursion, any debate happened about the plunder, as it seldom failed to be followed with a great deal of bloodshed, if not timely prevented, and, if Polybius may be credited, such bloody frays did often happen for such trifles as the plunder of a good store of victuals, and especially of wine^b; the dispute was deferred to the assembly of the district, or commonwealth. Commonwealths. But whenever it happened, as it often did, between district and district, the grand council must either determine between them, or else they were sure to butcher one another, till one side was forced to give over. So that Tacitus had great reason to say of them, as he did of their neighbours the Germani; "If they will not be in friendship with us, let them at least fall out among themselves: fortune can do no greater service, than to set them at variance among themselves." All that needs be further added, with relation to these small commonwealths, is, that they seem to have had such an aversion to kingly government, that one of them, that of the Ædui (B), ordered the great Certillus, the father of Vercingetorix, mentioned a little higher, a man in great power and credit, and esteemed the first man in Gaul, to be put to death, for having aspired to the kingdom^c. At the same time they were so extremely jealous of each other's power, that they were obliged to enter into combinations against each other, and the little ones to put themselves under the protection of the greater ones; an instance of which we gave in the last note. Cæsar doth sometimes call the former tributary and subject to the latter, but most commonly confederate with them. Upon his first entrance into Gaul he found it divided into two factions: the Ædui were at the head of one, and the Arverni at the head of the other; and both, he tells us, had for many years contended for the superiority^d. What increased the dissension still more, was, that the Bituriges, a people in the province of Berri, and neighbours of the Arverni, were still in subjection to the Ædui; and the Sequani, who lived in Upper Burgundy, now Franche Comté, and neighbours to the Ædui, were under the protection of the Arverni.
- d SUCH were the unhappy divisions between the Gaulish commonwealths (C), which kings gave so great an advantage to the Romans against them, and which they failed not have him slain, who, thereupon, applied himself to the council, alleging, that he was a member of a free commonwealth, and begged to be protected by them (4). Another was Vercingetorix, who, Cæsar says, flattered himself that he should be able to unite such commonwealths to him as dissented from the rest of the Gaulish cities, and to form such a general council of all Gaul, as the whole world should not be able to withstand (5).

This is all that we can meet with concerning those grand councils; but as to other particulars relating either to the extent of their power, the time, manner, and place of their being summoned and held, and the like, history leaves us wholly in the dark.

(B) The Ædui were one of the three chief commonwealths in Gaul (6), and situate near Autun; the country is now called Lower Burgundy.

The other two were the Arverni and the Rhemi. The former of these were sited on the river Loire; their capital was called Arvernium, now Clermont, the capital of Guienne; and they became, in time, so powerful, that, according to Strabo, they made war against Cæsar with 400000 men (7), and, a little before the arrival of their conqueror, had quite weakened their rivals the Ædui, by withdrawing most of their clients and dependents (8): and it was, probably, upon this juncture, that they condemned that great commander of theirs to lose his head, and chose his son in his stead.

The Rhemi were the ancient inhabitants of the country of Rheims, whose ancient and famous metropolis still bears the same name, and is one of the greatest, and most populous cities of France.

(C) Accordingly, we find the Senones, or rather Semnonēs, who inhabited some part of the Lionois, joining in league with that of the Parisians, and both soon after putting themselves under the protection of the Ædui. The Bellovaci, a very populous commonwealth, and in great repute and authority among the Belgæ (9), were likewise allied with them. Their capital, then a very considerable city, was called Bellovacum, and Cæsaromagus; their country still retains the name of Beauvois.

Cæsar reckons, moreover, five different people under the dominion of the Nervi (10), another ancient, fierce, and warlike people of Belgia, supposed to have dwelt in the now diocese of Cambray; these were the Centrones, or inhabitants of Courtray. Grudii, supposed to have dwelt about Bruges; the Lavaci, about Louvain; the Pleumosi, or Pleumasi, whose situation is uncertain; and the Gorduni, situate in the neighbourhood of Ghent. The Eburones and Condrusi, who lived in the territories of Liege and Namur, were clients to the Treviri, or inhabitants of the country of Triers, the then principal nation in Belgia prima. The Veneti, or inhabitants of Gallia Armorica, or Britany, composed so powerful a commonwealth, that our author (11) tells us, their dominion was one of the most extensive.

to improve, according to their wonted policy, as we shall see in the sequel. Cæsar, a finding the Arverni too strong for, and averse to him, entered into an alliance with the Ædui, who were by this time become vastly inferior to them, complimenting them with the title of friends and brothers to the Roman people. Their example was soon followed by others, so that partly by cajoling some, and sowing jealousies and discords among others, he facilitated the conquest of that noble and warlike nation, which, had it been more united in interest, and form of its government, must, in all appearance, have proved too hard for him.

BUT, notwithstanding this great multitude, and variety of commonwealths, it is plain, that both Gaul, Germany, and Spain, still swarmed with petty kingdoms, that is, with districts, governed by kings, whom the Romans styled reguli, or petty kings, but the Gauls styled kings (D), though their dominions were ever so small. These differed from the magistrates of commonwealths, in that they enjoyed their dignity during life; and from common monarchs, in that it was not hereditary (E), but sometimes conferred by the people upon such as were in the greatest esteem for justice, wisdom, and bravery. Sometimes they were forced by one nation upon another, as the Bituriges did one over the Celtae, in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus^m; sometimes a brave and powerful man forced himself upon the throne: and even those who seem to have come to the crown by succession, were far from being arbitrary, or having an unlimited power, but were as much accountable to the people as those that were chosen by them. This is, at least, what Ambiorix, king of the Eburones, owns, with relation to himself. "The constitution of our government, says he, is such, that the people have no less power and authority over me, than I have over them." This form has been, indeed, much admired by Aristotle, Polybius, Cicero, and especially by Plato, as by far the safest, and most excellent; because, as the last of these rightly observes, should kingly government be left without a bridle, when it hath attained the supreme power, as it stands upon such slippery ground, it easily falls into tyranny. "For this reason, says he, it ought to be restrained, as with a curb, by the authority of the nobles, and of such chosen men as the people have imposed for that end and purpose."

(D) The word rex seems plainly enough to be of Celtic extract, viz. from rhoy, prince, or lord: hence we have shewed in a former volume (12), Rhen, Jove's mother, to have had that name given her, as implying a lady, or princess, as she really was. The name of Rhey might therefore be given to those ancient monarchs, till their vast kingdom came to split itself, as we have seen above, into so many petty principalities and commonwealths; at which time, it is probable, those petty kings came to be called Tyrannes, or, according to the old Celtic, Tyr-rhanwir, from their being the persons who divided the people into such districts, or communities, and settled the boundaries of each, as well as the portions of land which every family under them was to be intitled to. Hence the tyrannoi of the Greeks, and the word tyrant, might at first carry a much better meaning, till their degeneracy made it to become so odious, that they changed it for those of princes, dukes, earls, &c. (13).

The author of the Mona antiqua, above quoted, thinks the name and office of these tyrants to be of much older date; and that, in all probability, some such power or dignity is tacitly implied in one of the statutes of the sons of Noah, called de judiciis (14). We have formerly given our sentiment concerning that rabbinic book (15) so much discredited by some, and so strongly defended by our learned Selden. But, without having recourse to such questioned authorities, reason plainly tells us, that from the first dispersion there must have been some such tyr-rhanwirs, or land-assigners, as the word implies, to prevent the continual quarrels that must inevitably happen for want of them. And these were most likely the heads of families, whose paternal authority carried a kind of divine right. For if mankind sprung from one man, then the original of government must be supposed, of course, to have been not only monarchical, but such by divine appointment, and vested in the heads of families.

Moses further observes (16), that the three families of Noah's sons were, after the flood, divided after their tongues and families, begojehem, in their nations, that is, into separate communities, over whom the chief, or head, presided, and was the rhoy, or lord, and tyr-rhanwir, or assigner of their proper lands in each settlement. But however that be, in such a change of government as here happened among the Celts or Gauls, nothing can be more evident, than the necessity of such a kind of despotic distributors and assigners of lands in each new kingdom or commonwealth; and who could be fitter for such an office, than those who bore the greatest authority?

(E) At least J. Cæsar mentions several eminent private men, whose ancestors had been formerly invested with the regal dignity, and, among these, Casticus, whose father had been many years king of the Seguni (17); Piso, whose grandfather had reigned in Aquitania (18); and Tasgetius, whose ancestors had been kings of the Carnutes (19), and whose territories retain still the name of Chartrain. So that they seem rather to have been magistrates for life, than real kings, especially as their power is affirmed to have been limited by the people.

- It is not easy to guess from Cæsar's commentaries, from which we have the greatest part of this intelligence, either how many of these kingdoms there were in Gaul, or what nations were governed by them, and which by a commonwealth; but both were equally courted by the Romans, and for the same reason; viz. to withdraw from, and weaken the force of those that opposed their conquests. These petty kings, especially, were often corrupted by dint of gifts, promises, or some fine titles, such as that of friends and confederates of Rome, to embroil the Gaulish affairs, and foment dissensions among their little kingdoms and republics: even the poorest and most inconsiderable amongst them were thought worth their while to bring over to them; and if they found them busy and active in their interest, they failed not to reward them in such a manner as was most likely to draw others into the same treacherous practices. Among those whom Cæsar mentions among the friends and allies of Rome, was Catamantales, king of the Sequani, the grandfather of Piso, mentioned a little higher, who reigned in Aquitain, and whose name the conqueror has not thought fit to record; and Olevico, king of the Nitiobriges, or people of Agnois, who had that title bestowed upon him by the Roman senate. Among those who made the noblest resistance against the Romans, was Divitiacus, king of the Sueffones, a brave people of Gallia Belgica, who was one of the most potent princes of all Gallia. His territories were large and fruitful: he had twelve considerable cities, one of which, Noviodunum, now Noyons, Cæsar afterwards reduced, and with it that whole nation, as we have elsewhere shewn, notwithstanding they had brought 500000 fighting men against him. This prince's dominions is said to have extended even to Little Britany. He was succeeded by Galba, at the time when Cæsar invaded them. Thus much for the Gaulish government, which we shall close with a severe reflection which that conqueror makes upon it, and which will shew how much their intestine feuds contributed to his conquest of them. "Among the Gauls, says he, not only all their cities, cantons, and districts, but even almost all families, are divided and torn by factions. These are generally caused and fomented by their princes and demagogues, who exercise a kind of arbitrary power and authority over their inferiors and dependents, and manage all public matters with an uncontrollable sway." Tacitus observes much the same thing of it; so that, in spite of all their bravery, their ruin seems no less than inevitable, when so torn and dismembered from within, and invaded by such powerful and politic enemies from without.

WHETHER these disasters were occasioned through the want of a good body of laws, or through the neglect and violation of them, is not easy to determine. We have, indeed, observed, in a former volume, that Mercury is said to have civilized the Celtic nation, in many respects, and, amongst other things, that he gave them a set of laws. Another author gives the credit of this to one Samothès, a man of profound learning and wisdom among them, and said to have been the founder of the Celtic monarchy. But what those laws were, if any such were, indeed, compiled for them, we are wholly in the dark. The druids and bards, who had the keeping and interpreting of them, were too cautious to divulge them to strangers, or even to any of their own nation, except to those of their own order; since they observed the same shyness with relation to all other branches of learning, which they carefully concealed from the people. But whatever that system of laws may have been, it must have suffered a total change, upon the abolition of the monarchy, and the dismembering of the whole into so many petty kingdoms and commonwealths. And, indeed, by all we can gather from Cæsar, or any other antient author, they seem so far from having been tyed by any common body of laws, that, except that of holding a general assembly every year, and another of permitting all private quarrels and contests to be decided by single combat, which every community was obliged to permit, they rather appear to have been wholly governed by the decisions of the council, whether of each district, or of the whole nation, unless where kings did bear an absolute sway, if any such there were; for, as far as we can find, most of this sort were as much subject to the people, as they to them. If we may, however, guess from some instances of their history, they seem to have held one general maxim, viz. that the longest sword had the best title, and that it was the design of the supreme being that the strongest should strip the weakest; and that he who had not power enough to defend his right, ought to yield it to him that was capable of taking it from him. The following instance, out of *Livy*¹, is a pregnant one, that this was an established principle amongst them.

THE Senones, of whom we have spoken a little higher, finding themselves too much streightened in their territories, fell foul upon the city of Clusium, whose territories happened to lie very convenient for them; upon which, the besieged applied to the Roman senate for help, who being, at that juncture, unwilling to enter into a war with the aggressors, contented themselves with sending them three young patricians of the Fabian family, in a friendly embassy to them. These opened their commission before the general assembly of the Gauls, which was, in substance, to require the Senones to cease all further hostilities against the Clusians, otherwise the senate would be obliged, against their will, to support the oppressed, against whom they could allege no cause of complaint. To this the Gauls answered, with their usual politeness, to the following effect; viz. that though they were not acquainted with the Romans, they could not but have a great notion of their bravery, seeing the Clusians had implored their assistance under their present unhappy situation. "Y^{or} principals, continued they, having chosen to send an embassy to us, rather than their forces to support their allies, we do not refuse the peace which you offer to us, provided the Clusians, who hold more lands than they can cultivate, agree to yield some of them to us, who are in want of them. This is the only condition upon which we can make peace with you, and we desire a positive answer before your departure. If the Clusians will not agree to it, we are ready to give them battle, even now, before you, that you may be able to inform your countrymen how much the Gauls are superior to other nations, in point of bravery."

To this the ambassadors replied, without seeming to understand the force of the last words, that they could not but look upon it as a piece of great injustice, to insist upon a people's yielding the territories they were lawfully possessed of, and to wage war against them because they refused to do so. Whereupon Brennus, the Gaulish leader, without farther ceremony, answered, that the Gauls carried their right at the point of their sword; and that the brave had the best title to all things. "You yourselves, said he, have made no scruple to strip the Albanians, Fidenates, Volscii, &c. of the greatest part of their territories; and yet you did nothing, in all this, that we pretend to censure, as either strange, or unjust: for you did only follow the prime, and most antient of all laws, which obliges the weak to give way to the strong. This law seems to be derived from the deity itself, and extends down to the very brutes, amongst which, the strongest naturally seek to subdue the weakest. Cease, then, to take the part of the besieged Clusians, lest the Gauls should one day think themselves obliged, in their turn, to shew the same compassion towards those whom you have oppressed." This was, indeed, an argument ad hominem, and such as the Romans could never answer, but tacitly approved and followed, though they had not the ingenuity to own it, as the Gauls did, upon all such occasions (F). What the success of this embassy was, is foreign to our present subject: we have given a full account of it in a former volume², and only repeat it here to shew, by what laws this nation was chiefly governed, viz. that

(F) A remarkable instance of this, we have in the same Gaulish general, who having promised the Romans to raise the siege of the capitol, and to retire from them, upon condition they paid him a thousand pounds weight of gold, when the money was brought to be weighed to him, ordered false weights to be made use of; and being asked by the Roman tribune what he meant by them, proudly answered him, "What should it mean, but war to the conquered (19)?"

In like manner, a little before the battle which Marius gained over the Cimbri, another tribe of the Gauls, we find one of these sending a challenge to fight the stoutest of the Romans in single combat, and overcome by the brave L. Opimius (20). Soon after this, Borix, one of their kings, came in person to Marius's camp, and challenged him to appoint a day and place for a battle, there to decide their right to the territories they were then disputing about, pursuant to their general and received maxim, that providence was always on the side of the strongest and bravest (21). The same notion was common among the *German*s, and was alleged by their king Ariovistus, who having conquered the Segunni, told Julius Caesar, that the right of conquest intitled the conqueror to use the conquered as he pleased (22).

a of the strongest arm; and that if ever they had any other laws, they suffered them to be superseded by this, which they falsely called the law of nature.

NEITHER was this maxim of theirs confined to foreign conquests, but extended itself to the decision of private right among themselves; for when any debates arose amongst them, about their possessions, about any injury or affront, given or received, especially among those of the better sort, in case the council or public magistrate did not give sentence to the satisfaction of both parties, they generally decided the point by single combat. Neither could their magistrates deny them that liberty, when once insisted upon by either party; nor could the opposite decline the challenge, without giving up the point, and being branded with ignominy. Antiently, indeed, that is, whilst the whole Gaulish nation were under a monarchical government, the druids and bards, who, as we have formerly hinted, were the keepers and interpreters of their laws, and presided in all their courts and councils with such an uncontrouled sway, that it was the most dangerous thing to contravene their decisions, such disputes may have been, and, it is most likely, were actually decided by these courts and councils; but after they came to be separated into so many different governments, they began to look upon such subjection as a kind of outrage to their freedom and honour, and to substitute this way of single combat to it, not only as the shortest, but as the more honourable, and more agreeable to that received maxim of theirs, that providence was engaged to side with the right party; and that success was a sure token that the conqueror had the best title to the thing in dispute. And as the party who thought himself injured had a right to appeal to this way of duel, to justify his dissatisfaction, even though the king himself had given sentence against him, and his opponent was obliged to submit to it; so if the case of the two contenders was so intricate, that the judges could not readily determine it, they used to adjudge them to this method of ending the contest. Even the very witnesses, if their depositions chanced to contradict each other, were obliged to clear themselves by fighting. In a word, whatever was decided by single combat, was looked upon as of greater weight and authority than any sentence that was passed either by king, or court of judicature. Accordingly, we read of two contending brothers in Spain, between whom Scipio would fain have compromised their dispute about the succession; who told him, with one accord, that they would submit to no judgment, either of God or man, but to that of Mars^b. Herodotus, who often confounds the Scythians with the Celts, tells us, that they were wont to keep, and shew to the strangers, that travelled through their countries, the heads of those whom they had thus overcome in single combat, in quarrels about property, honour, and such-like^c. The same custom was also practised among the Germans, who are reported to have lulled Varro asleep, by complimenting him with having found out means to end quarrels and disputes by the way of justice, which they were wont to decide by the sword^d.

b Antiently, indeed, that is, whilst the whole Gaulish nation were under a monarchical government, the druids and bards, who, as we have formerly hinted, were the keepers and interpreters of their laws, and presided in all their courts and councils with such an uncontrouled sway, that it was the most dangerous thing to contravene their decisions, such disputes may have been, and, it is most likely, were actually decided by these courts and councils; but after they came to be separated into so many different governments, they began to look upon such subjection as a kind of outrage to their freedom and honour, and to substitute this way of single combat to it, not only as the shortest, but as the more honourable, and more agreeable to that received maxim of theirs, that providence was engaged to side with the right party; and that success was a sure token that the conqueror had the best title to the thing in dispute. And as the party who thought himself injured had a right to appeal to this way of duel, to justify his dissatisfaction, even though the king himself had given sentence against him, and his opponent was obliged to submit to it; so if the case of the two contenders was so intricate, that the judges could not readily determine it, they used to adjudge them to this method of ending the contest. Even the very witnesses, if their depositions chanced to contradict each other, were obliged to clear themselves by fighting. In a word, whatever was decided by single combat, was looked upon as of greater weight and authority than any sentence that was passed either by king, or court of judicature. Accordingly, we read of two contending brothers in Spain, between whom Scipio would fain have compromised their dispute about the succession; who told him, with one accord, that they would submit to no judgment, either of God or man, but to that of Mars^b. Herodotus, who often confounds the Scythians with the Celts, tells us, that they were wont to keep, and shew to the strangers, that travelled through their countries, the heads of those whom they had thus overcome in single combat, in quarrels about property, honour, and such-like^c. The same custom was also practised among the Germans, who are reported to have lulled Varro asleep, by complimenting him with having found out means to end quarrels and disputes by the way of justice, which they were wont to decide by the sword^d.

c To such a degree of fondness for these single combats were they grown, that the very candidates for places of honour or trust, when their pretensions or merit were esteemed nearly equal, had recourse to it; and even among the druids themselves, the choice of a chief, when the old one died, was often decided by it, whenever any dispute arose about the number or validity of the votes of those who had the choosing of him^e. And, what was still more prodigious, these challenges were often sent for mere punctilios, and trifling piques, especially at their feasts, and drunken revels, and many times out of mere ostentation, and to make parade of their strength and bravery; of which, the two following are pregnant instances, and plainly shew how tenacious they were of this general law of deciding all controversies by the sword. Livy, speaking of the funeral obsequies which Scipio Africanus performed to the memory of his father and uncle, who both died in the Spanish wars, tells us, that there came vast crowds of persons of distinction to Carthagera, a city in Spain, said to have been built by Asdrubal, to honour that ceremony by single combats. "These, says he, did not fight like the common gladiators, either by force, or for money, but of their own accord, and free will." Some were sent thither by their princes, to display their bravery, for the credit of their nation; others declared they came to do honour to their general. Some came to fight there out of ostentation;

and others because they could not refuse the challenge that was sent to them. ^a Amongst them there were some, who having law-suits, or some controversies with others, agreed among themselves to put off the decision of them to this time and place, and with this condition, that the estate or thing in dispute should fall to the conqueror ^f. The other instance, which we have out of the same authors, is of some Gaulish mountaineers, who were generally looked upon as some of the rudest and fiercest of that nation, whom Hannibal had taken prisoners; these the Carthaginian general ordered to be brought at the head of his army, and, having provided them with a sufficient number of Gallic arms, offered them their liberty, upon condition that they should engage in single combat, and vanquish every man his antagonist; promising, moreover, that every victor should be presented with a horse, ^b and a set of warlike accoutrements. This they readily accepted, and, in sight of the whole army, fought with such intrepid bravery, that the spectators knew not which to admire most, the victor, or the vanquished (G).

How long this duelling humour has been preserved among some of our neighbours, and how little to their credit, in spite of their specious pretence of honour, we need not here observe: their ancestors, it is plain from their history, made war their chiefest trade, and highest glory; and if they carried that favourite passion to excess, this may be said, in extenuation of it, not only that the same warlike phrensy reigned all over Europe, and far beyond, but, likewise, they were under a kind of necessity of indulging it to the utmost, in order to put a stop to the encroachments of a neighbouring nation, who aimed at no less than the enslaving of all the world (H). No wonder, then, if in such a case they used all possible means to inure themselves to martial deeds, to inspire their youth with a contempt of death, and thirst after glory and liberty, and to prefer an honourable death to an ignominious slavery. This became, accordingly, such a settled maxim among them, that they seemed to have no other concern in this world, than either to preserve their liberty, or to avoid slavery by a noble death ^h. Whenever, therefore, we shall see their descendants encourage these kinds of single combats from the same laudable motives, we shall readily own them to follow in the steps of their warlike ancestors. But if their views rather tend to rob other nations of their liberty, than to preserve their own, ^d they will be justly chargeable with having improved the Gallic ferocity, by the superaddition of the Roman ambition and tyranny. But to return to the ancient Gauls: They had such a singular contempt of life when not accompanied with liberty and martial deeds, that either upon the appearance of servitude, or incapacity of action through old age, wounds, or any chronic diseases, they either put an end to their days, or else prevailed upon their friends to do it, esteeming this last state

(G) The Romans seem to have preserved some such barbarous custom, at an ancient temple of Diana, in the neighbourhood of Rome, where the high priest was to be a fugitive slave, and could keep his dignity no longer than he had the good luck to kill such other fugitive slaves as came to dispute it with him. Whoever killed him, was immediately declared his successor, and continued in that office till another took it from him in the same way (23). But whether this custom was introduced in imitation, or, rather, as seems most likely, in contempt of the Gaulish and Celtic duelling, we leave to our readers.

Some think, however, that when the Romans exchanged the old Italic religion for that of the Greeks, they thought fit to turn over that pontifical dignity to their slaves, which exposed the owner of it to such continual and dangerous inconveniencies (24). Caligula is reported to have put an end to it, by sending an expert gladiator, who deprived him at once of his dignity and life (25).

(H) The Gauls, as well as Germans, Spaniards, &c. had the more reason to oppose the Romans, with all their might, because they knew, by the experience of other nations, that where-ever these new conquerors got the better, they overturned their fundamental laws, put an end to all their public councils, gave them new governors and magistrates, disarmed the people, loaded them with such heavy taxes, and subjected them to such a new form of government, as appeared to them intolerable.

To all these we may add a much greater instance of the Roman tyranny, which was, that when any of these brave nations, that had been unfortunately brought under their heavy yoke, did make any attempt, as it was natural and laudable in them to do, or were even but suspected by their despotic masters to have a design, to regain their liberty, they were sure to be made such dreadful examples to the rest, as can hardly be mentioned without horror: we shall refer our readers to the Roman history, for numberless instances of their cruelty to those brave nations, and only observe here, that nothing could more effectually inspire such a brave warlike one as this of the Gauls, with a spirit of liberty, and detestation of the Roman tyranny, than those dismal catastrophes of their unfortunate neighbours, which they had before their eyes.

a as much a kind of slavery, as falling into the hands of their enemies. In cities, when once they found themselves so streightly besieged by their enemies, that they could hold out no longer, instead of thinking how to make the most honourable terms of capitulation, their chief care, many times, was, to put their wives and children to death, and then to kill one another, to avoid being led into slavery. In the field, when they were forced to make such a hasty retreat, that they could not readily procure carriages for those who were not able to follow them on foot, as the sick, wounded, and the like; they made no scruple to dispatch them out of hand. And this was so far from being reckoned a hardship on them, that it was what they begged, with the greatest vehemence and earnestness, of all which we have seen b very many instances through the course of this work, and shall beg leave to add two more, very remarkable in their kind.

THE first is of their famous, and, till then, successful general, Brennus, who being dangerously wounded, in that unfortunate expedition which he undertook against Greece, and seeing his army destroyed, partly by the enemy, and partly by hunger, cold, and other accidents, called together the broken remnant of his troops, and advised them to chuse Cicchorius for their leader, who should first dispatch him, and all the sick and wounded, and afterwards head them back into their own country. The thing was accordingly executed by him, and 20000 of those unhappy wretches were put to death. Brennus, only, chose to die by his own hands, as the most
c glorious death of the two, in his opinion¹. The other is of those Gauls who being on the eve of giving battle to Antigonus, and being threatened by their aruspices with a total overthrow, went first, and killed their wives and children, and then resolutely marched to meet that glorious death, which their soothsayers had foretold to them². With the same spirit of liberty did those act, who were unfortunately taken prisoners by their enemies, before they had time to dispatch themselves: for if once the conqueror began to treat them as slaves, to load them with chains, or condemn them to hard labour, they seldom failed taking the first opportunity of putting an end to their slavery by a voluntary death; even the very loading them with chains, as was commonly used by all nations, has raised this spirit in them to d such a height, that they have rushed upon, and butchered one another, by mutual consent³. Neither was this love of liberty confined to the men, their women are no less famous for it, in history; nor did they come short of the Spartan, and other female heroines, but rather excelled them, in this desperate kind of fury; inasmuch that, when they have perceived their men to give ground, they have sallied out, armed with axes, and such other weapons as came first to hand, and, with most hideous outcries, fallen foul both on the fugitives, and on their enemies; on the first, as betrayers of their country; and on the others, as invaders of their liberties. We shall give some remarkable instances of this female valour under the next head.

IN the mean time, it will not be improper to take notice of a judicious reflection
e which Strabo makes upon this excessive love of liberty, and contempt of death, which reigned among the Gauls, viz. that it did very much facilitate the conquest of that nation; because their pouring thus furiously their numerous troops upon such an experienced enemy as the Romans were, under Cæsar, their want of conduct and circumspection, made them rather increase the number of the vanquished, than stop the progress of the conqueror; whereas those in Spain, by dividing their forces, and a prudent choice of the most advantageous grounds, and strongest passes, and disputing with them every such place, inch by inch, made their conquest more difficult, and longer in completing^m. This remark is certainly very just, and the Spaniards, by joining policy to their valour, did put off their slavery some few f years longer; whereas the Gauls, trusting too much to their number and bravery, were more speedily reduced: yet were the former wanting in a main point of politics, and as they were, like the Gauls, divided into so many petty states, had they, like them, joined their forces against the common enemy, they might, in all likelihood, have baffled all the Roman valour and policy. For, as the same historian observes, in another placeⁿ, it was by this way of conquering one little state after another, that both Carthaginians, and, after them, the Romans, made themselves masters of that country.

THIS is not a proper place to inquire into the causes that occasioned the loss of liberty to the Gaulish nation: it will more properly be done, when we have brought their history down to that sad catastrophe. The point we are upon is, their valour, and love of their country, laws, and liberty, in which noble virtues no nation ever distinguished themselves more than this, or was more dreaded by the Romans for them. Witness that law which the latter made, and is recorded by several of their own writers^o, whereby all dispensations formerly granted to priests, old men, and invalids, were to be made void, in case they were threatened with any tumult or danger from the Gauls; which law is, moreover, taken notice of by Cicero ^p, and by Cæsar himself¹; so that there was a time when they were more afraid of the Gaulish valour, than of any other nation, or even their neighbours the *German*s, whose superiors they proved themselves so far in this point, that they forced their own colonies upon them beyond the Rhine, whenever their vast increase made their own territories too strait for them. Tacitus doth, indeed, tell us, in his life of Agricola, that they were by that time very much degenerated from their ancient valour; which is neither improbable, nor a great wonder, considering how many of their petty kings, and little states, had been corrupted, partly by Roman gold, partly by pompous titles, and high promises, which introduced amongst them luxury and indolence, hastened on the loss of their virtue and liberty, and turned them into traitors against the rest of their countrymen. We shall beg leave, in justice to them, to conclude this article with a remarkable passage or two out of Justin, which are as follow^r:

“THE Gauls, finding their multitudes to increase so fast, that their lands could not afford them sufficient sustenance, sent out three hundred thousand souls to seek for new habitations: part of these settled in Italy, and these both took and burnt the city of Rome; another part penetrated as far as the shores of Dalmatia, and, having destroyed there an infinite number of barbarians, settled themselves at last in Pannonia. A bold, hardy, and martial nation this, who ventured (next after Hercules, who, by the like attempt, raised himself to the highest pitch of reputation, and title to immortality) to cross the almost inaccessible rocks of the Alps, and places scarcely passable through their excessive coldness; where, having totally subdued the Pannonians, they waged war with the neighbouring provinces for many years.”—And a little after, —“Being encouraged by their success, others subdivided their parties; some took their way to Græcia, some to Macedonia, destroying all before them with fire and sword. And so great a terror did the name of Gauls spread round about them, that several kings, not in the least threatened by them, came, of their own accord, and purchased their peace with large sums of money.”—And in the very next book he adds, that “So great was the fruitfulness of the Gauls at that time, that they filled all Asia with their swarms; insomuch, that none of the eastern monarchs either ventured to make war without a mercenary army of them, or, if driven out of their kingdom, fled to any other but to them, for refuge.”

WE shall have the less room either to doubt of, or to wonder at, what we read in ancient authors concerning the singular valour, and love of liberty, of the Gaulish nation, if we consider, that it was as remarkable in their women as in their men; so that both sexes had it, in some measure, transfused in their blood; they sucked it at the breast, and learned the first rudiments of it in the very nursery. We have hinted a little higher, what pains these viragoes took to keep up their men from giving ground to the enemy, and with what intrepid fury they fell, indifferently, upon those who turned their backs upon them, and upon those who pursued them: we shall now, according to our promise, add some few instances more of this female bravery, from undoubted authority.

In their women. THE Ambrones, says Plutarch^s, (a Gaulish people, who lived near the foot of the Alps, between Switzerland and Provence) having been defeated by Marius near Aix in Provence, were pursued by the Romans quite to their carriages: there they

a found the women armed with swords and hatchets, who, mingling themselves with victors and vanquished, did, with one hand, strive to wrench their bucklers from them, and, with the other, to dispatch them, and never let go their hold but with their lives. This might be imputed to their fury and despair; but when they found themselves lost beyond recovery, they sent to demand of the conqueror three things(1); viz. first, Their liberty, that is, that they might not be condemned to slavery: secondly, That their chastity might be preserved inviolate: and, thirdly, That they might be employed in the service of the vestals. These conditions having been rejected by Marius, they were all found, on the next day, either hanging on trees, or wallowing in their own blood, with their children butchered by them, b and by their own hands. We have given, in a former volume¹, another, and even more dreadful instance of this female love of liberty, in the Cimbrian women; the circumstances of which are so shocking, that we hope we may save ourselves the trouble of repeating them here. The same desperate resistance Julius Cæsar is reported to have met with from the Helvetian women, when, having defeated their husbands, he came to take possession of their camp, and their baggage: for both the women, and their young sons, defended themselves to the last, chusing rather to be cut in pieces, than to be carried into slavery². The Dalmatian women are likewise reported to have set fire to their baggage, and to have thrown themselves, and their children, into it; whilst others hurried themselves, and them, into the next c river³. The same we read of those of Istria, Illyrium, Spain, and other Gaulish nations⁴, as well as of those of Germany, who retained more of the old Celtic ferocity than any of the rest: of these last we shall give a remarkable instance, as they shewed this love of liberty, not in the heat of despair, but in cool blood; for a number of these being taken prisoners by the Romans, and scorning to be reduced to a state of slavery, had it offered to their choice, whether they would be publicly sold, or be massacred; did, unanimously, prefer the latter. The emperor, however, not taking them at their word, caused them to be exposed to sale; upon which, they all rushed into a voluntary death, many of them having first sent their children before, in the same way⁵. The same spirit may be said to have run through d all the descendents of the antient *Celts*⁶, and extended even to their children. The author last quoted mentions a stripling, in Spain, who, seeing his whole family taken prisoners, and having, by chance, stumbled upon a sword, fulfilled the orders which his father had given him, to free them from their misery, and put them all to death with it. He mentions, likewise, a woman, who ventured to free a number of other prisoners in the same way: so that we may conclude this article with what Orosius says of the Gaulish nation, when, speaking of those Istrian Gauls who chose to burn themselves, rather than capitulate with the besiegers, he adds, that there was neither man, woman, nor child, that did not prefer death to slavery⁷. And children.

WHAT their military discipline was, is hard to guess: by what we have hitherto e seen, it seems to have been very imperfect; and their falling, in such vast multitudes, upon the enemy, with more fury than discretion, without either taking the advantage of the ground, or dividing their numerous hosts as occasion required, but trusting altogether on their numbers, and reingle bravery, sufficiently shews them to have been greatly wanting in this respect: and this seems the true reason why they had such ill success, whenever they engaged with other nations, especially the Romans. One might, at least, have expected that those continual wars which they waged with these last, and their being so constantly hired as auxiliaries, sometimes by them, and oftener by other warlike people, would have, in time, rendered them the most expert nation in the art of war, considering their hereditary fierceness, intrepid f valour, contempt of death, thirst for glory and conquest, and their invincible dread

(1) Florus, in the place above quoted, attributes this embassy to the Cimbrian women: these were another branch of the Gaulish nation, of whom we have spoken in a former volume (16), and whose women were no less brave and warlike, as will appear, by their desperate defence, and catastrophe, of which we are going to speak. But he is, most likely, mistaken here, as he is in many other instances: the other authors give the glory of it to the Ambronian females.

of slavery; all which were so strongly rooted in them by education (K), and continual exercise in martial deeds, as we have seen under the last article. But whether it were owing to their too tenacious fondness for their antient customs, or to a contempt of those of other nations, their history plainly shews, that they never strove to excel in foreign martial discipline. Their chief talent seems to have consisted, principally, in invading, rather than defending, in pouring in their numberless troops with incredible fury and speed, and spreading terror where-ever they came; in surmounting all the difficulties, and enduring all the hardships, that fell in their way, and falling upon their enemies with dreadful shouts, and desperate eagerness, maintaining the combat with an intrepidity almost peculiar to them; and, when all these failed, as it often did whenever they were engaged with troops that were better disciplined, and trained up in all the politic arts, and stratagems of war; their last resource was, to signalize their valour, and love of liberty, by such desperate exits as those we have lately hinted. Much of their success was owing to their horse, and armed chariots, in both which respects they displayed such a wonderful dexterity, as, joined to their bravery, seldom failed of doing considerable execution. When they came to be divided into small kingdoms, and commonwealths, their method was, to divide their armies, in time of action, in the same manner, that the merit and prowess, as well as the faults and misbehaviour, of every nation and tribe, might be better known, and that every man might be thereby spurred to advance the honour of that to which he belonged. But this, though excellently well designed at first, was attended with great inconveniencies, and often threw things into confusion, either for want of a general discipline, or through the jealousy and misunderstanding between their commanders, and especially from the time the Romans undertook the conquest of Gaul, through the treachery of those who had been corrupted by them.

ONE thing more we must not omit, concerning their military discipline, which is, their extreme superstition, in which they seemed to outdo all other nations: they were very careful in observing the moon, in particular; and avoided, as much as possible, engaging the enemy before it was past the full. An eclipse of it was looked upon as such a bad omen, that no appearing advantage, how great soever, or, indeed, any thing but absolute necessity, that is, nothing but their being attacked, and forced either to defend themselves, or die, could induce them to fight; and then they did engage more like desperadoes, than regular troops. They gave, moreover, particular heed to their druids and aruspices, who, in their auguries, are branded with using some very inhuman ceremonies, of which we have given some hints in speaking of their religion. If the augury promised them success, those diviners used to march before them with songs, and dances, and musical instruments, until the onset began; but if it proved otherwise, they forbore fighting, if possible, till they met with a more favourable one: and such a sway had this order of men amongst them, that they have protracted, or even hindered the fight, even at the very instant they were going to engage. But dreadful was their case, whenever they were forced to engage after a sinister omen, or threatening augury; for then such panic horror and despair reigned through their hosts, that they rather

(K) Besides what we have lately said of their excellent way of training up, and inuring their youth to the military trade, we must remind our readers of an excellent method they learned of their ancestors, the Celts, which was, to have their martial laws couched in some kind of verses, or songs, set to proper tunes, and adorned with all the embellishments of rhetoric and poetry. These the youth were obliged to learn by heart, and to sing upon proper occasions; so that they had learned all the rudiments of military discipline long before they were able to bear arms (27); and it is not unlikely that they likewise initiated them in the practice before that time.

In these songs, or poems, were, moreover, recorded, the actions of the great and brave, the victories which they gained over their enemies, the names of those who signalized themselves in them, and the monuments which were erected in memory of them. For as these bards and songsters never committed any thing to writing, or (if they did, for their own sakes, and the better remembering the vast number of such pieces, which time, and their continual wars, must of course occasion, yet) they never let them go out of their keeping, they were wont to rear up monuments, which were nothing but rude heaps of huge stones, artfully, and by main strength, laid one over another, without any inscription: so that the people were obliged to have recourse to those poems for the meaning of these monumental heaps, of which the reader will find many instances in the authors quoted in the margin (28).

THEIR weapons and armour, as they were antiently in use among the Celtes, we have elsewhere given an account of them ^b; but whether through a shew of bravery, or a contempt of those which were more peculiar to other nations, we do not find they had any others in their wars with the Romans, but their bows and arrows, the sword and lance, which last was either longer or shorter, according to their fancy, and the shield; and yet it was with these weapons that they performed such astonishing feats, as made them, a long time, a terror to their enemies. They despised the helmet, cuirass, and other such defensive armour, and rather chose to fight half, and some quite naked. They were utter strangers to those machines which other nations used in sieges; they had, indeed, learned the method of undermining, but they rather laid their chief stress on a brisk and fierce attack, which they began with throwing clouds of stones into the place, to clear the walls of their defendants; after which, they scaled them, with the utmost fierceness and rapidity. This fierceness did often prove fatal to them, especially when they have chanced to meet with a stout repulse, as they frequently did, from the Romans; for, in all such cases, they lost all their courage, and presence of mind, and suffered themselves to be butchered, without offering to make any defence. Those who chose rather to surrender, did lay down their arms, and presented their left shoulder bare to the enemy, and the women their naked bosoms, in token of submission; after which, they scattered some of their money, plate, and fine cloaths, amongst them, to bribe their conquerors. These instances, however, of submission, were but scarce and rare amongst them, in comparison of those in which they preferred death to slavery. But we have, by this time, followed them long enough in that bloody tract; let us now take a view of them in their pacific excellencies, in their arts and sciences, trade and navigation, &c.

WE begin with their language, which being universally allowed to have been the Their lan- old Celtic, or Gomerian, of which we have given a full account in a former volume ^c, guage we shall have the less to say of it here, except it be as far as relates to the changes it underwent after it divided itself into as many dialects as the whole nation was into little estates. There is scarcely any doubt but this old Celtic was the common language spoken all over Europe. A modern author has not only given undeniable proofs of it, which, barely to abstract, would carry us too far, and be thought, perhaps, too dry a subject for the greatest part of our readers; but he has further confirmed what we had formerly advanced as a probable conjecture, that the German language was originally a dialect of the old Celtic ^d. We shall have occasion to mention some of his proofs, in the history of the antient Germans immediately following: in the mean time, so far as relates to the Gauls we are now treating of, it is manifest, that they all used this language, and that it was that same which is still preserved in several parts of Europe, particularly in Biscay, Britany, Cornwall, and Wales, but no-where more purely than in North Wales.

WHAT occasioned this to be called in question, by several learned men, was, that Julius Caesar ^e, in his division of the Gauls into the Belgæ, Aquitani, and Celtae, affirms, that they differed not only in their customs, but language. To which we may add what Strabo ^f and Ammianus Marcellinus ^g say of them, that they were not of one language, but differed a little from one another; or, as we take their meaning to be, used different dialects of the same language: for so it will appear plainly, to those who shall take the pains to trace those antient dialects to their true origin, as it was brought from the Gauls into our isle, and is still retained in its pristine purity, in that part of it called North Wales, and compare it with those alterations which it did, in time, undergo, in those other parts of Europe where it is still preserved, though nothing so pure and unmixed, such as are South Wales, Cornwall, Ireland, the isles of Man and Anglesey, and some parts of the highlands of Scotland amongst us, and in Britany, Biscay, and some other parts of the continent: such a scrutiny will easily discover, not only the true original mother from her spurious offspring, but the different channels by which this odd and corrupt mixture conveyed itself into the latter. We formerly observed, that not only most of the modern European languages were manifestly dialects, more or less distant, of this old a Celtic or Gomerian, but that even the Greek and Latin, and other ancient ones, had such a surprising affinity with it, as if they had split themselves from the same block, and that very many of them plainly appeared to be of Celtic extract (L). We may add what Quintilian observes of the ancient Latin, that till about the middle of the consular government it was very barbarous and rude in its expressions, having in it a multitude of words and idioms of other languages, most of them Gaulish^b; so that if those which have been since lost, or changed, were to be added to those which still remain, the conformity would appear still greater. And if those Gauls which were afterwards conquered by the Romans, had not, partly out of necessity (M), partly out of mere complaisance, adopted a great number of words and idioms^b from their conquerors, we might still behold a much greater nearness between the Low Briton, Biscayaner, Irish, &c. and the pure North Welsh. So that the only reason why these last have retained it in such purity, must be attributed to their never having been conquered, and thereby keeping themselves from intermixture with other nations. Thus we find the Israelites, during their long abode in Egypt, preserving their original Hebrew, which they suffered to be greatly corrupted, and, amongst a great part of them, almost lost in a seventy years captivity. Now as it

(L) Of this we have interspersed some instances, in a former volume (29); but shall, for the satisfaction of our English readers, add a few more, and place them so, that they may have so much of them at one view, as will clearly make out what we have said; and refer them, for a more copious number, to the authors quoted in the margin (30).

The same may be said, also, of the heathen gods, whom we have shewed, under a former article, to have been of Celtic extract, as well as their names, which are thus etymologized:

(M) There is another proof of the antientness of this old Gomerian, or Celtic, viz. its simplicity, and near resemblance to the Hebrew, and other primitive tongues, of which we have formerly spoken (32), and to which we shall only add an instance, to shew by what steps they came to adopt words of other languages to supply the poverty of theirs.

The antient Celts, as well as their descendants the Gauls, were, as we have had frequent occasion to shew (33), excellent horsemen and chrioteers; and yet the North Welsh, among whom the language is preserved in its antient purity, had not, neither have they to this day, proper names for a bridle, saddle, stirrup, or spur, because they antiently despised the use of them; but are forced to express them by circumlocution: as a leading and a covering leather, for a bridle and saddle; a mounting and pricking iron, for a stirrup and spur. These, and many more such deficiencies there are in that language, which their neighbours the South Welsh, as well as the Britons, &c. have supplied by Greek or Latin words: such as that of ffruyn, frannum, for a bridle, &c. which the others would never adopt; though, in other points, they are now grown very remiss in preserving that antient tongue; and, if they go on in the same neglect much longer, it is much to be feared, will suffer it to be intirely lost.

- a is universally allowed, that most of the Asiatic tongues, such as the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, &c. borrowed most of their radical or primitive words from the Hebrew, so this old Celtic, or Gomerian, which was the language of Gomer and his descendants, who first inhabited Europe, was the mother of most of the European languages, at least as far as Scythia and Sarmatia, which were peopled by Gog and Magog, two other branches of Japhet's offspring: and as there is such a vast affinity between those two mother-tongues, we mean the Hebrew and *Gomerian*¹, or antient Celtic, it is not to be wondered, if we find the same resemblance diffusing itself through all their derivatives; such as the Highb and Low Dutch, the Latin and Greek, the Arabic, Persian, &c. and, particularly, between the Greek, Roman, and old Celtic, b as the authors last quoted have sufficiently shewed, as well as accounted for.

- We have been the more particular on this subject, because several learned men have maintained, that the Gauls commonly used the Greek tongue^k. Nothing can be more wild, or more contrary to all that we meet with in antient authors concerning the Gaulish language, than such an assumption, which may be easily overthrown, by one or two express passages we meet with in Julius Cæsar. The one is, that in a conference which he had with Divitiacus, an Æduan or Gaulish lord, he was obliged to make use of an interpreter; and yet Cæsar was a perfect master of the Greek^l. The other, which is still more express, is, that when that conqueror found himself under a necessity to write to Quintus Cicero, who was then besieged in his camp, he made use of the Greek tongue, lest his letter should fall into the hands of some of the Gauls, and discover his designs to them^m; a precaution which would have been quite ridiculous, if that had been the common language of that nation. Strabo doth indeed tell us, that the Maffilians cultivated all sorts of polite literature, and, particularly, that of the Greek, to such a degree, that the rest of the Gauls were, by their example, become great admirers of that tongue, insomuch that they began to write their contracts and bargains in itⁿ. But then it is plain, first, that he only speaks of those Gauls who were neighbours to Marseilles, many of whom, not only private men, but whole cities, invited several learned men out of that famed city to instruct their youth, or sent their children to be educated there: secondly, If the d rest of the Gauls did afterwards follow their example, it is plain they had originally another language of their own: and, thirdly, That this fashion of learning and using the Greek tongue did not begin till Strabo's time. Accordingly, St. Jerom tells us, upon the authority of a passage which he has preserved out of Varro, that the Maffilians spoke three sorts of languages, the Greek, Latin, and Gaulish^o. Hence we may conclude, that the Greek tongue was only introduced among the learned, but was not the original language of the Gauls. We might further confirm this from a number of antient monuments, and especially from the antient names of provinces, cantons, rivers, cities, mountains, &c. but we think the case sufficiently plain, without any such further proofs. The Greek characters, indeed, e were in use among them in Cæsar's time, as we shall hint under the next head; but as for their tongue, it plainly appears to have been brought into use much later still, and that only among the learned and polite(N). As to the present language of

(N) There is, indeed, one passage in Cæsar's commentaries, from which some authors pretend to prove the contrary. It is that where he affirms, that in all other public and private concerns, Græcis utuntur literis (34); which, compared with the explication which Strabo, who wrote after him, gives of it (35), seems to imply, that they made use not of their characters, but of their language. But to this it is answered, by two learned critics (36), that the word Græcis has been foisted into Cæsar's text. And, indeed, it plainly appears, that Cæsar meant no more in this place, than that the druids did not suffer any of their doctrines or principles to be committed to writing, though, in other matters, they allowed them to write letters, accounts, and the like; which they did, accordingly, in the Greek character, as we shall prove by-and-by.

But whether the phrase, utuntur literis, properly signifies to use the letters, or character, as it oftendoth among Latin authors; or, as others would have it, to use the language, as it may sometimes do, though in a kind of figurative sense; yet, in this place, if the word Græcis be really part of the text, it can only be meant of the character; else it would be absurd in our historian, after he had said, a little higher, that the Gauls were unskilled in the Greek, to say, that all their public and private accounts, transactions, &c. were written in that tongue.

that country, those who are ever so little skilled in ancient ones, may easily perceive a it to be a medley of other tongues, the greater half of which is taken from the Latin, as the Romans were very industrious to propagate it, and cultivate it, in all their conquered dominions (O). The rest is plainly a mixture of the old Celtic, of the Frank or German, as this did afterwards greatly deviate from its original; and the rest seems to be of Greek extraction. For it has been observed, by judicious men of that nation, that many Greek words have been adopted by them into common use, which were not borrowed from the academies of the druids, who, for aught that appears, knew little of it, but from the schools of the Maffilians we have lately spoken of.

their style, and language.

BEFORE we dismiss this article of the Gaulish language, it will not be amiss to b make a short remark on its pretended rudeness and harshness, against which both Greek and Roman authors have raised such an unanimous outcry. According to them, it was enough to hear a Celte or Gaul speak, to make one judge of their natural ferocity; and the greatest part of their words, especially of their proper names of men, women, towns, rivers, &c. were so very harsh, that they could not be pronounced by strangers, or written in other languages, without great difficulty; neither could they be inserted in a poem, without murdering the verse P. A foreigner could hardly hear them spoke without having his ears grated, or almost stayed with it Q. The emperor Julian says, that it resembled the croaking of a raven, or the growling of some wild beast R. There must needs be allowed to be some exag- c geration in these expressions, considering how uncouth and barbarous any language appears, to those who are unaccustomed to, or ignorant of it. It is not to be questioned, but even the French and Italian, emasculated as they have been of late, do appear so at first hearing: it must, however, be confessed, that, with respect to the German, there is less of the hyperbole; and perhaps the ancient Gaulish might originally have a great deal of that kind of harshness, which guttural and some other hard consonants, as well as too great a colluvies of them, will naturally cause, unless softened by the interposition of vowels. We do not, therefore, pretend wholly to disculpate the latter, but would only observe, that there is a vast difference between those two languages in this respect; and that the true Celtic, or d North Welsh, though seemingly crowded with a number of consonants, has yet a peculiar sweetness, and is much more adapted for music and poetry, than we are apt generally to imagine: and, for proof of this, we shall refer our readers to what has been said in a former volume S. And here it will not be amiss to remind them, that their custom of couching and preserving all their laws, records, history, &c. in verse, inured them to a style more swoln, figurative, and emphatic, than that of other nations (P); on the other hand, their fierce and warlike disposition might, in all probability, make them sinder both of that, and of their sonorous and masculine language, than of the smoother Greek and Roman prose. To which we may add, that their natural aversion for the Roman nation might not contribute a little to this e opposition, especially as they had reason to consider all their sweetness of language, style, and behaviour, as so many snares to entrap people out of their liberty. If we may believe Diodorus Siculus T, their style was not only swollen, concise, and Laconic, but intricate and obscure, full of synecdoches and hyperboles; which the reader will find, perhaps, better accounted for by what we shall say, in the sequel, concerning their manners and customs; in which, as well as their loftiness and pompousness of style and language, they seem to have been more closely imitated by the Spaniards, than by any other European nation.

Their writing and characters.

THE Gauls had originally no characters of their own, but adopted, in process of f time, the Greek ones; yet, as we have already hinted, they did not do it till very

(O) This plainly appears, from what Valerius Maximus, Tacitus, and Ausonius, tell us, of their setting up schools at Autun, Lyons, Bezangon, and other places of that kingdom, as fast as they conquered them. And we need not doubt, but, according to their wonted lordliness over all their vassals, they used all proper means to encourage and oblige them to learn it.

(P) Hence the German poetry, which preserves still its ancient roughness, is judiciously enough compared to those cataracts of the Nile, whose sounding falls are rather apt to inspire one with dread, than to afford pleasure to the hearers; and their swoln style to that of men that are ever mounted upon stilts.

- a late, and till their commerce with other nations obliged them to it; their contempt of foreign learning was a great obstacle to it, and their druids or bards, whose interest it was to keep their own from the people, did all they could to improve this their prejudice against committing any thing of moment to writing, under pretence that it rather tended to destroy, than preserve the memory of them, as it was likely to be a kind of discouragement to them to learn them by heart out of their poetical compositions; whereas this last, they pretended, was the most effectual means of preserving them, both from oblivion, and from falling into the hands of strangers^a: so that it was looked upon as a dishonour for any of them to learn to read or write (Q). And even after they began to introduce the use of letters, in their contracts, b bargains, and the like civil concerns, the druids never suffered them to commit any thing relating to their history, laws, and much less of their religion, to writing^w. Hence Origen might well tell his antagonist^t, that he never heard of any of their writings; and hence that scarcity of materials we meet with, with relation to their history, since they committed all their learning, laws, religion, and transactions, to those songs and verses which they carefully kept from strangers; and perished, in all likelihood, with their liberty, or, at least, with their old heathenish religion, upon their embracing christianity (R). It were to be wished, that the christian priests and monks had not imitated, so closely, this druidish policy, of confining all learning to their own order and monasteries; especially in Gaul and Germany: for they seem c to have so well cultivated this prejudice against it, among the laity, that they were forced to have recourse to them whenever any will, grant, or public act, was to be made; and then both the persons concerned in it, and the witnesses, set their own marks, and the scrivener their names to it. But, with respect to the mercantile part, among whom there was a kind of absolute necessity to make use of writing, the Greek character seems to have been that which was in use amongst them, according to Cæsar, Strabo, Pliny, and others, above quoted (S); and was brought amongst them from Marseilles, which was a colony of the Greeks, or Gallo-greeks. How their conquest, and intercourse among the Romans, did afterwards introduce their character amongst them, is obvious to every one, and we need not dwell any longer d upon it.

(Q) Eliau has preserved us a passage out of Andron, to this purpose (37), that the ancient Thracians, and, in general, all the barbarian nations, settled in Europe, were not only quite ignorant of letters, but had a singular contempt for them, though they were commonly used by those that settled themselves in Asia. The same is affirmed of the Hians, by Procopius (38); and this humour seems to have been so deeply rooted among them, that even Theodoric, king of Italy, could never be prevailed on to learn to write his own name, though he had spent a considerable part of his younger days among the Romans; but is reported, whenever he was obliged to sign an edict, to have only made use of a golden plate, that had the four initial letters of it, TROD, engraven upon it, and which he traced with his pen (39).

(R) It is probable, indeed, that upon their conversion to the gospel they might, by degrees, be so far shamed out of this superstitious fondness for concealing their laws, history, &c. that they might suffer them to be committed to writing from thenceforward: but as for those hymns, and poetic compositions, which we are speaking of, it is not to be supposed, that they were ever preserved, seeing both parties, that is, both the new converts, and those who remained in their ancient idolatry, were equally concerned to suppress them; the latter out of their natural zeal to conceal them, and the former on account of those praises that were sung in them, to their false deities, heroes, &c. and of those abominable and inhuman rites that were performed in the worship of them. Jornandes tells us, indeed, that those which were in use among the Goths, were still extant in his time. If they were, it is plain they have since perished, and, most probably, for the very reason just now assigned.

(S) We have observed, a little higher, that this passage is controverted by some learned men (40), who think that the word Græcis is interpolated in the place there quoted: however, as they do not substitute any other character to it, and some other passages seem express, such as the muster-rolls, and some other public writings which were found amongst them; we make no doubt but the Greek were the first and chief letters in use amongst them.

This carries such an evidence with it, that the author of the religion of the Gauls, who makes these to have come originally out of Phœnice, and to have brought their own character from Asia into Europe; doth yet allow it undeniable, that they likewise used the Greek amongst them: and to the authorities above quoted adds some others, taken from ancient medals, and, particularly, an antique inscription, whose legends are in the Gaulish tongue, and Greek characters (41). So that if these be really as old, and as authentic, as he, and the authors from whom he has taken them, do suppose (42), there is not the least room to doubt of those letters having been in common use among the Gauls.

origin of their poetry.

As to their poetry, as it is altogether lost, we can say little of it; yet it will not be amiss to mention an ingenious conjecture of a modern historian⁷, who thinks that the want of learning and characters, or, as he expresses it, the reigning ignorance, and contempt of letters, gave birth to those poetical compositions, at least in Europe. This was, indeed, the most effectual method to preserve the memory of such momentous truths and facts as they either could not, or cared not to commit to writing, and which, by this means, were not only easily learned, and remembered, but, likewise, concealed from other nations (T). And such fondness did both Gauls and Germans conceive for these kind of performances, especially as they were set to proper tunes, that they seemed to relish nothing else, and shewed a natural contempt for those of the prosaic sort. And this humour did still prevail so strongly, even so low as the ninth century, that when Lewis the Debonnaire undertook to have the Samas instructed in the holy scriptures, he was obliged to employ one of their poets to put them into Saxon verse⁸. The same was done by Ottobradus, with respect to the four gospels, which he caused to be translated into German, and put into verse: for as they could neither read, nor eased to learn, they consented to learn them by heart, provided they were put into verse, and set to music for them, and they permitted to sing them on proper occasions. Some such compositions Charles the Great is said to have found amongst them, which were very antient and rude, and contained the wars and exploits of their antient kings, and which he caused, likewise, to be transcribed, for the same end⁹. We have already hinted, more than once, what were the chief subjects of those antient poetic compositions: as to their metre, and other particulars relating to them, we are wholly in the dark, unless we guess at them by some of a more modern date; such as those which the author of Anna Antiqua has given us¹⁰ out of Taliesin, who was poet laureat to Martynus, about the time of Austin the monk's coming into England. But neither from these, nor from the character which antient authors have given us of the old Gaulish language, can we conclude them to have been either smooth or elegant, except with respect to the loftiness of their expressions and figures: yet would it not be fair to conclude, that they were all of the same kind; and we should have framed but a very wrong idea of the Greek poetry, if we had had no other poems to judge by than those of a Pindar, Lycophron, and some others of their bards.

Arts and sciences.

We need not here repeat what we observed, in the last section, concerning their skill in astronomy and geometry, from which we may justly infer, that if they were masters of those two sciences, they must, of course, have cultivated many others, especially such as are depending on, or leading to them; but to what a number, or degree, cannot be easily determined, any more than what new ones those were which they afterwards learned from the Masilian sages. As for arts, next to the military, which, though their great favourite, was but indifferently cultivated among them, as we have shewed above, eloquence was that wherein they prided themselves most, and which, indeed, was most natural to them. They received, from their infancy, most of their instructions from those poems which were composed by the bards and druids; they heard them, upon all public occasions, either read, or sung; and as the greatest part of them were of the heroic kind, so it inured them to a pompous and high-flown style. We have seen, that they represented Mercury, the god of eloquence, with the symbols of Hercules, to shew what vast power that art had over them, above all

(T) This remark, however, is far from being designed to derogate from that purer and nobler origin, which pious christians have given to this excellent art, viz. the love of the Supreme Being, and the contemplation of his attributes and works. But, however true this last may be, with relation to the people of God, who so early, and so much, excelled all other nations in it, as we have fully shewn, in a former volume (43), it can never be imagined to have been the case of the fierce Gauls and Germans, whose religion and genius was quite opposite to such a supposition. As for those who make Bacchus and Venus the parents of poetry, if they will but add Mars to it, they may be well enough allowed to have guessed righter, with respect to the nations we are here speaking of; and though their compositions have not reached our times, we find reason enough to guess, from their temper and dispositions, their banquets and drunken revels, of which we shall speak in its proper place, that great part of those songs and poetic compositions owed their rise to them.

- a others. These emblems they seem to have taken from the Romans (V); and though they were so far from imitating them in their long-winded periods, flow and pomposity of words and figures, but affected, in the main, a concise and nervous style, yet they could not forbear being taken with such artful declamations and pieces of oratory. This is, at least, what Cerealis, a Roman general, upbraided them with in Vespasian's time^c; and Cato the censor tells us, that the Gauls made this eloquence, and exercise of arms, their chief study. And, indeed, nothing could be more natural, or necessary, in such a country as this, where every little kingdom and commonwealth had its particular council, before which all matters relating to peace and war, and every matter, both public and private, was debated by the parties concerned, besides the grand council of the whole nation, where the rights, privileges, pretensions, and other concerns of every private state, were to be debated, and finally determined, as we have seen above. But, after all, we would not venture to affirm, that this art was equally cultivated all over Gaul; it is more likely, that these countries, which remained still unconquered by the Romans, retained still something of their natural ferocity, and contempt for such arts and sciences as were most admired among foreign nations: and we may very well suppose, that the druids, wherever they still bore any sway, did all they could to cherish this antipathy. And it is, perhaps, in order to lessen this aversion, as well as to inspire those that were subdued, with a greater love of this art, that several emperors thought fit to found
- b academies in several parts of Gaul, with considerable rewards and honours to those who gained the prize of it. We are told, that that of Autun had, in Tiberius's time, 40000 students^d: we read, besides, that other public schools were erected at Lyons, Bordeaux, Toulouse, Narbonne, and other places, besides that so famed one of Marseilles, of which we have already spoken^e. Hence we need not wonder, that this country has been since so celebrated for the great number of its rhetoricians and orators^f; and if it has not been equally famous for their excellency in this kind, as for the number of them, it is because it has happened here, as it doth every-where, and in most other studies, many labour hard at them, but few are qualified for them^g.
- c We have already taken notice, from the great regard they paid to the god Mercury, as he was the god of traffick, that they drove as great a commerce as any other nation. This is, moreover, proved, from a great number of ancient inscriptions, and, particularly, a famous one set up by the Paris merchants, and dedicated to Jupiter the good. The reader will see it in the margin (W), together with a hint or two of some curious conjectures, which a modern author has drawn from it, which would be too long for us to dwell upon. The whole country seems to have been divided into three estates, viz. the druids, with their underlings, the bards, &c.

(V) It is known, that the Romans, in all places of their public exercises, placed Mercury and Hercules in full view. The Greeks usually set a Cupid between them, to shew, that love hath its origin from the other two, i. e. from strength and eloquence (44); and we read, that the Megapolitans had but one temple for those two deities (45), or even represented them under one and the same emblem (46).

(W) The inscription runs thus: TIS. CAESARE AVG. JOVI OPTIMO. MAXIMO. M. NAVTAE PARISIACI POSVERUNT. From the disposition of some of the letters, which, for want of room at the end of the line, are put just under it, instead of beginning the next, our author supposes the Gauls to have had the ancient way, which is ascribed also to the Greeks, of writing βεσπομδδν, that is, as the oxen ploughed, backwards and forwards (47). He endeavours to confirm his notion by some ancient coins, whose legend runs, in some, from the right to the left; and, in others, from the left to the right: we do not, however, mention it here, as if we were satisfied, that he has fully proved it from either, but only to excite our curious antiquaries to a fuller inquiry into it from such old coins and monuments as may fall into their way.

Our author further pretends, that the Celts, or ancient Gauls, brought the Greek letters with them from Phenice (48), contrary to the general consent of ancient authors, who affirm, that they borrowed them from the Greeks. As his arguments for it seem very far from conclusive to us, we have followed the current opinion, until something more evident strikes out from those hints he has given us; which is far from being impossible, considering the difficulty there is to imagine how it was possible for the druids to retain in their heads such a vast variety of the most copious and important subjects, by dint of memory, and without having some kind of books, or writings, to refresh it, or to have recourse to, when that failed; and how easily might they conceal such a help, if any such they had, as they did so many other things, from the rest of the world?

the nobles, and the mercantile part, which was, by far, the greatest. The two former had their revenue partly from the latter, and partly from their own lands, and the spoils of war; and were so opulent, that riches seemed to flow upon them on all sides, so that their chief business, especially in time of peace, was to encourage arts and sciences, as the best means to preserve, if not to increase, their opulence. What seems most surprising, if what an antient author tells us may be depended upon, is, that some of the Gaulish nations interdicted the use of gold and silver, which was to be all dedicated to Mars, and so become sacred and inviolable; and allowed of no coin, but that which was made of copper and brass^a. The passage is too curious to be wholly omitted, especially as it will convince the reader, that the war which the Gauls waged against the temples of other nations, was not owing to their greediness after those treasures that were stored up in them, but from the aversion they had, in common with the Persees, spoken of in a former volume, against all such buildings, they being looked upon by both as derogatory to the Supreme Being, which cannot be confined within walls, but fills, with his presence, both heaven and earth. We shall give the substance of this passage in the next note (X). But it is too likely, that this contempt of these two superior metals did vanish away, upon their becoming more acquainted with other nations, especially upon their becoming subject to that of the Romans; who, as we observed before, made no scruple to rifle those treasures¹, which, before that time, lay exposed to the wide world untouched, and, perhaps, to corrupt them into slavery with it, as Herodian reports them, and especially Severus, to have done by the German nation.

other exercises.

THE Gauls, as well as all the other northern people, made hunting a considerable diversion; and, indeed, considering the vast forests which the country abounded with, and which bred vast multitudes of wild beasts, such as bears, wolves, wild boars, foxes, &c. (Y), if they had not made it their business to hunt and destroy them, they

(X) "Among the Gauls," says that author (49). "the Cordisci" (he means the Scordisci, of whom we have spoken in a former volume (50), as is plain, by the sequel) "do not suffer, to this day, any gold to be brought into their country, though they make no scruple to ravage other nations. They are a remnant of those who went to besiege the temple of Delfos, under the conduct of Brennus. Bathanatus caused them to be stopped on the banks of the Danube, and forced them to settle in that neighbourhood; and, from his name, they have called that voyage Bathanatia, and his descendents Bathanates. The Scordisci consecrate all their gold, and suffer none to use it in their country: but they would do much better to proscribe their sacrileges, instead of that metal; for it can be no credit to forbid the use of it, whilst they commit so many unjust robberies to procure iron and copper; for if they chance to be in want of these, they take up arms, and lay them not down till they have got a sufficient supply."

Thus far Athenæus. And though he only mentions one nation of the Gauls, yet, if we remember what hath been said of their leaving their treasures of gold and silver, and consecrated to Mars, exposed in the open fields, especially those vast ones which were thrown into the lake of Tholouse, and which consisted in ingots, and rich utensils of those metals; and that, according to Posidonius and Strabo, those treasures remained sacred and untouched; and if we add, to all this, what another author says, that the Gauls never shut to their doors (51); we may safely conclude, that all the rest of the Gauls suffered no other use to be made of those metals, but to dedicate them to their deities, at least till such a time as the Romans, coming to plunder these Asia, as Cepio did that of Thionse (52), used those metals against them, lessened their veneration for the one, and made them set a greater value upon the other.

(Y) Cæsar (53), Pliny, and other authors (54), mention several other wild beasts which used to be hunted by the Gauls, of which we know nothing now but the names; and some of them, by the description there given us, seem to have been of a very strange kind, if there ever were any such in being: such are the alces, the bonassus, the wild ass, &c. The alces, according to Cæsar, had no joints in his legs, and was forced to sleep leaning against a tree. The same animal is mentioned by Pliny and Salinus, without that particularity. The bonassus, according to some authors (55), had a horse's face, and the rest resembled a bull, its horns bending so far back, that there was no riding upon it.

Much the same wonders they relate of some of their birds, one sort of which cast such a bright light from their feathers (56), that travellers made use of them to see their way in the darkest nights: but enough of these fictitious animals.

The real ones, not mentioned above, were, the wild bull, called urus, and which, Cæsar says (57), was a little less than the elephant, though it was not much bigger than a common bull; the elk, which was generally caught in traps, and, being tamed, could be taught to draw a chariot, or sledge (58); the wild goat, of which there were then great quantities, and divers kinds; besides badgers, otters, and other such, not worth mentioning.

For all these kind of creatures they had a breed of proper hounds, which they trained up to the sport, and generally hunted on horseback, unless it be some

a they must, in time, have been over-run with them. But, besides these, they hunted the elk, the deer, hare, and other harmless animals: they made, likewise, fowling a diversion, and were, it seems, so dextrous at it, that they killed them flying, with a dart^b thrown by hand; though they are likewise said to have used the sling, and the bow and arrow. We have, in a former section, taken notice of a way they had of poisoning those darts and arrows which they used in hunting, with the juice of a plant which they called, in their language, lineum, or limeum^c, which some have taken for ellebore^m, some the nightshade. Strabo says, it was a kind of wild fig-tree, whose fruit, he had somewhere read, resembled the Corintbian chapter. The wound failed not, it seems, to kill the creature, and make its flesh more sweet and b tender; but they took care to cut off that piece, and throw it away. The professed huntsmen held a feast every year to Diana, and, among other offerings, each of them presented her with a purse, in which was a certain sum for every beast they had taken during that year; such as a farthing for every hare, a drachm for every fox, and so proportionally for the rest. Their devotions being ended, they adjourned to a sumptuous entertainment, and concluded the day with itⁿ. Other exercises, of the manly kind, they were, likewise, very fond of. We have often observed, what excellent horsemen and charioteers they are said to have been, above all other nations in Europe, which skill could not be attained but by dint of practice. Accordingly, we find, they had their hippodromes, horse and chariot races, tilts and tournaments;
c at all which the bards assisted, and, with their poems, songs, and musical instruments, in which they celebrated the praises of those who had formerly won the prize, inspired the new candidates with a noble ardor to signalize themselves upon all such occasions. And happy were they looked upon, who could obtain a place in those records of fame. All their exercises in general tended to render them lighter, stronger, hardier, and long-winded; and we are told, that the youth were obliged to keep their belly within the compass of a girdle of a certain size, either by fasting, running, riding, swimming, or any other laborious diversion: for if they grew fat enough to exceed the bounds of it, it was not only a disgrace to them, but they were, likewise, fined for it^o. Swimming was also an excellent expedient, not only
d to harden their bodies, but to fit them for passing the widest and rapidest rivers; in which they were so very expert, and famed, that they could cross the Rhine, Danube, and Rbosne, without breaking their ranks^p.

THESE may be looked upon as some of their laudable and beneficial diversions; Feastings. but they had a most predominant one, which can scarcely be ranked in that class, and yet seemed generally to accompany all the other public ones, or, rather, the others served only to introduce this; we mean their feastings, in which they were generally very profuse, though very negligent in the order and decorum of them^q. All their public assemblies and exercises, all their feasts, birthdays, weddings, burials, and anniversaries of them, were always accompanied with such sumptuous e banquets, in which they intermixed with their good cheer both vocal and instrumental music. The nobles, especially, were most fond of them, because their greatness and interest consisting chiefly in the number of their clients, vassals, and solduri, there was not a more effectual way, either to secure the old, or procure new ones, but such kind of entertainments: for the Gauls, as well as the Germans, and other northern nations, were such excessive lovers of good eating and drinking, that nothing won their hearts more than these kind of feasts: and to what height these were carried, may be seen by some few instances we shall give in the margin (Z).

of those creatures which chiefly lived among the rocks, and which they were forced to hunt on foot (59). So fond were they of their hounds, that the ancient Burgundian laws obliged a man, publicly convicted of stealing one of them, to pay five shillings, one half to the owner, and the other to

To these feasts, those who were most famed for valour and wisdom were always reckoned the chiefest guests, because their example did bear the greatest sway in all such elections. The reader may not be displeased, perhaps, to see a short description of these feasts of the ancient Gauls, out of Posidonius, who had himself been in that country: we shall give it in the margin (A). It was likewise customary, to drink hard at these kinds of feasts; yet it seems, according to the same author, that the coryphee, or head-guest, always began first, and put the cup, or rather pitcher, about to his next neighbour, till it had gone round: for, it seems, they all drank out of the same vessel, and no man could drink till it came to his turn, nor refuse when it did. And hence, in all probability, the custom of drinking to one another, which was, it seems, common to the Persians, Greeks, and Romans^r, as b well as to the Scythians, Gauls, and northern people. The misfortune was, that at these feasts they used to begin to talk of affairs as soon as the cups went round; and as they generally sat at them till the next morning, they so heated themselves with liquor, and wrangling, that they seldom ended without duels, the Gauls, says our author, setting so little value upon their lives. If the feast proved a peaceable one, it was generally accompanied not only with music and songs, as we observed above, but with dances, likewise, in which the dancers were armed cap-à-pé, and beat the measure with their swords, upon their shields. On certain festivals, likewise, such as that of Mithras, they used to dress themselves in the skins of such beasts as were dedicated to him, and accompany the processions that were made on that day: c others dressed themselves in masquerade habits, some of them very indecent, and played several antic and immodest tricks; and this custom was retained so long among them, even since their conversion to christianity, that some of their councils and bishops not only censured and condemned them, but appointed fasts, and proper prayers, to be used on those days^d, to divert them from that heathenish custom.

THEIR chief liquors were, beer and wine, the former the most common of the two; for they did not begin to cultivate the latter till very late. Strabo observes, of the Lusitanians, that one such feast as those we have spoken of, used to exhaust all the vintage of that year^e; but, by degrees, they came to like it better, and left the beer to the Germans, and northern nations, and made wine their chief liquor. d Their martial temper inspired them originally with such contempt for agriculture, that they committed the care of it, at first, to their wives, old men, and slaves. The Germans and they are justly blamed for it by the Romans, and a great piece of pride and folly it was in them, to chuse to purchase the conveniencies of life at the expence of blood and wounds, rather than by the sweat of their brow^a. But the entertained all comers, during several days, with all manner of exquisite meats and liquors (61); and of one Atriamnes, who caused lodges to be erected upon the high roads, each of which could entertain four hundred persons, and treated them in the same sumptuous manner a whole year (62). Neither suffered they any strangers, who happened to be at the place at the times of these feasts, or were travelling that way, to pass by without being invited, or even compelled to come, and take share of them; and, if their time could not permit them to stay, they obliged them to drink a glass or two (63).

The following is a remarkable instance of their fondness for these entertainments: The same Luternius having given another such feast, and invited a famed bard to come and sing his praises, as it was usual for them to do; the bard coming just at the latter end of it, was so deeply affected at the disappointment, that he tried, in vain, to sing out his designed panegyric: he was, at length, constrained to change it into deep lamentations, for being forced to take up with the reliques of so sumptuous a banquet (64).

(A) According to him, their tables were very low; they eat but little bread, which was baked flat and hard, and easy to break into pieces; but devoured a great deal of flesh, boiled, roasted, and broiled, which they did in a very slovenly manner, holding the piece in their hands, and tearing it with their teeth. What they could not part by this way, they cut off with a little knife, which they carried in their girdle. When the company was numerous, the coryphee, or chief of the feast, who was either one of the richest, or noblest, or bravest, sat in the middle, with the master of the house on his side: the rest took their places next, each according to their rank, having their servants behind them, holding their shields. The guards had their table overagainst them, and after their masters had done, the servants were, likewise, regaled. He adds, that no one was allowed to eat of a dish, till the coryphee had tasted of it (65).

Diodorus Siculus says, that the Gauls used to eat sitting upon the ground, which was covered with skins of wolves and dogs; and the dishes were brought by the children of the family, or by other boys and girls. He adds, that near every table there was a stove, or fire-place, which abounded with spits, pots, pans, and other such kitchen-furniture (66).

a same may be said of all handicraft trades, which they looked upon as vastly below the care of a warlike nation; but one may say, in general, that when the Romans came to pour their conquering armies upon them, they forced them, by degrees, to procure those things by their labour, which they were formerly wont to get, either by the sword, or by commerce: necessity soon made them feel the sweet of encouraging agriculture, and all other kinds of trades; and by degrees, likewise, of the liberal arts and sciences; in both which branches they became, in time, as expert and famed as any other nation. So that one may safely look upon their conquest by the Romans to have been the mother of all these.

b which are recorded as being peculiar to the ancient Gauls. As for their vices, they are reducible to these three, which are attributed to them by the generality of ancient writers, viz. drunkenness, laziness, and fierceness; all which we shall have the less occasion to dwell upon, because we have occasionally given so many pregnant instances, in the course of their history. As for their drunkenness, we have given Drunkenness. some instances of it in speaking of their feasting; but we cannot see why that vice should be reckoned more peculiar to them, than to their neighbours the Germans, who vastly exceeded them in it. Besides these, Plato has given us a list of other people who were equally guilty of it, viz. the Lydians, Persians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Scythians, and Spaniards; and we need not direct our readers where to c look for some others, who may justly come under the same censure. But the Gauls were more envied for their bravery, both by Greeks and Romans, and were, therefore, made oftener the subject of their reflections. Accordingly Livy and Plutarch pretend to have it from ancient authors, that those Gauls who lived near the Alps, having once tasted the Italian wine, became so enamoured with it, that they immediately resolved to go and conquer that country. And Diodorus Siculus tells us, that they were so fond of that liquor, that they would give a man, that is, one of their slaves, for a gallon of wine; which made the merchants very ready to furnish such customers with that beloved commodity, both from Greece and Italy. It is likewise pretended, that they were more than ordinary greedy of it, on account that d it made them fight more courageously, or rather furiously, and more apt to despise all manner of dangers and fatigues; and yet, in fact, nothing is plainer, than that, if those authors have not exaggerated their accounts, the Gauls could not encounter a worse enemy than wine proved to them, upon all occasions, since, according to them, it seldom failed throwing whole armies of them into disorder and confusion; and, which was still worse, by baiting them with some large quantities of that liquor, it either so overcame them, that they fell down dead-drunk, and exposed, as it were, naked and defenceless, to their enemies, by which means they have been all cut in pieces; or, as it often happened, it set them a fighting one against another, so that they became an easier prey to them. One would, therefore, be apt to think, e that, after they had so oft and severely smarted for their greediness, after that destructive liquor, their kings and generals would have made some wholesome prohibitions against so dangerous a custom: and what may incline us to believe they did so, is, that though the Greek and Roman authors charge the whole Gaulish people, in the lump, with this vice, yet the instances they give are but few, and happened sometimes to one nation, sometimes to another of them (B). However, though this abuse has been somewhat exaggerated, yet we own, that there must have been some foundation for it, since Charles the great was forced to make some severe laws against it; one of which obliged the judges on the bench, and the pleaders, to continue fasting; others, which forbade the forcing of any one to drink more than f he cared for; others, which forbade the soldiers, whilst in the field, to invite any man

(B) Thus, for instance, we are told, that those Gauls who took the city of Rome, and those who ravaged Greece, were mostly cut off in their drunken revels (67). The same fate, we are told, overtook the Goths in Thrace (68); one sort were defeated by whatever to drink, under pain of excommunication, and being condemned to drink a water till they had been sufficiently punished for their fault^b. This vice, it seems, was so universal, that even the Myssians, a kind of monkish tribe among the Scythians, who were obliged to abstain from all flesh, wine, and strong liquors, had yet a way amongst them of intoxicating themselves by the smoak of some odoriferous weeds, something, perhaps, of the nature of our tobacco, which made them exceeding chearful and merry, though without being attended with the ill effects which are commonly caused by excess of wine, &c.^c (C).

Cyrus, in the same manner; and another by the Romans (69). But these are hardly more than single instances, that happened to one tribe or other of them.

Idleness.

THE laziness, imputed likewise to them, appears, by what we have said a little higher, to have been rather owing to their pride, than to any dislike they had to labour, under an honourable title: for it is plain, that in their exercises, as well as b their wars, they accustomed themselves to hardships and fatigues of any kind; so that if they neglected agriculture, and handicraft trades, it was rather because they looked upon them as a kind of slavery unbecoming their martial genius. And it was upon this account that they so readily rushed upon any desperate death, to avoid being taken prisoners, especially by the Romans, who, they knew, were wont to make slaves of them, and condemn them to the hardest and meanest employments. And though, after their conquest, we have seen them take up with a laborious life, cultivate their lands, vineyards, and useful trades; yet the same spirit reigns still among their gentry and nobility, both in Gaul and Germany, where they retain still a contempt for all the laborious and mercantile part, and chuse rather to live in a c shameful sloth, and even poverty, than support themselves, and families, by any other way than that of arms. They even carry this punctilio of honour so far, as to look upon it as dishonourable, to the last degree, for a nobleman, in how low circumstances soever, to marry the daughter of a mechanic, or even merchant, though her fortune was ever so large, and capable of enriching him, and his family.

Ferocity.

As to their last vice, viz. their ferocity and cruelty, there will be the less occasion to wonder at it, if we consider, that they were brought up with a peculiar contempt of death: for how can it be expected they should be tender of other peoples lives, that were so careless, and even lavish of their own? And if slavery appeared d so terrible to them, that they preferred any death to it, might they not deem it a mercy in them, to massacre their prisoners of war, or sacrifice them to their gods, rather than to make slaves of them? But we observed before, that this excessive love of liberty had made them look long ago upon other people, especially upon the Romans, not only with a jealous eye, but inspired them with an invincible hatred against them, and all whom they observed, like them, diligent and successful in enslaving other nations. And this might not add a little to their native fierceness, and to that cruelty with which they thought they ought to treat such open invaders of public liberty, as well as those who basely assisted them in it. This will appear less improbable, if we come now to examine some of those social virtues for which they e were famed, even by the confession of their enemies, such as their hospitality, frugality, justice, and fidelity.

Their virtues, and hospitality.

It will, doubtless, be thought strange that a nation, so cruel to their enemies, and so touchy and fierce among themselves as to have recourse to single combat upon every trifling affront, should yet be so famed for their hospitality and humanity, not only to strangers, but to such as refuged themselves among them; and yet they are highly cried up for this admirable virtue, both by Greek and Roman authors. It was, it seems, a constant custom among them, to invite their strangers to all their feasts, and, after it was over, to inquire who they were, and wherein they might be served^d. This was practised, according to the same author, by the very f Celtiberians, who were looked upon as some of the cruellest among the Gauls, in-

(C) The same, we are told, was practised by the Scythians and Thracians, who had no wine (70). The men and women, it seems, sat round a good fire, into which they threw these weeds: some call it a grain, or seed (71), the smoak of which they sucked up in such large draughts, that, in a little time, it set them all a laughing, dancing, and singing.

a somuch that they came in crouds to invite a traveller to their houses; and happy was he thought whom he chose for his host: if he pitched upon one whose circumstances would not permit him to afford him a very long entertainment, (for they generally treated them very sumptuously) he always took care to turn him over to another that could do it. If any Gaul was convicted of having refused this courtesy to a stranger, he was not only looked upon with abhorrence by all his acquaintance, but fined by the magistrate: witness that law which was enacted among the Burgundians, which laid a fine of three crowns on all such inhospitable delinquents; and one of double that sum to any Burgundian that should direct a stranger to the house of a Roman. In some other places they added a corporal punishment to the fine; b and Tacitus doth that justice even to the German nation, as to give several instances of their tender regard to strangers: and Cæsar adds, that they esteemed all such persons as sacred and inviolable, and to whom every house was to be opened, and every table free^b. They even conducted them from one territory to another, and punished those upon the spot, from whom they had received any damage, or ill treatmentⁱ. They even punished the murder of a stranger more severely than that of one of their own nation, viz. the former by death, and the latter by banishment. As for those who took refuge amongst the Gauls, and a more safe and stedfast sanctuary they could not meet with in any other nation, they were sure to be protected and maintained, according to their rank. Hence that great number of distressed kings, princes, and others, who fled thither preferably to any other country, for refuge and defence, of which we have already had occasion to speak in some former sections of this history; and with what faithfulness they were protected by them; may, out of many more instances, be inferred, from that which we shall give our readers in the margin (D), to avoid dwelling too long upon so known a subject.

THESE instances are no less an argument of their justice and fidelity: the confidence which the emperors, princes, and commonwealths, placed in them, not only in courting their alliance and friendship, and in hiring great numbers of them as auxiliaries, but likewise in the former chusing them for their life-guards, is another proof of it. And if they could be thus faithful to even Roman emperors, such as c Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, Claudius, and others; we need not doubt of their being so to other nations, to whose service they had not such a natural reluctance: though it must be owned, that the Germans gained, in time, a greater degree of confidence in those monarchs than the Gauls had done; and, perhaps, on this very account, that they did not shew such natural aversion to the Roman yoke as the Gauls did, who took all opportunities that offered to shake it off. But before even the time of Augustus, we find the Gauls and Spaniards in great credit and trust with Juba, king of *Mauritania*¹, with Herod, king of Judea^m, with *Cleopatra*ⁿ, and with most princes far and near; an account of which hath been given in every proper place of this work. They have, indeed, been branded with the reverse vice, e by several Greek and Roman historians^o; and it must be owned, that they have sometimes receded from their fidelity, notwithstanding their valuing themselves so much upon it, above all other nations; and we have formerly given several instances of it, though, for want of knowing what motives induced them to it, we have been obliged to condemn them for actions, which, if those authors had rightly informed us of the true springs of, might have passed uncensured. (D) Torism, king of the Gepida, had a noble refuge at his court, named Ildigus, who had a lawful right to the crown of Lombardy, but had been excluded from it, after the death of king Paces, by Aduin, who seized upon it. This last caused Ildigus to be demanded of the Gepida, and procured his demand to be backed by the emperor Justinian's ambassadors. Torism, who had just concluded a peace with the Romans and Lombards, called a council of all his nobles, and acquainted them with Aduin's request, and the danger he was in if he refused. Upon this, that truly august assembly unanimously agreed, that it were better that their whole nation, men, women, and children, should perish, than to give way to such a sacrilegious demand (72).

Even among the ruder Slavonians, who lived on the other side the Elbe, it was permitted to set any man's house on fire, who refused sanctuary to a stranger; and, in such cases, every one strove to punish the violation of hospitality (73).

ginians, nor Romans, were famed for their strict adherence to their treaties, any more than scrupulous about the means of obtaining them: and Cæsar, for instance, has laid the blame on the Gaulish perfidy, which Cato has bravely retorted upon him. And who knows what provocations they may have had, whenever they have departed from their usual fidelity and justice? But not to dwell too long upon uncertainties, we may affirm, that, in the main, they long enjoyed that noble character, however their conquests afterwards, and since them their unmeasurable ambition, have hurried them into the quite opposite extreme.

Frugality.

Of their frugality we have likewise given several instances, such as their contempt of gold and silver, of trades and manufactures, and the like; the antient plainness of their diet, dress, houses, &c. Their cloathing was a kind of vest and breeches, light and neat; they wore their hair long, had a collar about their neck, and bracelets about their wrists, and above the elbow. Those who were raised to dignities, wore them of gold, the rest of brass. The druids were always cloathed in white when they officiated, and the freemen, on all public occasions, appeared with their arms. We know little of their marriages, except that they do not seem to have allowed polygamy, and that they had power of life and death over their wives: at least this last plainly appears, from a passage of Pomponius Mela, who, being a Spaniard, must understand the Gaulish laws and customs better than any Greek or Roman author that has written of them. We shall give the substance of it in the margin; first, because it contains some curious particulars about the Gaulish funerals, with which we shall close this section: and, secondly, because the author doth therein clear that nation from having entertained the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls, which other writers have absurdly charged them with, and which we promised, in a former section, to disprove (E). Their burning of the dead bodies, we have seen, in a former section, by those urns which contained their bones and ashes, with some other trinkets which they mingled with them, of more or less value, according, as may be supposed, to the condition of the deceased; but that they likewise buried without burning, may be also gathered from those intire bodies which have been found, especially in the mounds of Salisbury plain, of which we have given an account: for as the Gauls received their religious laws and customs from the British druids, we make no doubt they exactly agreed in them, in both countries.

S E C T. V.

The history of the antient Gauls, from the Roman invasion, and their conquest by Julius Cæsar, to the irruption of the Franks.

WE shall have the less room to enlarge upon this subject, first, because we have little or no account of this nation before they were visited by the Romans, but what we have given an account of in some part or other of this chapter: and,

(E) Among other tenets which the druids hold, says that author (74), there is one, which they endeavour to inculcate into every Gaul, in order to inspire them with greater bravery; namely, that of the immortality of the soul, and a future life. Accordingly, says he, when they burn the bodies of their dead, and bury their ashes, they bury, likewise, with them, their books of accounts, and the notes of hand of the moneys they had lent whilst alive, that they may be of service to them in the other world. Sometimes, likewise, their near relations and friends have flung themselves into the funeral pile, to go and live with them there. Hath this doctrine of a future life any thing in common with the Pythagorean transmigration? Could these account-books, receipts, and notes, be of any service to souls which pass into other bodies, either of men, or brutes? Can those, who affirm it, imagine that souls, thus transmigrated, into whatever body it be, could be still the same persons whom those accounts concerned? And would those friends have been such fools, as to chuse to die with them, for the sake of living with them hereafter, had they had the least notion of such a transmigration? How could they ever expect that happiness, if they really believed that, upon their going out of this world, their souls were to enter into fresh bodies, of either men, women, brutes, or vegetables, the one, perhaps, in

- a and, secondly, because what happened to them from that time to the irruption of the Franks, has been fully spoken of in the Roman history. However, that we may not leave this part too imperfect and short, for the sake of avoiding repetitions, and that we may save our readers the trouble of collecting the particulars of it out of our former volumes, by having recourse to every index, we shall give them here a summary of them in one view, and in as succinct a method as we can, with proper references in the margin, of the places where those facts have been more fully discussed, and add to it an account of such other transactions as have not yet, or have been but slightly touched upon. All which we shall endeavour to couch, as well as it can be done, in a chronological order, and near as we can to its epocha, according to such of our chronologers as may be best depended upon: we shall only add here, that the Gauls, being a strong and hardy people, and multiplying so fast, that their country could not contain them, was one constant cause of their excursions into other countries far and near, and in such vast multitudes, that they spread terror where-ever they came. It often happened, likewise, that these colonies, thus settled in a foreign country, were so molested by their neighbours, that, to prevent their being dispossessed, they sent into their native country for fresh assistance, and easily obtained it, the Gauls being always ready to pour out their numerous swarms, upon all such occasions, to prevent any of their old colonies being driven back unto them. Hence their vast multitudes, their known valour, natural fierceness, and cruelty to those who fell into their hands, joined to an unavoidable necessity, upon all such expeditions, either to conquer or starve, added not a little to the dread of their name. We shall pass by those which they antiently made out of Europe into several parts of Asia, where they settled themselves in several fine countries, and under different names, and for which we shall refer our readers to the Celtic history in a former volume^a.

THEIR earliest, and most considerable sally we have recorded, is that which they made into Italy, under their famous leader Bellovesus (A), who, crossing the Rhose, and the Alps, settled himself in that part of Italy called Piedmont and Lombardy, then inhabited by the Hetrurians, about the year of Rome 160^b.

- d THE Canomani, who dwelt between the rivers Seine and Loire, made the second grand expedition under their general Elitonis, and settled in the Bresciano, Cremonese, Mantuan, Carniola, and Venetian^c; the time of this and the next is uncertain.

THE third was made by the Læves and Ananes, the former of whom settled in Novara, on one side of the Po; and the latter in Piacentia, on the opposite side.

In a fourth, the Boii and Lingones, having passed the Pennine Alps, settled on the south side of the Po, between Ravenna and Bologna.

- e IN the fifth, which happened about two hundred years after that of Bellovesus, the Senones, seated between Paris and Meaux, were invited into Italy by an Hetrurian lord, and settled themselves in Umbria. Brennus, who was their king, had laid siege to Clusium, and here it was that he gave that noble answer to the three Fabii, who were sent from Rome to expostulate with him, of which we have had occasion to take notice in a former section. We have seen, in the volume last quoted^d, that the treachery of the Fabii, in entering and defending that city, and of the Romans in countenancing, instead of punishing it, did so exasperate the Gaulish general, that, raising the siege of the place, he immediately turned all his force against the latter, and, having defeated them, marched directly to Rome, whose inhabitants were struck with such terror at his approach, that they abandoned it to his mercy. When Brennus entered the place, which appeared to him like a very desert, he secured all the avenues round the capitol, and then gave up that metropolis to be plundered one corner of the world, and the other in another? What likelihood is there, that the Gauls, so jealous of their liberty as they were, would, by thus rushing into immediate death, run the risque of passing into the bodies, I won't say of either plants or beasts, but even into those of slaves, or even of women, over whom they had the power of life and death?

(A) Ambigatus, then king of Celtogallia, finding his kingdom overstocked, sent his two nephews, Bellovesus and Segovesus, each at the head of a numerous army, to go and seek some new settlements. The first crossed the Alps, and the latter the Rhine and Hercynian forest, and settled in that part of Germany since then called Boemia, and Bohemia, from the Boii, who accompanied him in that expedition (1), as shall be further shewn in the next chapter.

by his men, who presently after reduced it to ashes, and all its stately temples and palaces into an heap of rubbish. Finding the capitol too strong for him, he turned the siege of it into a blockade, and marched against Ardea, where he was easily defeated by Camillus, who had been a refugee there about two years: for the Gauls were, by this time, so intoxicated with their success at Rome, and with the wine of that country, that they kept neither order nor discipline; so that Camillus, at the head of the Ardeates, made a terrible slaughter of them. His next attempt was, to surprise the capitol, and would, in all likelihood, have succeeded in it, had not the noise of some geese awaked the brave Manlius, who sounded the alarm, and gave them such a fierce repulse, that most of the Gauls flung themselves headlong down the steep rock, and lost their lives. However, the besieged in the capitol were reduced to such straits on the one hand, and the Gauls on the other, who were themselves besieged in the city by Camillus, now chosen dictator, that the senate thought fit to send Sulpitius, a tribune, to treat with Brennus; and between these it was agreed, that the Romans should pay him a thousand pounds weight of gold, and he depart out of the Roman territories. But when the money came to be paid, and Brennus had brought false weights with him, Camillus ordered the gold to be carried back, and told the Gaul, that Rome should be ransomed by the sword, and not with money. He proved as good as his word; for a dreadful contest ensuing upon it, between the two armies, the Gauls were so disheartened on the sudden, that they made a running fight of it; but being pursued by the dictator, were all cut off, it seems, to one man, not one of them being left to carry the news into their own country^c.

THE next expedition was still more unfortunate; for those Gauls who had settled themselves in those parts of Italy we have lately spoken of, led but an uneasy life there, being continually harrassed by the Romans; upon which, they sent into Gaul for fresh reinforcements; but these came in such vast numbers to their assistance, that they became more dreadful to them than the Romans: so that they made no scruple to turn their arms against them, and, having killed their two leaders, easily put the whole army to flight. The Romans, however, were in no small dread of them, when they found how active they were in Italy, and what vast armies they could draw out of Gaul; and it was to dissipate that fear, that they perpetrated that horrid piece of superstition at Rome which we formerly mentioned, of burying a Greek and a Gaulish man and woman alive in the ox-market. But they did not trust to this so far as not to make vast preparations, when they heard that the Gafatz, another brave Gaulish nation, were invited, by their Italian countrymen, to their assistance. These were of a fiercer nature than any of the rest; they scorned all kind of defensive armour as mean and cowardly, and generally chose to fight naked. Had but their martial skill been as great as their courage^(B), it is likely they might, at that juncture, have disabled the Romans from ever conquering any more nations: for their approach had spread such a terror all over the Roman territories, that they raised one of the vastest armies that ever had been known amongst them. If we may believe Polybius^f, it consisted of no less than 800000 men, horse and foot. The Gauls, however, nothing terrified at it, though they had but 50000 foot, and 2000 horse, forced their way through them, and entered their territories; but being as inferior to them in military discipline, as they were in number, they met with a total defeat: 40000 of them were killed on the spot, and 10000 taken prisoners, and amongst them Concolitanus, one of their kings; whilst the other, named Aneroestus, and by far the most experienced warrior, only escaped to a neigh-

(B) We have purposely omitted several other defeats which they met with in some other expeditions, and which the reader will find in the places of the Roman history quoted in the margin (2); where he will find, that the Romans were by that time so well apprised of their superiority to them in this point, that they generally trusted to it, and with good success, since it appears, by all these instances, that it was by that that they gave them such frequent and surprising defeats.

They fought much after the same undisciplined manner, in single combat; witness that gigantic Gaul, who, by his golden collar, seems to have been one of their generals, and, Goliath like, challenged any of the Romans to fight with him, and was, like him, overcome by a brave stripling (3). For the Gaul, trusting to his superior strength, began the fight by discharging a great blow on his antagonist, whilst the dexterous youth, rushing under his shield, stabbed him to death with his sword (4).

a bouring village, and there killed himself, as did most of the officers who followed him, according to the Gaulish maxim, of preferring death to slavery.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these successes, the Romans had no small reason to fear, that the Gauls would, at length, be made sensible, by their frequent defeats, of their own want of martial discipline and policy, and by their example, and that of other nations, become, in time, as expert soldiers as they (C); in which case, they could not but become a very formidable enemy to their nation, considering their hatred to it, their hardiness, intrepidity, and readiness to join every foe against them. The assistance they gave Hannibal, as he was crossing their country, and over the Alps, of which we have given an account elsewhere^b; and, after him, to Mago, and the Carthaginians, during their war^c; their being so frequently hired as auxiliaries, by other states and kingdoms, most of them at war with Rome, and among which they were sure to perfect themselves more and more in the martial trade, whilst they themselves could not venture to take them into their pay without manifest danger (D); these considerations obliged them, at last, to retaliate upon them, and invade their country, upon the first favourable opportunity, and before they were become too expert in the art of war for them: but before we come to speak of this, it will be necessary to say something of their other expeditions and exploits, in Asia, Macedonia, and other countries.

THE first of this kind was in the year after Pyrrhus passed into Italy^k, when the Gauls, finding themselves again overstocked at home, sent out three vast colonies to seek new habitations: Brennus (perhaps a descendent of him who had some two centuries before made that dreadful irruption into Italy we have lately mentioned) was the chief adviser of this expedition, and head of one of the Gaulish armies; Cerethrius commanded the second, and marched into Thrace; and the third, under the command of Belgius, marched into Illyricum and Macedonia: as for Brennus, he was entered into Pannonia, or Hungary, a poor country in comparison to those which Belgius had invaded, and wherein he had enriched himself with immense plunder; so that envying his success, he resolved to join him, and share it with him. Belgius being soon after defeated to such a degree that we hear no more of him, or his men, he hastened thither, under pretence of revenging and assisting him; and it is not improbable, that the remainder of Belgius's army lifted themselves under him: The army with which he entered into those two provinces, consisted of 150000 foot, and 15000 horse; but a revolt happened in it, in which Leonorius and Lutarius, the two chief leaders of it, carried off 20000 men, and marched into Thrace, and, joining themselves to Cerethrius, seized on Byzantium, and the western coasts of Propontis, and there settled, and made the adjacent parts tributary to them.

To retrieve this loss, Brennus sent for fresh supplies from Gallia, enlisted some Illyrians, and, with a new army of 150000 foot, and above 60000 horse, entered Macedonia, defeated Sosthenes, and ravaged the whole country. He next marched towards the streights of Thermopylae, with an intent to invade Greece, but was stopped by the forces which were sent to defend that pass against him. This obliged

(C) We are told (5), that their very weapons, especially their swords, were so wretchedly tempered, that, upon the very first onset, in which they constantly charged with incredible fury, they used either to break, bend, or be so blunted, against the Roman javelins, as to become useless; so that before they could have time to sharpen or straiten them, the enemy presently closed in upon them, and, throwing by the javelin, and shortening their swords upon them, stabbed them, like so many sheep.

(D) They gave a dreadful instance of it from the beginning, when Scipio, after the defeat which the Carthaginians had given him, on the banks of the Ticinus, retired to Placentia, to cure his own, and his soldiers wounds: for here about 2000 foot, and 200 horse, of those Gauls which the consul had in his pay, upon some discontent, rose up in the dead of the night, and, whilst the Romans were asleep, entered their camp, slew a great number of them, cut off their heads, and carried them to Hannibal, who gave them a kind reception, and invited them, with vast promises, into his service.

This treachery so disheartened the consul, that, fearing lest the rest of their countrymen, that were left in his army, should follow their example, and make the mischief still greater, he wisely chose to give them the slip, and lead his own troops to a place of more safety. The Carthaginians, finding the Roman camp cleared, plundered and set it on fire, whilst the Gauls flocked, in great numbers, to their general, and lifted in his service (6); an action, one would think, sufficient to deter the Romans from ever trusting a Gaul again.

him to get him some guides over those mountains, over which Xerxes had passed his forces a before; upon which, the guards retired, to avoid being surrounded by him. He then ordered Acichorius, the next to him in this expedition, to follow him at a distance with part of the army, and with the bulk of it marched strait towards Delphos, with a design, as is supposed, to plunder that rich city and temple; but met, it seems, with a terrible repulse, from a violent storm of thunder, lightning, and hail, which destroyed a great number of his men; and from a dreadful earthquake, which overwhelmed another part of his army: so that the remainder, being seized with a panic fury, fell upon, and murdered each other, all that night. The next morning they found their mistake, and near one half of their army destroyed, and the Greek forces pouring in upon them from all parts, and in such numbers, b that though Acichorius joined him in the nick of time, yet were they not able to make head against the Greeks, but were defeated, with a terrible slaughter. Brennus himself was desperately wounded, and so disheartened at his miscarriage, that he assembled all his chiefs, and having advised them to slay all that were wounded and disabled, and to make as good a retreat as they could, he put an end to his life. Acichorius, immediately after, led the remainder of this shattered army back, as well as he could; but their long marches through enemies countries, the oppositions and hardships they met with from them, and the grievous calamities which accompanied them, did, it seems, so thoroughly exhaust them, that not one of them returned from that expedition m: a just judgment, indeed, upon them, if they really went c with that sacrilegious design which is charged upon them by the Greek and Roman authors, and in which we make no doubt but they have as much exaggerated their punishment in their above-mentioned defeat, as they have their guilt, as the reader may see, by what is added in the margin (E).

defeat, and end.

WHILST this expedition was carrying on in Greece, the other colonies under Leonorius, parting from the others who were settled in the Propontis, marched into the Hellepont, and made themselves masters of Lyfimachia, and the Thracian Chersonesus. Here some great misunderstanding happening between those two chiefs, they parted their forces; the former returned to Byzantium, and the latter stayed where he was. They did, however, rejoin their forces some time after, and passed into Asia, being d invited thither by Nicomedes, whom they assisted against his brother, and fixed him in all his father's dominions; in acknowledgment of which, he assigned them that

(E) We promised, in a former section, to explode the virulent charge which Cicero lays against the Gauls, and their religion, founded chiefly on this action of their plundering the Delphic temple, and that of their believing the capitol, and, as he adds, (to aggravate it the more) the great Jupiter in it; from which he infers, that their religion consisted only in a diametrical opposition to all others, and in waging war against the gods of other nations, &c. and that the Gauls were a most irreligious, wicked, and dangerous people, not fit to live; and much more to that purpose.

Now if it be true, that the Gauls, before their conquest, did worship the one Supreme Being, and, like the Perfes, Brachmans, and other ancient nations and philosophers, thought it an indignity to confine him in temples, or represent him by idols of any kind, as we have formerly shewed they did, then will their destroying those temples and idols, or even plundering them of their treasures, if they had really done so by this of Delphos, stand justified, and rather deserve commendation, than such a black reproof. The plunder of such superstitious treasures, to men of these principles, and for the support of a numerous army that stands in need of it, will be justly deemed applying them to a better use.

But it plainly appears, from the majority of those authors quoted above, that they did not plunder the Delphic oracle, but that they were scared from it by a storm and earthquake, which threw them into such a panic, as made them be easily overcome by those Greek forces, which came, with great fury, to defend their country and oracle against them; upon which it is supposed, that all these disasters befel them as a just judgment for their sacrilegious design against that temple and treasure: but this last is at best but a surmise, founded on a wrong, though common notion, that such disasters always argued some atrocious crimes in the sufferers: all which is here dressed up, by authors who were professed enemies to the Gaulish nation, and have, doubtless, exaggerated both at their pleasure, though without any real foundation.

Justin, and after him Cicero, indeed, accuse them of having plundered the Delphic treasure; and the last adds, that they carried it home too; but being grievously plagued for their sacrilege, they were advised to throw their ill-got pelt into the lake of Tholouse. This, though plainly opposite to all those authors who have written of that expedition, seems to us only an invidious improvement on the account they have given of it, in order to bring a scandal on that vast treasure which was consecrated and reposit in that lake, and which Strabo and Athenæus, on the authority of Posidonius, tell us was (so far from being fetched from Delphos) dug up out of some rich mines in that neighbourhood, as we have already had occasion to observe in the last section. If any thing, therefore, could be objected, with any seeming justice, against the Gauls, it was their sending such powerful colonies to invade other nations; but neither Greeks nor Romans could have any pretence to find fault with that which was their own practice, as well as that of all other nations.

a part of Lesser Asia which we described at the beginning of this chapter, and which was, from them, called Galiogracia, and Galatia. Thither came, also, a great number of those other Gauls who had settled in Thrace, and who were driven from thence by Antigonus Gonatus, who had seized the kingdom of Macedon upon the death of Sophanes. A greater number of them dispersed themselves about in other countries, and either perished, or so intermingled themselves, as not to be heard of any more; so that of this great and threatening Gaulish army, none remained but those who settled in Galatia^a. These, likewise, in time, increasing in number, and being streightened in their territories, endeavoured, according to custom, to enlarge them where they could, and to send their colonies and auxiliary armies abroad (F), which b did not a little annoy and alarm all their neighbours; but they were at length suppressed by the proconsul of Asia, Corn. Manlius Vulso, who gave them several defeats, and obliged them to live quietly, and keep within their old limits^c. They are, however, affirmed by some authors to have been subdued about fifty-three years before, by Attalus, king of Pergamos^d; and if so, they must have found out some means of recovering their liberty, to have been so powerful in Manlius's time; unless we suppose these authors to have confounded the Gauls with the Galatians. However that be, these last were still, above 130 years after, governed by their own tetrarchs, one of whom, named Deiotarus, was, for his services done to Pompey the great, created king by him (G), and had the Lesser Armenia, and some other territories, added to his own^e. Thus much may suffice for the Gaulish expeditions abroad. It is time now to return to those at home, and to give an account of their conquest by the Romans.

We hinted a little higher, that the Romans were grown so fearful of the Gauls, that they thought it proper, in order to humble them, to lead their armies into their country. After many attempts, not worth mentioning, the person that opened the most effectual way into Gaul was the great consul Q. Marcius, surnamed Rex, to whose lot this province was fallen, as well as the supreme power, by the death of his colleague in Numidia. Marcius, the better to carry on his design, opened a way between the Alps and the Pyrenees, a work of immense labour, in which he was d stoutly opposed by the Gauls, especially the Stanni, who lived at the foot of the Alps^f, and who, finding themselves overpowered by him, set fire to their houses, killed their wives and children, and threw them and themselves into the flames. Marcius, having accomplished his work, planted a colony, for the security of it, in the country of the Volsce Tectosagi, between the Pyrenees and the city of Tbolouse; and built a city in it, and called it Narbo Marcius, since Narbonne, which became the capital of that province. The reduction of such a considerable part of Gaul, and the opening and securing such a way between the Alps and Pyrenees, as it laid the foundation for the conquest of the whole country, was thought so considerable a service to Rome, that the senate ordered him a triumph for it^g. His successor, e Scaurus, not only conquered some other nations of the Gauls, as the Gentisci and

(F) Justin tells us, that all Asia swarmed with them, and that there was hardly an eastern prince at war that did not hire them as mercenaries (7). This was, in particular, the case of Antiochus Hierax, in his war against Seleucus, whom he defeated at Ancyra (8), by the help of the Gaulish auxiliaries. But his victory had like to have cost him dear: for these, having heard a rumour, that Seleucus had been slain, formed, it seems, a project to murder him, and seize upon his kingdom; so that he found no better way of saving himself, than by giving them all the treasure he had (9).

The scene of war between the two contending brothers being at length removed to Mesopotamia, it is not improbable, that the battle of Babylonia happened between the Babylonish Jews and the Gauls, in which 8000 of the former defeated and killed 120000 of the latter (10): for Babylon was then a province of Mesopotamia, and Antiochus, then in confederacy with the Gauls, who were then very numerous there, and all over Asia, as we mentioned out of Justin, was totally defeated by Seleucus (11). But whether these were the Galatians of Asia minor, or troops sent out of Gaul, is not easy to guess, from either Justin, or the book of Maccabees, as we hinted at the beginning of this chapter.

(G) This is the same Deiotarus that soon after dispossessed the other three tetrarchs, and seized upon all Galatia. For this he was summoned before Julius Caesar, upon which occasion Cicero made a speech in his behalf, which is still extant, under the name of Oratio pro rege Deiotaro.

Carni (H), but, to facilitate the sending of troops from Italy thither, he made a some excellent roads between them, which before were almost impassable[†], and was likewise honoured with a triumph.

IN the mean time, the Cimbri and Teutones, taking the alarm at these successes, took up arms against them, and gave them several considerable overthrows; in one of which the Tigurini (I), having surprised them, made them, and their general Popilius, pass under the yoke[‡]. The Cimbri, in particular, had retaken some parts of Gaul from the Romans, and, in particular, the famed city of Tholouse; upon which, Cepio marching his army to retake it, it opened its gates to him; notwithstanding which, he not only gave it up to be plundered by them, but carried off all that vast treasure that had been consecrated there by the Gauls, and of which we have b lately given an account, to the amount of 100000 pounds weight of gold, and the same of silver, even according to the most moderate accounts of it; and, in spite of his treachery, avarice, and sacrilege, was continued proconsul of the Narbonnese Gaul. This vile action so exasperated the Gauls, that they joined with the Cimbri, and, taking the advantage of the squabble that was between the general and his colleague Manlius, they fell upon them so furiously, that they gave them such an overthrow as they had scarcely ever met with, killed 80000 men, besides 40000 servants and sutlers, in one day; only ten men, of their whole army, escaped with the two generals, and among the former the brave Sestorius, who saved himself by swimming over the Rhine. The Gauls, who, according to custom on such occasions, c had devoted all the spoil, threw all the silver and gold into the Rhofne, drowned all the horses, and murdered all the prisoners they had taken. What consternation this loss threw the city of Rome into, and what punishment was inflicted on the sacrilegious Cepio, we have elsewhere shewn[¶]. As to the victorious allies, they held a general council, whether to march immediately into Italy, or reduce those provinces which the Romans held in Gaul: they agreed, however, to consult the brave Æmilius Scaurus, whom they had taken prisoner in a preceding action, and who, Roman like, strove to deter them from invading the territories of that republic, but was, for his bold speech, stabbed to death by Boiorix, king of the Cimbri.

THE Roman senate, expecting nothing less than a fresh irruption of the Gauls and d Cimbri, thought fit to recal Marius from his successful expedition against Jugurtha; and, having honoured him with a triumph for it, appointed him general against the enemy, and Sylla to serve under him. They both set out accordingly, and Sylla gained several advantages against the Tedofagi, and took Copillus, one of their kings, prisoner, whilst Marius resolved not to engage such a numerous army as appeared against him, till he had received sufficient reinforcements to his own. In the mean time, the Marfi, another people of Germany, had joined the Cimbri, with a design to enter Italy with them, and Sylla was sent to oppose them; but he, instead of engaging them, found means to gain the former over to the Roman interest. The Cimbri, enraged at this, ceased not to infect the Roman general till they forced him to e remove to Aquæ Sextiæ, now Aix in Provence, and in his way was briskly attacked by the brave Ambrons, now the canton of Bern, to whose valour had been chiefly owing the dreadful blow they gave Cepio and his colleague. They fought with the utmost fury and intrepidity, indeed, but wanted discipline; so that, not being able to stand the shock of such regular troops as they engaged, so dreadful a slaughter was made of them, that the next river ran stained with their blood. Here the Ambronian women did likewise signalize themselves, ran with their axes against the pursuing Romans, and made a stout opposition. But being at length overpowered, and offering to surrender upon honourable conditions, which were denied them by the enemy (K), they murdered all their children, and themselves; so that not one of f them was found alive[‡].

(H) These inhabited part of Noricum, and the name of the latter is still retained in the province of Carniola.

(I) The two former are only different names for the Germans, as we shall see in the next chapter; as to the Tigurini, they inhabited that part of Switzerland called Zurich.

(K) These conditions were, as we hinted in a former section, that their honour should be preserved; that they should not be sold into slavery; and that they should be employed in the service of the vestals. These conditions being denied, they would have contented themselves with the first; but that being inhumanly refused, their love of chastity made them prefer a AFTER this defeat, the Gauls seem to have been quiet for some time, whether too much suppressed by the Romans, or that they left it to the Germans to harass them, as they in fact did, and gave the consul much trouble, though to very little effect, they being constantly overcome, as often as they engaged him; but he met, soon after, with a more dreadful enemy in Sylla, and Rome was so rent, and in such consternation, on account of those two factions, as we have seen in the Roman history, that they rather sought the friendship of the Gauls, than their reduction. But Sylla found means, by his address, to draw them to his side. Hence it is likely, that he suffered them to live in peace during the whole time of his dictatorship; for we hear nothing relating to them during that time, nor for some space after his death, though the scene of war was by this time removed into Spain and Portugal by Sertorius, and where he had very great success against Pompey, who was sent against him. This war was no sooner ended there, than a new one began in the heart of Italy under Spartacus, who was at the head of an army consisting chiefly of Gaulish slaves, and whom he designed, after some notable successes against the two consuls, to have led back over the Alps into their own country. But this they stily refused, and were soon after totally defeated by Crassus, who was sent against them, and Spartacus himself slain, after having fought with incredible bravery, and sacrificed heaps of Romans round about him: 40000 of the Gauls were killed on the spot, the rest fled into Lusitania, where they were soon after cut off by Pompey. Whether the Transalpine Gauls had any hand in this rebellion, doth not appear. In that famed conspiracy of Catiline they were indeed invited into it by some of his partisans, in hopes of drawing some considerable helps from thence; but the embassadors of the Allobroges (L), then at Rome, who had been also tampered with, made such a full discovery of the whole design to their protector Q. Fab. Sanga, and he to the consuls, that it was happily prevented and disconcerted.

FROM all this it seems as if the Gauls had lived all this long while in quiet and good friendship with Rome, whatever feuds there might be among them in the heart of their country: the Helvetii were they which kindled that fresh war which brought Cæsar over the Alps, and ended in the conquest of that brave and warlike nation. Orgetorix was the first cause of it, who, whether through want of room, or a desire to exchange his inclement country for a better, or for some other cause not mentioned by any writer, had engaged a vast number of his countrymen to burn their towns and villages, and to go in search of new conquests. Julius Cæsar, to whose lot the whole country of Gaul was fallen, made such haste to come and suppress them, that he was got to the Rhofne in eight days, broke down the bridge of Geneva, and, in a few days more, finished the famed wall between that city and mount Jura, now St. Claude, which extended seventeen miles in length, was sixteen feet high, fortified with towers and castles at proper distances, and a ditch that ran the whole length of it (M). Whilst this was doing, and the reinforcements he wanted were coming, he amused the Helvetii, who had sent to demand a passage through the country of the Allobroges, till he had got his reinforcements, and then flatly refused it to them; whereupon a dreadful battle ensued, in which they lost 130000 men, in spite of all their valour, besides a number of prisoners, among whom was the wife and daughter of Orgetorix, the leader of this unfortunate expedition; the rest submitted, and begged they might be permitted to go and settle among the Edui, from whom they originally sprung; and, at the request of these last, were permitted to go (N). This action and victory, joined to the policy and prefer such an honourable death, as could not but cast a more shameful brand on those who styled them barbarians, and yet used such brave matrons in so inhuman a manner (12).

(N) The Edui were situate between the rivers Seine, Loire, and Saone, and were the only allies Cæsar then had. Theirs being a fruitful country, they had and incredible dispatch with which Cæsar had carried it against them, gained him a such reputation, and, at the same time, struck the Gauls with such a dread, that they strove who should pay him the first homage and congratulations, and procure his friendship. So that we may look upon it as the basis of all his glory and conquests in this country.

We formerly took notice of the sad divided state he found them in at his first coming amongst them, their vast variety of governments, their jealousy over each other, the overgrown power of some, and the reduction of others into a state of dependence next to slavery: Cæsar, who knew best how to make the most of these intestine broils, soon became the protector of the oppressed, a terror to the oppressor, and the umpire of all their contentions. Among those who applied to him for help, were his allies the Ædui, against whom Ariovistus, king of the Germans, joined with the Arverni (O), in their late wars, had taken the country of the Sequani from them, and obliged them to send hostages to him. Cæsar forthwith sent to demand the restitution of both, and, in an interview which he soon after obtained of that haughty and treacherous prince, was like to have fallen a sacrifice to his perfidy; upon which, he bent his whole power against him, forced him, against his will (P), out of his strong intrenchments, and gave him a total overthrow. Ariovistus escaped, with difficulty, over the Rhine; but his two wives, and a daughter, with a great number of Germans of distinction, fell into the conqueror's hand. Cæsar, after this signal victory, put his army into winter-quarters, whilst he went over the Alps to make the necessary preparations for the next campaign. By this time all the Belgæ in general were so terrified at his success, that they entered into a confederacy against the Romans, as their common enemy, of which Labienus, who had been left in Gaul, sent him word; upon which, he immediately left Rome, and made such dispatch, that he arrived upon their confines in about fifteen days. Upon his arrival, the Rhemi submitted to him, but the rest appointing Galba, king of the Suessones, general of all their forces, which amounted to 150000 men, marched directly against him. Cæsar, who had seized on the bridge of the Axona, now Aisne, led his light horse and infantry over it, and, whilst the others were incumbered in crossing that river, made such a terrible slaughter of them, that the river was filled with their dead, insomuch that their bodies served for a bridge to those who escaped. This new victory struck such terror into the rest, that they dispersed themselves; immediately after which, the Suessones, Bellovaci, Ambiones, and some others, submitted to him. The Nervii, indeed, joined with the Atrebates and Veromandui, against him, and, having first secured their wives and children, made a stout resistance for some time, but were, at length, defeated, and the greatest part of them slain; the rest, with their wives and old men, surrendered themselves, and were allowed to live in their own cities and towns, as formerly. The Aduatici were next subdued, and, for their treachery to the conqueror (Q), were sold for slaves, to the number promised to supply him with corn, but made so many delays, that he began to suspect their fidelity, and to find himself in great distress for want of it. Divitiacus, one of the lords of it, was then in his army, with Liscus, one of their magistrates: Cæsar examined them both about it separately, and the latter told him, that Dumnorix the younger, brother of Divitiacus, designing to seize upon the supreme power, had allied with the Helvetii, and sent that corn to them which should have been conveyed to him. Divitiacus confirmed what Liscus had said, but without naming his brother; and when Cæsar would have punished him for his perfidy, generously interceded for him, and obtained his pardon (14).

(O) The Arverni were seated on the Loire, and were so called from their metropolis, Arvernum, now Clermont, the capital of the Guiennois. They were once the most powerful people of the Gauls, their territories are said to have reached from the ocean to the Rhine, on one side, and the Pyrenæes on the other (15).

The Sequani were neighbours to the Ædui, and inhabited that part of Gallia Belgica called Upper Burgundy, now Franche Comté.

(P) Cæsar, who lost no advantage he could get on an enemy, had intelligence that some German prophetesses, and such were in high esteem among them, had foretold, that they could not be victorious till after the new moon; or rather, he knew that was a superstitious notion common among them, and all the Gauls; and this it was made him so eager, and Ariovistus so averse, to come to blows before that time.

(Q) These were the remains of those Cimbri whom Marius had defeated in Italy, and had been left on the banks of the Rhine to guard the baggage. They made a sham submission to Cæsar, and surrendered their arms to him, but had concealed a third part of them, with which they fell foul on the Romans in the night: upon which, he broke down the gates of their city, put many of them to the sword, and sold the rest for slaves (16).

a of 50000. Young Craſſus, the ſon of the triumvir, ſubdued likewiſe ſeven other nations, and took poſſeſſion of their cities; which not only completed the conqueſt of the Belgæ, but brought ſeveral nations from beyond the Rhine to ſubmit to the conqueror. The Veneti, or ancient inhabitants of Vannes in Britany, who had been likewiſe obliged to ſend hoſtages to the conqueror, were, in the mean time, making great preparations, by ſea and land, to recover their liberty. Cæſar, then in Illyricum, was forced to equip a fleet on the Loire, and, having given the command of it to Brutus, he went and defeated them by land, as Brutus did by ſea; and, having put their chief men to death, ſold the reſt for ſlaves. The Unelli, with Veridorix, their chief, together with the Lexovii, and Aulercei, were, about the ſame time, ſub-
b dued by Sabinus, and the Aquitani by Craſſus, with the loſs of 30000 men. There remained nothing but the countries of the Morini and Menapii (R) to be conquered, of all Gaul. Cæſar marched himſelf againſt them, but found them ſo well intrenched in their inacceſſible fortreſſes, that he contented himſelf with burning and ravaging their country; and, having put his troops into winter-quarters, paſſed again over the Alps, to give a more watchful eye over ſome of his rivals there^d; but he was ſoon after obliged to come and defend his Gauliſh conqueſts againſt ſome nations of the Germans, who were coming to ſettle there, to the number of 400000, and whom he totally defeated, and then reſolved to carry his conquering arms into Germany. As this laid the foundation for that bloody war which he afterwards carried c againſt them, it will be more properly ſeen in the ſubſequent chapters, as well as his ſeveral expeditions into this iſle in that which immediately follows, and to which we ſhall refer our readers.

UPON his return into Gaul, he found it labouring under a great famine, which had cauſed a kind of univerſal revolt. Cotta and Sabinus, who were left in the country of the Eburones, now Liege, were betrayed into an ambuſh by Ambiorix, one of their chiefs, and had moſt of their men cut off. The Aduatici were fallen upon Q. Cicero, who was left there with one legion, and had reduced him to great ſtreights: at the ſame time Labiennus, with his legion, was attacked by Indutiomarus, at the head of the Rhemi and Senones; but had better luck than the reſt, and, by d one bold ſally upon them, put them to flight, and killed their general. Cæſar acquired no ſmall credit by quelling all theſe revolts, but each victory loſt the lives of ſo many of his troops, that he was forced to have recourſe to Pompey for a freſh ſupply, who readily granted him two of his own legions to ſecure his Gauliſh conqueſts^e.

BUT it was not long before they, ever reſtleſs under a foreign yoke, raiſed up a new revolt, and obliged him to return thither. His fear left Pompey ſhould gain the affections of the Roman people, had obliged him to ſtrip the Gauls of their gold and ſilver, to bribe them over to his intereſt: and this gave no ſmall handle to theſe frequent revolts which happened during his abſence. He did, however, ſoon
e reduce the Nervii, Aduatici, Menapii, and Treviri, the laſt of which had raiſed the revolt, under the command of Ambiorix; but he ſoon found the flame ſpread much farther, even to the greateſt part of the Gauls, who had choſen the brave Vercingetorix their generaliſſimo. Cæſar was forced to leave Inſubria, whither he had retired to watch the motions of Pompey, and, in the miſt of winter and ſnow, repaſs the Alps, into the province of Narbonne, where he gathered all his ſcattered troops with all poſſible ſpeed, and, in ſpite of the hard weather, beſieged and took Noviodunum, now Noyons; and defeated Vercingetorix, who was come to the relief of that place. He next took the city of Avaricum, now Bourges, one of the ſtrongeſt in Gaul, and which had a gariſon of 40000 men, of whom he made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter, f that hardly 800 eſcaped. Whiſt he was beſieging Gergovia, the capital of the Arverni, he was informed that the Nitiobriges, or Agenois, were in arms and that the Ædui were ſending to Vercingetorix 10000 men, which they were to have ſent to reinforce him. Upon this news, he left Fabius to carry on the ſiege, and marched againſt the Ædui. Theſe, upon his approach, ſubmitted, in appearance, and were pardoned; but ſoon after that whole nation roſe up in arms, and murdered all the Italian troops in their capital. Cæsar, at this, was in great straits what measures ^a to take, but resolved, at length, to raise the siege of Gergovia, and at once attack the enemy's camp, which he did with some success; but when he thought to have gone to Noviodunum, or Noyons, where his baggage, military chest, &c. were left, he heard that the Ædui had carried it off, and burnt the place. Labienus, justly thinking that Cæsar would want his assistance in the condition he now was, went to join him, and in his way defeated a Gaulish general, named Camulogena, who came to oppose his march; but this did not hinder the revolt from spreading itself all over Celtic Gaul, whither Vercingetorix had sent for fresh supplies, and, in the mean time, attacked Cæsar, but was defeated, and forced to retire to Alesia, a strong place, now Alise in Burgundy, as is supposed. Hither Cæsar hastened, and besieged ^b him, and, having drawn a double circumvallation, with a design to starve him in it, as he was likely to have done, upon that account refused all offers of a surrender from him. At length, the long-expected reinforcement came, consisting of 160000 men, under four generals: these made several fruitless attacks on Cæsar's trenches, but were defeated in three several battles, which, at length, obliged Vercingetorix to surrender at discretion. Cæsar used all his prisoners with great severity, except the Ædui and Arverni, by whose means he hoped to gain their nations, which were the two most potent of Celtic Gaul, as he actually did; for both of them submitted to him, and the former received him into their capital, where he spent the winter, after he had put his army into winter-quarters. This campaign, as it proved one ^c of the hardest he ever had, so he gained more glory by it than any Roman general had done before: yet could not all this procure him from the servile senate, now wholly dedicated to his rival, a prolongation of his proconsulship; upon which, he is reported to have laid his hand upon his sword, and said, that that should do it. He was as good as his word, and the Gauls, upon their former ill success, resolving to have as many separate armies as provinces, in order to embarrass him the more, Cæsar, and his generals Labienus and Fabius, were forced to fight them one after another, which they did, however, with such success, that, notwithstanding the hardness of the season, they subdued the Bituriges, Carnuti, Rhemi, and the Bellovaci, with their general Correus, by which he at once quieted all the Belgic ^d provinces bordering on Celtic Gaul. The next who followed were the Treviri, the Eburones, and the Andes, under their general Dunmarus. The last place which held out against him was Uxellodunum, which was defended by the two last acting generals of the Gauls, Drapes the Sennonian, and Luterius the Cadurcean. The place being strong, and well garrisoned, Cæsar was obliged to march thither from the furthest part of Belgic Gaul, and soon after reduced it, for want of water. Here, again, he caused the right-hands of all that were fit to bear arms, to be cut off, to deter the rest from revolting afresh. Thus was the conquest of Gaul finished from the Alps and Pyrenees to the Rhine, all which vast tract was now reduced to a Roman province under the government of a prætor. The sum of all the provinces, cities, and prisoners taken, if not exaggerated by that conqueror and Plutarch, the reader may see in the Roman history above quoted ^e.

Thus ended, in a great measure, the liberty of that once famed and warlike nation, and with it their singular valour, as Tacitus observes, in the life of Agriкола. Some cities, or commonwealths, however, we are told ^f, were permitted to remain free; such as the Nervii, Ubaneses, Suessones, and Leuci; and others retained the title of confederates to Rome, viz. the Ædui, Lingones, Rhemi, and Carnutes: as to the rest, who were reduced into the form of a Roman province, we may guess at their miserable condition, by what Crisognatus the Arvernian, as quoted by Cæsar ^g, tells us of it. "If, says he, you would know after what manner distant nations ^f are used by the Romans, you need but look at our neighbouring Gaul, now reduced into a province, which having its laws and customs changed, and being brought under the power of the axes, is oppressed with perpetual slavery." To understand rightly the difference of these three conditions, or, more properly, degrees of slavery; the first was, the having a number of soldiers quartered upon them, to

- a keep them in awe (S); the next was, when the province was laid under tribute, in which case they were compelled to endure a vast number of tax-gatherers, which, like so many leaches, or harpies, sucked out the very vitals of the country (T). The third was, when they were deprived of the privilege of being governed by their own laws and magistrates, but had governors set over them, with full power and authority (cum imperio & securibus) over their lives and estates, and sent to them from Rome. It was on account of this threefold tyranny that they so often revolted; for, as Tacitus himself observes, in the reign of Tiberius the continuance of those taxes, the extortions of usurers, and insolence of the soldiers, were become so intolerable, that it drove the Gaulish cities into a fresh rebellion. And Suetonius, in the life of Nero, tells us, that the world, having for near thirteen years groaned under his tyranny, did at length shake it off, the Gauls setting the first example to all the rest.

Gaul was soon after divided into sixteen provinces, the names of which the reader will find in the margin (V), each of which groaned now, more or less, under the Roman tyranny, according as they were more or less favoured by the emperors, or by the prætors sent thither to rule them. However, neither under Cæsar, whilst he lived, nor even under his successor Augustus, do we read of any considerable revolt; on the contrary, though the latter did, in a manner, begin his reign with making them undergo a census, which is the first we read of made out of Italy, and which could not but be galling to them, they seem to have submitted to it patiently. Some years after, indeed, when Drusus was sent thither to stop the incursions which the Germans were frequently making upon them (W), and had there begun a second, and perhaps a more strict one, taking a particular account of each person's estate, in order to tax them according to it; they then began to express an universal discontent, and an inclination to take up arms, and regain their liberties. Drusus, however, without seeming to suspect any thing like it of them, summoned all the Gaulish chiefs to assist at the consecration of the temple which the Lugdunenses had built in honour of Julius Cæsar, and, upon their coming, behaved with such address and complaisance to them, that they not only dropped their intended revolt, but agreed to build an altar to Augustus, and to pay him divine honours, even during his life. Sixty Gaulish nations, it seems, contributed to the rearing and adorning of this magnificent altar, which was consecrated on the 1st of August, and games were, at the same time, instituted, in honour of this new kind of deity, not unlike the Isthmians and Nemeans of Greece¹.

(S) In which case, if these provinces continued quiet and peaceable, they had, it seems, no great armies quartered in them, since Josephus tells us (17), that, in Titus's time, they had no more than 1200 soldiers in garrison in all Gaul, although, adds he, they had fought for their liberty against the Romans above 800 years, and had near as many cities as these had then soldiers there.

(T) We are told, accordingly, that, after Julius Cæsar had finished the conquest of Gaul, he laid it under a tax, or tribute of HS. quadringenties (18), that is, about a million of English crowns. How much heavier they were taxed in subsequent reigns, may be easily guessed, by their frequent revolts, and continual complaints against those extortions and oppressions, some instances of which we shall have occasion to mention by-and-by.

(V) Viennensis, Narbonensis prima, Narbonensis secunda, Aquitania prima & secunda, Novempopulana, Alpes maritima, Belgica prima & secunda, Germania prima & secunda, Lugdunensis prima, secunda, & tertio, Maxima Sequanorum, & Alpes Græci; of all which, the reader may see a further account in the authors hereunder quoted (19).

This division, however, was not made by Julius Cæsar, since we find it still under the three distinct tions in which he left them, when Augustus caused the first census to be made in it (20); but was begun towards the latter end of this last's reign, and finished by some of his successors.

(W) It is hardly to be doubted but the Gauls, who did so grievously brook the plundering and insolences of the Romans, and found themselves too weak now to make head against them, did, by some private means, either invite the Germans as friends, or hire them as auxiliaries to their assistance; and this seems to have been the first beginning of the colonies of the Franks. For those Germans, whether defeated by the Romans, or, which is more likely, bought off by them, began, by little and little, to settle on the borders of Gallia. For we are told, that Augustus transplanted the Suevi and Sicambri, who submitted to him, into Gallia, and assigned them lands along the Rhine (21). And of Tiberius we read, that he brought 40000 of those that surrendered themselves, in the German war, over into Gallia, and settled them on the banks of the Rhine (22).

To this we may add, what another author tells us of the emperor Probus, in whose reign above sixty cities had revolted from the Romans, and made a bold push for the recovery of their liberty. This prince, says he (23), marched with a vast army into Gaul,

THIS fulsome flattery to that monarch, which might, probably, be owing to the presence of Drusus, did not, however, divert them long from their favourite view of regaining their liberty, whenever fortune should favour them with a proper opportunity. The druids, on the contrary, seem, upon this occasion, to have exerted themselves to cherish that noble design in them, to prevent any further defection from their antient religion; and hence, most likely, arose those frequent revolts, as well as threatening edicts, that came out against them in the succeeding reigns, and of which we have had occasion to speak in a former section: however that be, the violent extortions, and horrid butcheries which they underwent under Caligula^m, were of themselves sufficient to have spirited up a less warlike nation; though that reign was not long enough to ripen their design, and under the next they either enjoyed more respite, or, which is as likely, were more narrowly observed. But in that of Nero, under whom they were more cruelly treated than ever, the brave and noble Julius Vindex (X), at that time governor of Celtic Gaul, declared his resolution to free his country from slavery, and the empire from that bloody tyrant. As soon as his design was known, the Gauls, harrassed and reduced to beggary by intolerable imposts, flocked to him from all parts to assist him in it; so that, though he had no Romans under his command, yet he soon saw himself at the head of 100000 armed men. When Nero heard the news of this revolt, he appeared quite glad at it, as it would afford him occasion for fresh extortions and cruelties. What he seemed most affected with was, that Vindex, in some of his edicts against him, among other contemptuous language he had given him, did call him a bungling harper; so that, instead of making proper preparations to oppose him, he only strove to display his skill in music, to wipe off the scandal, as he thought it, that was thrown upon him. But when messengers came to him thick and threefold, and acquainted him with the progress Vindex had made in Gaul, and with Galba's revolt in Spain, he left Naples, in a fright, and repaired to Rome: however, a frivolous, but lucky omen, as he imagined it, having dispelled his fears, he returned again to his musical amusement, without taking one step to suppress either revolt. We shall not need repeat here the unworthy behaviour, and dreadful end, of that emperor, of which a full account has been given in a former volumeⁿ: all that needs be recapitulated here concerning the ill success of our Gaulish general is, that his army, having been surpris'd by that of Rufus Virginius, who was march'd against him, whether by treachery or accident, is not agreed, the Gauls were defeated, with the loss of 22000, who were killed on the spot; upon which, Vindex, in a fit of rage and despair, laid violent hands upon himself, and the rest dispersed themselves for want of a leader. Galba had much better success, and was soon after rais'd to the empire^o; but the Gauls were so heavily oppress'd by him, and so loaded with taxes, that they dared not undertake any thing against him. In the great struggle between his two successors, Otho and Vitellius, though they heartily hated them both, yet they were forced to declare for the latter, by Fabius Valens, who, in his march through their territories towards Italy, whither he was leading a gallant army, committed the greatest plunders and extortions. This threw the nation into such a terror, that every province and city sent their ambassadors to meet him, and bribe him with large presents, to prevent their towns from being either plundered or burnt (Y).

which, after Posthumus's death, was all in commotion, and, when Aurelian was killed, was, in a manner, possess'd by the Germans. There he gain'd so many victories, that he recover'd from the barbarians sixty of the most noble cities of Gallia; and whereas they had overspread all Gaul without controul, he slew near 400000 of those who had seated themselves within the Roman territories, and transplanted the remainder of them beyond the rivers Neckar and Elb: but of this we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the subsequent chapters.

(X) He was descended from the antient kings of Aquitain, and bore a natural aversion to all tyrants. Upon his first resolution of revolting, he sent to per-sua'de Galba, then in Spain, to do the same, who neither followed his advice, nor betray'd his design, though some other governors, to whom he wrote on the same subject, sent his letters to Nero: but Galba, upon receiving a second letter from him, actually rais'd a revolt there (24).

(Y) Amongst those that suffer'd the effects of his fury and avarice, was the city of Vienne, against which that of Lyons had instigated him, as having aid'd the late noble Vindex in his revolt. They were therefore forced to buy their pardon from him by an immense sum, besides a donative of 300 sesterces, the surrender of all their arms, and furnishing his army with provisions.

- a THEY did, however, recover themselves so far, notwithstanding all these oppressions, as to make several bold pushes for their liberty, especially in the reign of Vespasian. We have given an account of it in a former volume ^p, as well as of the peace that emperor thought fit to clap up with them, rather than to exasperate them to turn their arms against him at that juncture ^q. In Adrian's time this province was visited by that emperor in his progress through the empire, and as it had been greatly oppressed and impoverished during the former reigns, he left, wherever he passed through it, some tokens of his pity and munificence to that nation, and built some stately edifices there, especially a sumptuous palace, in honour of Plotina, Trajan's widow. He forgot not, at the same time, to repair all the Roman
- b towns and fortresses in that country, to keep them in subjection ^r, as it actually did, no considerable revolt happening during his and some of the succeeding reigns. All this while they seem to have made no inconsiderable figure, or bore a small sway, since, in that famous contest between Severus and his competitors, the Gauls having first saluted him emperor, their example was followed by almost all the provinces in Europe, and he was every-where acknowledged and received with the loudest acclamations ^s. He proved, however, very ungrateful to them, at least to the christians in this country, having raised a bloody persecution against them, instigated thereto by his favourite Plautianus, who took occasion of a soldier's refusing to wear a crown as a donative, to seize on the estates of all the christians of rank and quality, and to
- c put a great number of them to death, and amongst them Ireneus, the worthy bishop of Lyons ^t. Gaul was again made the scene of war, in the famed contest between Gallienus and Posthumius, the latter of whom had delivered this province from the dominion of the Germans, under which it had groaned for some time, and for which he had been acknowledged emperor both there, and in Spain and Britain, of which we have already given a full account in the Roman history ^u. The latter having been murdered by his soldiers, for debarring them from the plundering of Mentz ^v, Lollianus got himself proclaimed emperor of that part of it which borders upon the Rhine; whilst Victorinus, whom Posthumius had taken for his colleague, governed over the rest. Both these being soon after murdered, as we have there related, and
- d the son of the latter, then an infant, being named his successor, the Gauls murdered him likewise, and set up in his room one M. Aurelius Marius, formerly an armourer, but a man of extraordinary courage and strength; but he being likewise run through by a soldier who had been formerly his journeyman, and with a sword, as himself told him, of his own making, P. Pivejus, or Pesuvius Tetricus, a man of senatorial and consular dignity, was proclaimed in all this province, and soon after acknowledged in Spain and Brittain. Tetricus did not long enjoy his dignity, before the constant jars and mutinies which happened in his army, as well as the approach of the emperor Aurelian, who had restored peace in all other parts of the empire, and was marching to reunite Gaul and Britain to it, made him wish to
- e be fairly rid of it. There is even some reason to suspect, that he invited him into Gaul; and though he made a faint opposition against him at the battle of Chalons, yet, upon the first onset, he yielded himself to that emperor; so that the Gaulish troops, for want of a leader, were intirely cut off, and this province again reduced to its former obedience ^x. This action quite completed the conquest of Gaul, and Tetricus, whether to cover his treachery in abandoning his troops, or because he did not make his submission soon enough, was led in triumph by that emperor; but was soon after advanced, and loaded with honours and titles by him, as we have formerly seen ^y. As he drew nearer the Alps, he ordered the city of Lucus, a municipal town of the Vocontii, now Dauphiné, to be set on fire, because they expressed a backwardness to pay him the large sum he had exacted from them; and thus he went on extorting

under the government of a distinct præfektus prætorio, which was before only under two, Gaul being made one of those dioceses, and had its provinces assigned to it; we have already had occasion to mention them in this chapter, and in a former volume^a; and shall not repeat it here, but only add, that the Gallic præfekt had Gaul, Spain, and Britain, under him.

We should now come to the latter part of the Gaulish history, and give an account of the horrid ravages this country since suffered from the Germans, the Huns, especially under Attila, under the Vandals, and especially under the Goths, or Visigoths, and Burgundi, who formed themselves into distinct kingdoms here, and held them, through a series of princes, till dispossessed of them by the Franks: but as these have already been spoken of in the course of the Roman history^a, and must be resumed in that of those northern invaders, in the chapters hereafter following, we shall refer our readers to them as they come in course, and proceed now to the history of the antient Germans.

C H A P. XII.

The history of the antient Germans, to their breaking into the Roman empire, invasion of Gaul, and expulsion out of it by the Franks.

Germans, their origin.

IT is universally acknowledged, that the farther northward we move from ancient Gaul, the more we are in the dark about the nations that inhabited the vast regions beyond the Rhine and the Danube, which, we have seen in the last chapter, were, in a great measure, the limits between the Gauls and them. Nothing is more uncertain than their origin, the countries they came from, and the territories they settled themselves in: antient authors^a commonly confound them under the names of Celtes, Scythians, and Celto-Scythians; and, among them, such a great variety of people are comprehended, that it would be dangerous to apply that to the antient Germans, which they write of them under those other names, without some concurring circumstances to confirm it. Yet we may venture to affirm, after no small number of modern^b, and some of the antient writers^c, that they were originally one and the same nation with the Celtes and Gauls, and both descended from the antient Gomerians, or descendants of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet. Only the Germans were very much intermixed with the old Scythians and Sarmatians, on that side which joined with their territories, and particularly, as we hinted in the last chapter, between the two great rivers Rhine and Danube^d: and these, no doubt, had adopted a great many of their customs among them, as well as intermingled some of their language with their own; but in all other parts of Germany we find such an exact conformity in their religion, laws, customs, and (what may appear still more surprising to the generality of readers, but has been fully proved by some of the modern authors last quoted) in their very language^e, as leaves scarce any room to doubt but that they were descended from the same antient stock with the Celtes or Gauls, and came, by gradual migrations, from Asia, as we have already shewn these did, both in a former volume, and at the entrance of the last chapter^f. The truth is, as Pliny rightly observes^g, that the Germans were little known to the Romans, or, indeed, to any but their very neighbours, till a long time after the coming of M. Agrippa into those parts; and many things which even Tacitus has written of them, pretendedly from their own relation, are apparently fabulous: so that we must

- a fetch our intelligence from another quarter, even from those moderns who have with indefatigable pains endeavoured to strike light out of darkness: among whom, besides those already mentioned, we may add two celebrated ones, viz. Renner and Majcov, whose curious discoveries, in many points, have added no small evidence to those who had written before them on this head. So that, abating the almost unavoidable fondness with which they have all of them endeavoured to give the preference to their own nation, in point of antiquity, into the merit of which it is not our business to enter, unless we could do it with greater certainty than the subject will possibly admit of; we may venture to follow them as sure guides in other respects. If the evidence seems to lean on one side more than the other, we should
- b conclude it to be on that of the Gauls, not only as their origin can be more clearly traced from the antient Gomerians, as we have formerly seen; but as they are found seated in the best and noblest climate of the two, whilst the Germans, as a younger branch, were, perhaps, forced to spread themselves towards the more northern and inclement parts of Europe, till length of time gave them an opportunity of crossing the Rhine, and possessing themselves of the southern provinces, as we have seen they did, at the close of the last chapter, and shall farther shew at the sequel of this.

- How this country came to be called Germany, and its inhabitants Germans, is not Namus easy to guess; the reader may see the various conjectures about its etymon in the following note (A): but it is plain, it was not their original name, but is of a more
- c modern date, and seems to have had its rise on the other side of the Rhine, when the Condrusi, Eburones, Cerafi, and Pamani, crossed that river, after the example of some others of their countrymen, and went to settle in Gaul. These, it seems, were the first to whom the name of Germans was given, and which therefore extended no further than the Rhenish shore on the Gallie side, but soon after passed over to the other, and became common to other nations of the same original language and customs, till at length it became the general name of the whole nation, and the country called, from them, Germania, or Germany^b. But whether it was given to them by the Gauls on their coming over to their assistance against the Romans, or by these on account of the affinity of their religion and customs, or, lastly, whether
- d assumed by them on their settling themselves among the Gauls, and claiming by it a kindred to them, we will not venture to determine. One thing is plain, that it is not of Dutch extract; so that if they really called themselves by it, as Tacitus says they did, it is surprising it should not have been rather preserved by them, and handed to us in their own language. If we may be allowed to offer a conjecture as to their primitive and general name, both from what we have observed from their original descent from the antient Gomerians or Celts, and from several monuments they have left in several parts of Germany, especially towards the north, such as Cimbrica Cbersonesus, and such-like; it is not improbable, that they called themselves Cimri, or Cymbri, which is but a harsher pronunciation of the original Gomerai: Cimbri probably the oldest inhabitants of
- e for these Cimbri are allowed to have been an antient, if not the antientest people of Germany, and inhabited a very considerable part of that country. We have already hinted, that they gave their name to the Cimbrica Cbersonesus, which was a kind of Germany.

(A) It is not easy to determine whether this word be of Celtic or Roman extract; if the latter, it must have been given by the Gauls, either on account of their nearness of kindred to them, or of that frequent assistance they called upon them for, against the domineering Romans, of which we have spoken in the conclusion of the last chapter. Tacitus, indeed, thinks they were called so by other nations, on account of their similitude of religion, manners, &c. with the Gauls (1): but though this resemblance was really true, in fact, yet the etymon itself seems too far fetched and strained.

The other, which makes it of Celtic extract, is, indeed, much more natural, Ger and man, in that antient tongue, signifying a warlike or martial man, as, indeed, it is plain, that the Germans, as well as Gauls, did highly value themselves on that account. They were likewise known by another name, viz. that of Allemani, which, though supposed to have been given them by the Gauls, or French, because only preserved by them, who still call them Allemani, and their country Alemanie, and Alamagne, and, as is pretended, on account of their intermixing, after Marobedunus's retreat, with strolers of all nations; yet to us that name appears to be rather of German extract, and signifies nearly the same as Ger-man, that is, altogether warlike: and this name may have been carried thither either by those Germans who went thither to assist the Gauls against the Romans, or by those who at length conquered that country, and are better known by the name of Franks.

peninsula extending from the mouth of the river Elbe into the north sea¹: and if they really were the same, as they were antiently supposed, with the Cimmerians that inhabited the countries about the Palus Maotis, and Posidonius seems to confirm it, from the great likeness of their names², they must have spread themselves vastly along that northern tract. We are, moreover, told, by Strabo and Livy, that the Cimbri alone penetrated into Noricum and Illyricum, and, about the 640th year of the Roman æra, defeated the consul Papyrius Carbo near *Noreia*³. Some years after, they sent an embassy to Rome, to desire the senate to assign them lands to inhabit in, in consideration of which they would serve them in their future wars. Their suit being denied, gave occasion to a bitter war which they waged against them, in conjunction with the Figurini, of which we shall have further occasion to speak, and which is only hinted here, to shew how powerful and numerous they were by this time, and how, probably, they were some branch of the old Gomerai, and the antientest inhabitants of Germany. We shall see, in the sequel, their valour, and various fortunes, against the Romans, Gauls, and other nations. As for those who remained in their native country, or returned thither after their defeat, they, in time, joining in their excursions with the Saxons, who likewise inhabited some parts of the forementioned peninsula, it is supposed, that they became so blended with them, that their name was swallowed up in that of Saxon, so that nothing was retained of it but the denomination of Cimbrica, which was still given both to their country, and to the sea that surrounded it. The name of Allemani and Alamanni, still retained by the French, we have spoken of under the last note; that of Teutones, from which their present one of Teutschen, or Dutch, is thought to be derived, is another by which they were antiently known, and is of a much older date than that of Germans, but the etymon of which is not easily guessed at, unless we fetch it from the Celtic Theut, as we shall shew further in the sequel. These, according to Mela^m, antiently inhabited the neighbouring coasts and islands of the east, or Baltic sea; but growing too numerous for those narrow territories, the most daring part went, with their wives and families, to seek new settlements in other countries; but when, and where, is not easy to guess (B). We shall see them, in the sequel of this history, often joined with the Cimbri, Cimbrones, and others, and making excursions into Gaul, Italy, and Spain, till at length a number of them, who were left to guard the heavy baggage along the Rhine, being greatly harrassed on all sides, fought their way quite to Belgic Gaul, where they settled, and became, in time, known by the name of Atuatici^a.

Teutones.

Thus much shall suffice for the most noted common names of the antient Germans. A vast variety of others they had, according to their particular tribes, cantons, kingdoms, and commonwealths, which being in a continual fluctuation, as they were continually either warring and jostling each other out of their habitations, or were jostled out of them by the Gauls, who were frequently throwing in new colonies over the Rhine, sometimes penetrating as far as the Hercynian forest, at others spreading themselves far and wide, along the sides of it, and beyond; in so much that, as we observed in the last chapter, there was scarcely a country from that river to the east sea, or the most northern verge, but had some of that nation either intermixed with the Germans, or settled in some territories between them; it were labour lost to endeavour to fix their different abodes, or even to offer any conjectures about them, or of their various governments, laws, and manner of life. They, like the Gauls, never committed any thing to writing concerning either that or their own history, and were still more unknown than they, both to the Romans and Greeks, even in their very names, till the times that, by intercourse with, or by their wars against the former, they became, by degrees, more and more known unto them, and their names, countries, and history, recorded by their writers. (B) According to one author, they joined with the Cimbri, and, having crossed the Rhine, invaded some of the Gaulish territories (a); but we have seen, a little higher, out of Livy and Strabo, that the Cimbri had long enough before invaded some of those provinces, then under the Roman yoke, and had settled themselves in them: so that it is not easy to determine whether this Teutonic expedition tell upon Gaul, Italy, or any still more distant regions.

a our settling, therefore, the confines of Germany, and of those cantons and territories which each different nation of that vast tract of ground possessed, we shall go no further back than the epocha in which they became fully known to them.

We took notice in the preceding chapter, that the Rhine, according to the Roman authors, divided the ancient Gauls from the Germans on the west, and the Danube on the south; the Hercynian forest, at that time reckoned impenetrable, confined them on the north, and the German and northern ocean on the north-west, and Scythia and Sarmatia on the east, where they were as much intermixed with those two nations, as they were on the west with the Gauls, and where it is still more difficult to fix their boundaries, by reason of their constant fluctuation, and change of abode, as they so frequently invaded and drove each other out of them. The extent and limits of Germany.

b Of those several nations which the Romans reckoned of German extract, we shall have the less to say in this chapter, because we have given as full an account of them as could be extracted out of those ancient writers in a former volume, to which we shall refer, as we go on, in enumerating them, that the reader may readily find all that can be known of them, and the authorities there referred to for what is said of them. We have already spoken of the Cimbri, and their neighbours the Saxons, who inhabited the Cimbrica Chersonesus, on the other side the Elbe. On this side that river were the Chauci, upper and lower, who were divided from each other by the Visurgis, now the Veſer; their country contained what is now called Bremen and Lunenburgh, Friezland and Groningben; and the upper had the Cherusci, and the lower the Chamavi on the south-east, and the German ocean on the north-west. The Chauci. The Frisii, upper and lower, were divided from the lower Chauci by the river Amisæ, Frisii. now Ems; and from each other by an arm of the Rhine. Their country still retains the name of Friezland, and is divided into east and west; but the latter of the two is now dismembered from Germany, and is one of the seven united provinces: from them were parted by the Isela, now Isel, the country of the Bructeri, since called Brockmerland, and the Marſi, situate about the river Lupia, or Luppe, of whom Bructeri, Marſi and Uſipii. we have also formerly given an account. On the other side of that river were the Uſipii, or Uſpeter, but these were famed for often changing their habitation, and Uſipii. are therefore found in other territories; the Tenſteri were next to them, and next to these the Jubones, or inhabitants of Juliers, between the Maese and the Rhine: the Cotti, another ancient warlike people, who inhabited part of Hesse and Thuringia, from the Hartzian mountains to the Rhine and Weſer, and of whom we have formerly spoken; among whom were comprehended the Mattiaci, whose capital was called from them Mattiacum, by some taken to be Marpurgh, and by others Baden, on account of its hot waters. Next to them were the Sedusii, bordering upon Swabia; Narisei, or ancient inhabitants of Northgow, whose capital is the famed city of Nuremberg; and the Marcomani, whose country anciently reached from the Rhine to the head of the Danube, and to the Neckar: here were the famed Agri decumales, so called, among other reasons, for their being taxed a tenth part of their produce by the Romans. The Marcomani afterwards went and settled in Bohemia and Moravia, under their general Maroboduus, and some of them in Gaul, whence they drove the Boii, who had feared themselves there.

c On this side the Rhine, between that river and the Mosa, or Maese, were the Ubii, who were brought over by Agrippa. Their metropolis was Colonia Agrippina, so called from the empress of that name, who founded it, and now Cologne; and next to them the Tungri, which are supposed to be the same whom Cæſar calls Eburones and Condrusi, and whose metropolis, then called Attematica, is since known by the name of Tongres. Higher up from them, and on the other side of the Mosel, Uſipii. were the Treviri, whose capital was Augusta Trevirorum, now Triers (C); next to them

(C) As Germany came to be divided into Primo and Secunda, the former being that which was nearest the Alps, the Treviri have been supposed to have belonged to it (3), as they boasted themselves of them were the Tribocci, Nemetes, and Vangiones; the former dwelt in Alsatia, and a their metropolis was called Argentina, and Argentoratum, now Straßburg. The others lived in the cities of Worms, Spire, and Moguntia, now Mentz. Those three, besides the Treviri mentioned in the last note, made the Germania prima; and those below them the Germania secunda, and reached as far as the Maes and lower Rhine, and was divided from Belgia by the Demer and Scheld, which latter has always divided the sees of Liege and Cambray. The Mediomatrici were situate along the Mosel, about the city of Metz in Lorraine; above them, on the same river Rhine, were seated the Raurici, called also Rauraci, and Kauriaci, another ancient German nation, who inhabited that part of Helvetia, or Switzerland, about Basil: their capital was Rauracum, or Augusta Rauracorum ⁷.

German extraction; but this is much questioned by others, who rather think, that they, with some others who obtained their liberty, and are by Pliny (4) called libera civitates, were excluded from that

Vindelici. BETWEEN the heads of the Rhine and of the Danube, were seated the antient kingdoms of Vindelicia, whose capital was called Augusta Vindelicorum, now Augsburg ⁸; and below it, along the banks of the same river, those of Noricum and Pannonia, the former of which was divided into Noricum Ripense and Mediterraneum, and contained a great part of the provinces of Austria, Stiria, Carinthia, Tyrol, Bavaria, and some others of less note ⁹; and the latter the kingdom of Hungary, divided into upper and lower, and extending from Illyricum to the Danube and the mountains Cætii, in the neighbourhood of Vindebona, now Vienna, the metropolis of Austria ¹⁰. On the other side of the Danube, which was more properly called Germany, and Germania magna, besides the Marcomans (D), whom we have mentioned above as more properly situate between the Rhine and it, were the Hermunduri, whose country ran northwards from it, and extended itself along the Hercynian mountains quite up to the river Sala. These possessed, particularly, the country now called Misnia, in Upper Saxony, though some make their territories to have extended much farther, and to have reached quite to, and even beyond the kingdom of Bohemia. On the other side those mountains was the abovementioned kingdom of Boiobemum, now Bohemia ¹¹, once one of the seats of the Boii; and beyond them, north of the Danube, was another seat of the Marcomani along the river Albis, now Elbe; from which they spread themselves into Bohemia, and drove the Boii out of it, as we hinted a little higher: we have spoken of these in a former volume, to which we refer the reader ¹². The Quadi were situate next to Bohemia: their territories extended from the Danube to Moravia, and the northern part of Austria ¹³; these are likewise comprehended under the antient name of Suevi, part of whom forced their way into Spain, and settled a kingdom there, as hinted under the last note. The Bastarnæ. Bastarnæ were situate eastward of the Quadi, and parted from them by the Granna, now Gran, a river that falls into the Danube, and by the ridge of the Carpatian mountains, called from them Bastarnicæ Alpes: their country made, indeed, part of the European Sarmatia, and so out of the limits of Germania propria; but they antiently lived on this side the Danube, were concerned with the Marcomans, Quadi, Hermunduri, Suevi, and a number of other German nations, in the famed war against M. Antoninus ¹⁴, and are accounted of German extract by Pliny ¹⁵; and it was not till the reign of Probus that they were transplanted over the Danube thither by that emperor, to repeople those countries which were become desolate by the wars and pestilence. These soon conformed to the Roman laws, and became one nation with the other inhabitants of that country ¹⁶. We have formerly taken notice of that colony of them which was settled in Thrace by Probus ¹⁷; but where the original seat division (5). The other cities mentioned by that author were those of the Nervii, Suessones, Sylvanectes, and Leuci; those on the other hand of the Rhemi and Lingones in Gaul, that is, of the provinces of Rheims and Champagne, he there calls civitates federatæ.

The Treviri, however, became in time the principal nation of Belgica prima.

(D) These, the Quadi, and some others we shall have occasion to mention, were of that tribe of antient Germans known by the name of Suevi: they antiently possessed a considerable part of Germany, that is, the greatest part of it from the Rhine to the Elbe; but, in process of time, some of them removed more northward, and settled along the Danube, whilst another part went into Spain, and formed a kingdom there, as we shall shew in a subsequent chapter.

(5) Vide Mascov. l. iii. c. 5.

a of them was before their removal, is not easy to guess; it has been, for that reason; much questioned whether they were of German or Sarmatian extract: we, however, quoted Pliny in favour of the former opinion, who in another place makes them one of the five principal tribes of the German nation¹. We may add to his evidence that of Strabo, who plainly distinguishes them from the Sarmatians; and that of Tacitus, who ranks them among the former². We read of their assisting Perseus and Mithridates against the *Romans*³, but after their conquest by the latter, we hear no more of them by that name; probably the remainder of them united with the Goths, and as for those who stayed in their native country, if any such there were, they were, in all likelihood, blended with those Picinigi, or Patzinice, which we find b mentioned in the Byzantine and Polish history, and which Strabo and Tacitus mention in the place above quoted with the Bastarnæ and some other German tribes⁴.

BETWEEN those nations we have seen seated along the other side of the Danube, and the Hercynian forest, were several other antient nations, of whom we know little more than their names, and about whose exact situation we are quite in the dark: such as the Martingi, Burii, Borades, Lygii, or Logiones, and some others, who are Burii. placed by our geographers along the forest abovementioned, between the Danube and the Vistula. The Burii are reckoned the same with the Borades, and are mentioned as assistants to the Marcomani in their war against M. Antoninus; and the Lygii, or Logiones, as assisting Vibullius, king of the Hermunduri, against the haughty Vannius, king of the Suevi: and their bordering one upon another is collected from a passage of Pliny which places the latter between the Danube and the forest abovementioned⁵, but with no sufficient exactness to lead us to the right situation of either: only the Silesian historians affirm, that the Lygii, and part of the Quadi, remained still in their own original country⁶. The last we shall mention on this side the Hercynian forest, were the famed Ratii, now Grisons, who were seated on the Ræti. Alps: their country, which was antiently called Western Illyricum, was divided into Rætia prima, or propria, and secunda, and was then of a much larger extent, spreading itself towards Swabia, Bavaria, and Austria. This country, and that of Noricum, and others, became a Roman province, and belonged to the kingdom of d the Ostrogoths in Italy; but upon the declension of it they fell under the dominion of the Franks, about which time the name of Bavarians first became noted in history⁷.

On the other side of the Hercynian forest were the antient seats of the Suevi, whom we have shewn above to have been an old tribe of Germans (E), and spread themselves from the Vistula to the Elbe, and beyond, though they in time did, at least a great part of them, either penetrate through that forest, or wind themselves about it, and came and settled in the more pleasant southern parts of Europe, such as Belgium, Gaul, and even Spain, as shall be seen in the sequel. The most famous of these were the Longobardi, so called, according to some, on account of their wearing e long beards; but, according to others, on account of their consisting of two nations, viz. the Bardi and Lingones; these dwelt along the river Elbe, and bordered southward on the Chauci, mentioned a little higher, and both these were reduced by Tiberius, as we have shewn in a former volume⁸. But the Longobardi, having passed the Danube, invaded and defeated the *Heruli*⁹, did afterwards cross the Alps, and settle in Italy, where they founded the kingdom of *Lombardy*¹⁰, and, in process of time, quite forgot their antient German, and adopted that of *Italy*¹¹. The Burgundi Burgundi are the next of note. Pliny affirms them likewise of German extract, and

(E) At least we find them so styled by Pliny, and other antient authors: but we must here remind our readers of what has been heretofore occasionally observed with respect to those authors, that they so often confound the Celts and Scythians, that it is not easy to guess whether those antient Suevi or Germans, whom they allow to be of Celtic extract, were really so, or of Scythian breed. But from the nearer likeness of manners, language, &c. to the latter, one would be more apt to think they derived their original from them. However, the truth seems to be, that both Celts and Scythians were in all these parts so intermixed and blended together, especially from the Rhine eastward and northward, that all those antient Germans bid fair to be the offspring of that mixture, rather than of either Scythic or Celtic original properly so called.

ranks them with the Vindili, Varini, Carini, Guttones and Ingevones, which last he makes to have been a mixed people, partly Cimbria, partly Teutonic, and partly Chauci. It were labour lost to inquire after their original seat (F), but it is plain they were, like their other neighbours, inticed to exchange it for a better; and, having penetrated first into Germany, where they assisted Valentinian against the Alemanii, they afterwards crossed the Rhine, and settled in Gaul, where they founded a kingdom in that province which still retains the name of Burgundia, as we shall shew in some of the subsequent chapters. The Semnones, likewise, left their old habitation, and settled about the Lionnois in Gaul: we find them seated about the Elbe, in Tiberius's time, and, in conjunction with the Hermunduri and other Germans, bravely striving to obstruct his crossing that river^a; but at what time they passed from thence into Gaul, is not easy to guess; but they fell upon one of the most fruitful parts of that kingdom, and there grew so rich and considerable, that they are thought to have been called Semnones on that very account, it being an old Celtic word, which signifies opulent and venerable (G), as we have had occasion to shew in the history of the Gauls^b. These three were the most noted nations on the other side the Hercynian forest, to which we shall only add the names of some others, though scarcely known to us by any thing else: such are the Aviones, Reudigni, Eudoles, and Swardones, whom we find placed between the Elbe and the Sarvus, or Viader, on the north of the Longobardi; the Rugii, Lemnovii, Haruli, Gebiones, or Gotbini, the Sidui Carini, between the last-mentioned river and the Vistula: as for the Angli, Saxi, Goths, Huns, &c. they will be spoken of in some of the following chapters. But before we pass further, we must not omit the country of the Æstii, an ancient tribe of the Suevi, who inhabited along the coasts of the east sea (H), so famed for the great plenty of amber that was found there, especially along those of Prussia, and for the vast quantity that was fetched from thence both by the Greeks and Romans, of which we find particular mention in most ancient authors, such as Herodotus^c, Diodorus Siculus^d, Pylheas Massiliensis, as quoted by Pliny^e, but especially by Tacitus^f, who has given us a very curious description of

(F) Some have imagined the Burgundi and Burgundiones to have been two different people, but without any probability, since they are mentioned by some ancient authors as the same nation, though under those two different names; and that is, Marcellinus calls them Burgundi, whom St. Jerom and Orosius call Burgundiones.

(G) Some have, indeed, sought the etymon of this name from the Greek, and think they were so called from the word Ξένος, stranger, new-comer; on account of their being some of the last German nations that came over the Rhine into Gaul (8). Accordingly, a Roman historian tells us (9), that they were the very last of all the strangers that came thither. Servius, indeed, thinks they were at first called Ξένος, and afterwards Ξένωνες, because they received Bacchus into their country.

But if we must have recourse to the Greek, would not the word Ξένος afford us a better etymon, as it is more like the name of the ancient Semnones than that of Senones or Xenones? We read of Semna myseria, and Semnai theai, in which the word implies something venerable or awful, and might be either taken up by the Semnonic tribe, or given them by their neighbours, either on account of their opulence, or the great sway they bore above the rest, all which doth well agree with their history. But we would rather chuse to stick to the Celtic, which doth still more closely square to it than to the Greek, which, how like soever to it in most things, doth yet sometimes deviate from the original design and meaning, especially as to such appellatives as this we are upon:

and if we observe, that in several provinces of Gaul, even to this day, the natives never pronounce an m before an n, but like a nn, we may perhaps find out the most probable etymon for the words senex, senatus, senator, senior, seniorato, seneschal, carta senica, and many others of the like import, in which the m was gradually absorbed into nn, and this last softened into a single one.

(H) So called, in all probability, from their inhabiting those coasts of the east sea, containing part of Prussia, Courland, and Livonia. These, as well as their neighbours the Gotbini, were not unknown to Tacitus, who has given us a succinct description of their religion, customs, and language; in all which they differed so little from the Celts, or old Gauls, that we may take it as a further proof, that the ancient Germans and they were but distinct branches of the same nation, as we observed at the beginning of this and the last chapter. What is still more observable is, that our author tells us, that their language differed but little from the old British, that is, from the old Celtic or Gomerian; the Britons, who were a branch of these, or rather the same nation, under a different name, that was given them on account of their painting their bodies, the word Brū, in the old Celtic, signifying the same as Paint or painted, and both Britons and Gomerians retaining the same tongue not only then, but even to this day, as we have had frequent occasion to observe, both in the last chapter, and in the history of the ancient Celts (10).

- a it, as well as of these Æstii, who gathered and sold it to them. These, he says, worshipped the mother of the gods, and placed such confidence in her safeguard, that they scarcely knew the use of iron weapons, or any other sort but cudgels. They were more industrious than the rest of the Germans in cultivating their corn and other fields, and dived into the seas and rivers for amber, which is a commodity peculiar to them, and which was of little use to them, except to sell it to strangers, rough and unwrought, as they gathered it. He then goes on in describing the nature of that wonderful gum, according to the notion they then had of it, which we need not here dwell upon, but from which, as well as from what other ancient authors have writ of it, we may infer, that it was in very high esteem in those days.
- b In Nero's reign, by which time the Romans had wholly set aside the thoughts of conquering Germany, one of that emperor's favourites persuaded him to send thither a kind of embassy to buy it there upon the spot, and at the first hand^f. The thing was accordingly done, and the Roman knight, who was at the head of this expedition, setting out from Carnuntum, a fortress on the banks of the Danube (l), arrived at the place, and met with a kind reception from the Æstii, from whom he bought and brought away, according to Salinus^g, 13000 pounds weight of that commodity; which was designed, it seems, by one of their kings, as a present to the emperor; and among it there was a piece which must have been of very great value, if it be true, what another author affirms, that it weighed alone thirteen pounds^h. We find
- c in Cassiodorus, a letter sent by Theodoric, king of the Goths, to the Æstii, wherein he thanks them for a noble parcel they had sent to him of the same precious drugⁱ; and wherein he promises them his friendship, which, it seems, they were endeavouring to obtain by this embassy, and valuable present. By this letter it should seem, that the inhabitants were wholly ignorant whence it came, and how it was formed; for so their ambassadors told that monarch; and added, that the sea threw it upon their coasts. These Æstii were still famed among other German nations on the east sea, in the time of Charles the great^k. We read of the Scirri, Hirri, Gallindi, and Sudeni, in Ptolemy, which some have endeavoured to prove were to be reckoned among the Æstii^l, or ancient inhabitants of Prussia, but with very little likelihood: as for the name of Prussia, it is of much more recent date, as shall be seen in the modern part of this work. All that needs be added, with respect to the Æstii, is, that they were at length conquered; with some other nations, by Ermanaric, king of the Goths^m.

ON this side the Æstii, and, as is supposed, near the mouth of the Vistula, now Weychseł, were the Gepidæ; and farther north, on the coasts of the east sea, between these and the Æstii, were the Cbaiboni. It is not easy to determine whether these two were of German, Scythic, or Gothic extract: the Gepidæ are indeed affirmed to be Germans by some ancient authorsⁿ; but we have had frequent occasion to observe, that they frequently confound those nations, so that we cannot readily depend upon them: were we allowed to offer a conjecture of our own, we should rather think

e them of Celtic origin. We have already observed, in the Gaulish history, that the Celtes had spread themselves towards the farthestmost parts of the north, as the Cimbrians in the Cimbrica Chersonesus, and the Teutones (K) in the islands adjacent: and, indeed,

(l) Carnuntum was a fortress in Upper Pannonia, on the same side with Vienna, and was a kind of boundary between the frontiers of the Germans and Pannonians (11). If, therefore, this embassy set out from thence, as our author affirms, and it be very unlikely they should sail up the Danube, and down the Rhine, in order to coast it round to the Prussian coasts; it may be inferred, that the Hercynian forest must have had some passage cut across, for them to go thither by land: and as we are told they passed through the country of the Guthiones, or Gothini, in their way thither, we may conclude it probable, that they sailed down the Vistula, at the very mouth of which were the Electride insula, or Amber islands, so called from that commodity being either gathered upon those coasts, or brought thither as to a mart by the Æstii.

(K) We have already hinted some conjectures concerning the etymon of that word, at the entrance of this chapter, and in a former volume, in speaking of the Tirani. The old Celtes boasted themselves sprung from the god Thesus, or Mercury, whom Cæsar calls Dis (12), the name of that deity after his death, or apothefus, as we shewed in the last chapter;

indeed, it seems as if those ancient Gomerians were either elbowed by new-comers, a farther and farther northwards, as our Welsh were here in England; or, if we suppose them to have been Celtic colonies, sent afterwards in search of new habitations, as they were often forced to do for want of room, that they found the more temperate parts already so well inhabited, that they were forced to take up with such climates as they found still uninhabited by reason of their extreme coldness. In either case the Cimbrians, Teutones, Gepidæ, Cbaiboni, and Æstii, being found all in one line, and under the same climate, may, probably enough, have been all of the same extract, considering the conformity of their manners, language, &c. but we only offer this as a conjecture. Of the Cbaiboni, indeed, we know but little, except what we read of their invading Gaul in the time of Dioclesian°, and of their being b totally routed by Constantine the great P. The Gepidæ are famed in history for having reared themselves into an early kingdom, and extending their territories into Pannonia, and taking the famed city of Sirmium, or Sirmish, from the emperor Marcian(L); as likewise for their wars with the Goths, Burgundians, and especially the *Romans*¹, for their invasion of Germany and Belgia, and for the terrible havock they made in both, in conjunction with the Quadi, Vandals, and other northern nations, of which St. Jerom gives us a particular and dreadful account², as may be seen by the abstract in the margin (M). They kept themselves in possession of all Dacia, till the emperor Justin's reign, when, being left in the lurch by that prince, and Cunemund, their last king, being overthrown and killed by Alboin, king of the c Longobards, there was a final end put to their kingdom. The Abares, who were allied with Alboin, took possession of Dacia, and the whole Gepidæan nation was so thoroughly dispersed³, as never to recover itself again. Some of them we find accompanying that conqueror's expedition into *Italy*⁴, and the rest went and refuged themselves where they could (N), as we shall see in a subsequent chapter. THUS and Tacitus Twiflon (13); and upon that account did, in all probability, take the name of Teutates from him, which, by length of time, variety of dialects, and of hands, through which it passed, diversified itself into Teutoni, Teutones, Teutonarii, Teutobodi, Teutofagi, Taurisci, Tausantii, Tudescei, and Teutschei, which two last names they still retain in Germany and Italy.

That this name is very antient, and common to all the Celts, we have shewn in the parts of their history above quoted, and we shall beg leave to add a pregnant testimony of it, which is as follows: Servius observes, that the city of Pisa had received its name from Pisus, a king of the Celts, who founded it; and presently after, upon the authority of Cato, adds, that the Teutones were settled in that country long before the Hebrucei made themselves masters of it. The city itself, says he, was called Teuta, and the inhabitants Teutæ (14).

As to the Teutofagi, we find a tribe of them in the neighbourhood of Tholouse in old Gaul, who were surnamed Volscei, of whom we spoke in the last chapter. Cæsar and Strabo mention another tribe, who were seated about the Hercynian forest, and make the former of them to be descended from the Gaulish (15). We find the Teutones and Teutonarii spread far and wide about the Baltic, and Scandinavia had scarcely any other inhabitants but Teutones, if we may believe Pliny and Mela (16). Among the Gallo-greeks, or Galatians, we find two tribes, one of which had the name of Teutofagi, and the other Teutobodiæci, or Teutobogi (17). The Name of Taurisci can hardly come from any other than Thaur-rich, the kingdom of Thaur, and that of Tausantii from Thaur-lands, the land of Thaur. All these, put together, sufficiently shew that they were originally, or boasted themselves such, the descendants or subjects of Thent, or Mercury, once the famed monarch of the greatest part of Europe (18).

(L) It seems that emperor had suppressed the annual pension which he had engaged to pay to them; upon which, they, under the conduct of their king Ardaric, who had already conquered Dacia, passed the Danube, and added some part of Pannonia to their kingdom. As for Sirmium, it was the metropolis of Lower Pannonia; and though it was afterwards destroyed by lightning (19), and since then reduced to a mere village by the Turks, yet it was celebrated heretofore for two Arrian councils held in it under Constantinus, viz. AN. 351. and 357. and for being the birth-place of Probus (20).

(M) These barbarians broke down, like an inundation, not only on Upper and Lower Germany, but into Gaul likewise, and as far as even Spain. In the former they destroyed, among other cities, those of Strasbourg, Spire, Worms, and Metz; and in Belgia those of Rheims, Amiens, Tournay, Arras, and Throuane; and carried the inhabitants captive into Germany. They likewise ravaged, in a woful manner, the provinces of Aquitania, Lugdunensis, and Narbonensis, and carried off an immense plunder. The rest the reader may find in the letter above quoted.

(N) It is supposed, that the poor remains of the Gepidæ took refuge under the emperor Justinian, and that he took, upon that account, the title of Gepidicus, which we find afterwards added to the imperial ones, as appears by the preamble of some of his successors letters, especially that of Maurice, who styles himself there, Alemanicus, Gothicus, Ausicus, Vandalicus, Herulicus, Gepidicus, Africanus, &c. - a THUS much shall serve for the names and situation of the antient Germans, according to their different tribes and nations at the time of the Romans first invasion of them, as far as a subject so involved in darkness and confusion can be brought into any tolerable light and order. In Augustus's reign it was divided into Germania Germany, how divided. Prima and Secunda, that is, Upper and Lower, as we hinted above, and guarded by eight legions of Roman forces, which were, according to custom, employed in making high roads, new fortifications, and other useful works, whenever they were not engaged in the field*. This division seems to have continued till about the time of the emperor Jovinus, when, though the constitution still subsisted with regard to Germania Prima, yet it was then, in all probability, lost, with respect to Germania Secunda, which was by that time become, in a great measure, subject to the Franks: for in the Notitia Imperii, which is thought to have been written then about, though the state of Belgica Prima and Secunda be there still intire, yet there is no farther mention of Germania Secunda.

- As for the country of Germany itself, we have such a dreadful account given us of it, both by Cæsar and *Tacitus, even of those parts of it which lie under a more temperate climate, that one would think it almost incredible that such a brave nation as that would have been contented to live in it, when they wanted neither strength nor courage to have broken their way into others, more pleasant and fruitful. Nor would one be able to know the worst parts of it, as they are now, by the description they give us of the best. According to them, it was barren, uncultivated, and frightful all over; and even its variety of soil and climate added to the horror of it from the dreadful forests, stinking and unwholsome bogs, the inclemency of its winds, dampness of its seas, lakes, and rivers, and harshness of its soil. But as, on the one hand, we must allow for exaggeration in historians, who plainly sought in every thing to magnify their own courage and prowess, by the difficulties and hardships they met with in the conquests of those countries and nations; so we must grant, on the other, that the Romans proved the means of cultivating those, till then, barren and inhospitable territories, by cutting down great numbers of forests, draining of wet and marshy grounds, and other such-like improvements as they were able to admit of. So that we need not now tell our readers, that this pretended barrenness and unhealthiness was rather owing to the supineness of the inhabitants, than to any defect in its soil or climate, since we find it now capable of bearing all sorts of grain, vines, fruit, and even foreign plants, in great abundance, and due maturity. And thus far may be owned, that the coming of the Romans into Germany, as well as into Gaul, contributed much to the fertilising and enriching of those two countries, which, till then, had been wholly neglected by both nations, who, as we hinted in the last chapter, thought this, and every occupation, besides the martial trade, too much below their fierce and warlike genius. We are told, in particular, that the emperor Probus was the first who permitted vines to be brought into Gaul and Germany, and to be planted along the Rhine and Mosel, and other parts† (O). Vines, when first brought thither.

AMONG those many woods and forests with which this country abounded, perhaps, more than any other on this side the Rhine, was that famed one called the Hercynian, and, by the Greeks, Orcinian forest, the longest and thickest in Europe, and reckoned by Julius Cæsar to have extended sixty days journey in length, and nine in breadth. We have given an account of it in a former volume, to which we refer‡: all that we need to add is, that not only this, but all the forests, woods, and groves, in

As for the unfortunate Cannibals, the use which Albin made of his body was, to make a drinking-cup of his skull, a custom descended to them from their barbarous ancestors, of which we have had occasion to speak, in the history of the Celts and Scythians, and which, it appears by this, was still rise among a vast many nations of their descendants, so many ages after their embracing christianity. As to the Gepids, we have nothing to add concerning them, but that they professed Arianism in common with the Goths (12), as will be seen in some of the following chapters.

(O) An antient author compares this action of his to that of Hannibal, who caused olive-trees to be planted in Africa, in order to furnish the soldiers with profitable employments in time of peace (23). But if Probus knew any thing of that natural propensity which the German nation had to strong liquors, one would be apt to think he had something more in his view than the bare finding out proper employment for them, when he introduced the juice of the grape among them (24).

Germany, even the trees, boughs, and leaves of it, were reckoned sacred; and this is the reason why the ancient Germans made it a piece of their religion not to cut them down, unless it be some branches of the oak, and some other trees which they carried with them, on particular solemnities²; but since their conquest by the Romans, a good many were cut down, partly for conveniency, and partly out of a dislike of those superstitious and bloody rites, which were performed in them. Many more were destroyed, since their embracing of christianity, upon the same account, and some are yet still remaining; and, amongst others, one which is known by the name of the black forest: the Bacenian is another famed one, which parted the Suevi from the Cherusci, by some supposed to be that of Thuringia, and by others the black forest last mentioned. The Casian forest, or Casia Sylva, was likewise very famous: some suppose it to have likewise been a remnant of the Hercynian, and part of it remains still in the duchies of Cleves and Westphalia. Tacitus tells us of a famous one dedicated to Hercules, and called, from him, the Herculean forest³; but it doth not appear that they had, as yet, adopted either that, or any other Roman deities: so that if there was any such forest of that name, it must have been called so upon some other account than a religious one. For, as we have observed in the last chapter, the Germans made a much longer stand against the Roman polytheism than the *Gauls*⁴.

Rivers. RIVERS of note they had in abundance, of which we shall only mention the most considerable ones, and what is most remarkable in them. At the head of these may justly be placed the Danube, now Ister, by far the largest in Europe. It has its rise in Swabia, and flowing through that province, and those of Bavaria, Austria, Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, Moldavia, Besserabia, and part of Tartary, and receiving about sixty other rivers in its course, falls into the Euxine or Black Sea, in two arms. It was once the boundary between Sarmatia and Germany, but became afterwards subject to the Romans to its very source, under the emperor Trajan (P). The Rhine, another famous river, which antiently divided Germany from Gaul, and springs from the Rhetian Alps in the western borders of Switzerland, and northern of the Grisons: as it rises from two springs, which unite their waves near Chur, now Coire; so it divided itself into two streams, one of which falls into the Maeße, and the other into the German ocean: upon both accounts, perhaps, it is called, by Virgil, Rhenus bicornis, or bicorniger. It has now no passage into that ocean, but with the Maeße above-mentioned, below Briel, unless that branch of the one part of it called the Yffel, which empties itself into the Zuyder-Zee, may be said to do it⁵. This mouth, which was antiently known to the Romans by the name of Flavum, and still retains that of Vlie, or Flie, had a strong castle built by it, to guard the passage out of the Zuyder, or south, into the north sea. As for the Rhine, it became afterwards a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, upon the overthrow of Varus by the latter, who unwisely spent their time in destroying the fortresses of the former along that river, instead of pursuing the advantage of that signal victory; so that they only shortened the extent of the Roman territories, which before reached as far as the Weßer, if not beyond⁶. The same river did likewise part the Balevi from the other Germans, as has been formerly hinted⁷. Julius Caesar, in one of his German triumphs, caused, among other pageantic figures, that of the Rhine to be carried; in imitation of which, it is judiciously observed, that his successors did oftener triumph over, than conquer it⁸. The Vistula, now Weichsel, was another considerable river, which divided Germany from the European Sarmatia, whence the latter was called Germania Transfistulana. It had its rise in the Carpatian mountains in Higher Silesia, and, crossing the Hercynian forest, disembogued itself, by three streams, into the Baltic sea, not far from Dantzic. The Drave, or Drau, springs from the Alps in the Tyrolese, and, dividing Upper and Lower Hungary from Sclavonia,

(P) We are told, that he established at Zarmigeforhusa, the capital of Sarmatia, the famed colony called Ulpia Trajana, laid a bridge over the Danube, as appears from several antient medals, and, particularly, by the column erected in honour of him; and the explanation given us of it by the authors quoted in the margin (25).

a falls into the Danube near Esseck. The Moraw rises in the confines of Bohemia, Moraw divides Moravia into two parts, and falls into the Danube not far from Vienna. The Nab, in Nortgow, hath its source near that of the Main, and falls into the Nab. Danube a little above Ratisbou. The Neckar, in Suabia, rises from the black forest, Neckar not far from the Danube, but takes a different course, and falls into the Rhine. Regen rises in Nortgow, on the borders of Bohemia, and empties itself into the Danube at Ratisbou, thence called Regensburgb. The Veser, antiently Visurgis, descends from Veser. Franconia, and, passing by Bremen, falls into the German ocean between the mouths of the Elbe and Ems. The former of these, called by the Romans Albus, and by the Elb. Germans Elue, Elbe, and now Elb, is a very large and considerable one, and hath b its spring in the mountains called the Giant Mountains, Montes Heroum, in Silesia, on the confines of Bohemia, and, passing through it and Upper and Lower Saxony, falls into the above-mentioned sea at Rützbuttel, twenty leagues below Hamburgb. The latter, viz. Ems, antiently Amisia, rises in the bishoprick of Paderborn, and, Ems passing by Embsen, the metropolis of East Friesland, and through the bay of Dul-lert, falls into the same ocean a little above the mouth of the Visurgis, or Veser. The Lippia, now Lippe, and Isala, or Nel, fall, the one into the Rhine, below Cologn, Lippe and divided the Bructeri and Marfi from the Usipii; and the other into the Fossa Drusiana. The rest, being of less note, we shall pass by.

CITIES of any consideration the Germans did not begin to build till after the c coming in of the Romans, but were divided into cantons and districts, like the Gauls, and lived in villages like them: even those famous large ones they now have, were either most of them built by the Romans, or enlarged, beautified, and enfranchised by them (Q). Such were the city of Cologn, of which we have given an account in Cologn. a former volume^a, and of its being called Agrippinae. It was formerly called Colonia Ubiorum, and was their metropolis. It is commodiously situated on the Rhine, and in the circle of the lower Rhine, and is now the metropolis of the archbishopric of that name, an imperial city, and a famed university. Colonia Trajana, another antient Roman colony, below the former, by some thought to be the present Keyserf-waert. Colonia Ulpia, now Cleves, the capital of Cleveland in Lower Germany, sup-d posed to have been built by Julius Caesar, as well as that of Bonn, antiently Bonna Julia, situate above Cologn, and on the same river. This last is now the residence of the electors of Cologn. Ausburgh, i. e. Augustus-burgh, antiently called Augusta Ausburgh. Vindelicorum^b, now the capital of Suabia; this is likewise an imperial city, very populous and trading, situate on the Lech, not far from the Danube, and famed, among other things, for the Augustan confession, or confession of Ausburg, which is that of the Lutherans. Argentoratum, now Strasburgb in Alzacia, the antient capital Strasburgb of the Trebochi on the Rhine, is reckoned one of the antientest cities in Germany (R), and is now famed for its magnificent cathedral, and the spire and curious clock of it, of which we shall say something more in the sequel; but, above all, for a living
c well, inclosed in that church, which was originally dedicated to superstitious and heathenish uses, such as we have mentioned in the last note. Triers, another antient Triers city of Lower Germany, said to have been built by Trebesas, the brother of Ninus, 1496 years before Christ, and made a Roman colony in the time of Augustus. It became afterwards the most famed city of Gallia Belgica, and was, for some time, the seat of the western empire, in the reign of Constantius^c. Here Valentinian

(Q) These new colonies were, it seems, endowed with most of the privileges of the city of Rome; and Cologn, we are told (26), was one of them.

(R) And well it may, if what some German antiquaries pretend be true, that it was built 33 years before Abraham. But it will be time enough to believe it when they give us some further proofs of it than they have hitherto.

This place, we are told, was chiefly famed, in antient times, for a living well, or spring, which was used for the washing and purifying of the victims which were offered up by their priests, and was from thence called Blotkeda, and Blotabrum, from the antient word blot, which signifies a bloody sacrifice. Hence some infer, that human victims were thrown alive into the well; others, that they were first dashed to death against the stones, and then flung into it (27). This well was, after the conversion of the Germans to christianity, inclosed with a wall, and consecrated, to serve for a baptismal font; and the waters of it became so famous, for some miraculous power attributed to them, that they were fetched or resorted to from all parts: but since the reformation it hath been opened, for common use (28).

triumphed, in a magnificent manner, over the Aleman^k. Triers had been formerly a the seat of the Gaulic prefects, or of the præfectura Galliarum^l, and obtained the right of coinage from the Romans^m; at present it is only the metropolis of the ecclesiastic electorate of that name, though the bishops of it were formerly styled primate of those of Gaul, on account of its having been once the seat of the prefects of it, which was afterwards removed to Arles, on occasion of the former being destroyed by the *Franks*ⁿ. Ratisbon, in the circle of Bavaria, said to have been first built by Tiberius, and now famous for the diet of the empire being held there. Mentz, now famous for the invention of printing by John Fust, alias Faustus, a gentleman of that city^o, and for being the residence of one of the ecclesiastic electors, in the lower circle of the Rhine, and situate on the banks of it; was formerly enlarged and fortified by Drusus, with several others on that river; such as Bonn Andernach, and many others on the same river, as well as upon the Maese, Elbe, and Wefer. He built, likewise, bridges over them, especially at Mentz and Bonn, and kept a fleet, for the security of those parts^p: near the former of these was erected a monument, in form of a funeral pile, in memory of him, by those legions which he had there commanded, some remains of which are still to be seen, and are mentioned by several antient and modern authors^q, and described by Hutichius^r. It is known by the name of Eichelstein, and stands in the now citadel-yard of the city above-named; but that this was the same that was erected for that prince, we must depend wholly upon tradition, as we must for a vast number of other such structures, with which this country abounds, but which retain neither inscriptions nor any other indices, by which they may be fixed to their original design. As we mentioned these cities only on account of their being either built, fortified, or celebrated by the Romans, we shall not take upon ourselves to go any farther with the rest, because we confine our geography to the antient, and not to the modern Germany, which latter is too well known to our readers, to need our expatiating upon it.

The religion of the antient Germans almost the same with that of the Gauls.

THIS subject hath been already so copiously handled in the last chapter, as it is so naturally knit and interwoven with it, that we hope we may save ourselves the pains of a needless repetition. The Gauls and Germans, as nearly allied to each other originally, received their religion, laws, and customs, from the same hand, and both retained them, some few particulars excepted, during a long series of ages, with an invincible tenaciousness; and we have had occasion to observe, that the latter continued much longer inflexible against introducing the Roman superstition, than the former: so that, with regard to their antient religion, they exactly agreed, in worshipping the same supreme deity, under the name of Ejus, or Hesus, falsely said, by Roman authors, to have been Mars, or Mercury. They worshipped him under the emblem of an oak, consecrated that tree more peculiarly to him, and had a great veneration not only for the tree itself, but for its leaves and fruit, especially the mistleto, which they call, to this day, by the old name of gutbyl, or gutbeyl, and ascribe extraordinary virtues to it, especially in epileptic diseases: (A).

SOLEBATCH and DOUGLAS on the mistleto, &c.

(A) This name doth in the old German signify good heal, or good healer, as doth that of mistleto, or rather mistle dha, in the Celtic; though some question whether the word mistle be of Celtic extract. Hence, that which we formerly mentioned out of Pliny, that they called it by a name which signified all heal. The inhabitants of some parts of Upper Germany, who still retain a great number of antient heathenish superstitions, are affirmed to retain the old druidish custom of rambling about, at certain seasons, from town to town, and from house to house, in great troops, rapping at every door and window with hammers, and crying out gutbeyl, gutbeyl, alluding to that verse falsely ascribed to Ovid,

Ad viscum druides, druides clamare solebant:

a Their method of, and time for gathering it, was the same which was observed by the Gauls^b. They held, like them, all other trees, likewise, as sacred, though not in the same degree with the oak; all woods, forests, and deserts, as well as groves, lakes, rivers, fountains, &c. in high veneration. The druids had the sole care and direction in all religious, and the greatest sway and authority in civil matters; only it may be here observed, that though both nations held some sort of women, whom they looked upon as prophetesses, in great esteem; so the Germans seem to have exceeded the Gauls in this kind of superstition, and to have shewn and retained a much greater fondness and veneration for their pretended oracles (B). In other things they were, as far as can be gathered from Cæsar and Tacitus, subject to, and b obliged to receive their directions, like the Gauls, from that grand druid, who, as we hinted in the last chapter, had his residence in England, or some one of the British isles. If there was any difference between the Gauls and Germans in point of religion, it consisted only in this, that the latter, being more fierce and untractable, were not only more full and tenacious of their superstitious rites, but likewise more cruel and inhuman in them. They not only offered the same expiatory human victims, and used them in their auguries, and other parts of their religion, but treated them much more cruelly than they. The Gauls, in some cases, fattened them for one whole year with the finest dainties, put them to a quick death, and sometimes stabbed them unexpectedly in the back: the Germans, on the contrary, made theirs undergo c many grievous indignities and torments, before they dispatched them, some instances of which we have given in the Gaulish history^c, that will hardly bear repeating. Other victims they likewise offered of domestic animals, and of these the horse was reckoned the most acceptable. The flesh of them was, it seems, to be boiled, stewed, or dressed in some other way, in the heart of their groves; the fat and the flesh was served to the votaries, by way of feast, and the blood was sprinkled upon the altar, trees, and by-standers, by way of ablution: but though they did the same by that of human victims, it doth not appear, that they eat the flesh of them. We have formerly observed, likewise, from Cæsar, Tacitus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Athenæus,

In some other parts, especially in Alsace, they give it the name of marensaken, or the bush or shrub of spectres; probably from those magical virtues which were attributed to it, not only by the Germans and Gauls, but much more by the more northern nations; concerning which, the reader may see some extravagant instances in the authors quoted in the margin (1). Among other virtues they attributed to it, that of driving off all shafts and offensive weapons from the person that wore it, or of effectually directing against the person or beast they intended to shoot, was so wise, that they never went even a hunting without it (2).

(B) It is not easy to guess whence this high esteem for those female soothsayers had its rise; but most antient authors agree, that the Germans never undertook any thing of importance without consulting them, and would even forbear fighting an enemy, let the advantage appear ever so great on their side, if those women disapproved of it (3). They seem to have derived this custom from the Celts and Cimmerians, their ancestors, who, as we have formerly observed, looked upon them as inspired (4); and we have likewise mentioned some of them, who are reported to have foretold some very strange events to some of the Roman emperors (5), enough to raise their reputation, not only among their own people, but likewise among the Romans and Greeks.

If we may, however, be permitted to offer a conjecture concerning the origin of this superstition, it seems to have had its rise from this: The Germans, warlike, fierce, and active as they were, and constantly employed either in the martial or hunting trade, might, probably, have committed the care of their sick and wounded to their women, who, having more time and leisure upon their hands, began to study the virtues of herbs, plants, and other medicinal things. From this skill, which they generally intermixed with that of astrology, they might, in time, pretend to greater, and to be able to pry into futurity. The old ones might likewise naturally give into dreams, visions, and other superstitious observations, such as were then practised by almost all other nations; such as the flight of birds, the running of rivers, and the colour of their waters; the entrails of victims, and such-like kinds of sortileges; till they, at length, raised themselves to such credit and admiration, that, if Tacitus may be credited, they were looked upon as a kind of goddesses: and, in particular, that famed one called Velleda, of whom he speaks as of a person deified, and worshipped by the whole German nation (6). Some others are mentioned of like high repute, viz. Aurinia (7), or Alruna, Ganna (8), Festba, Sifa, Thrudur, &c. of which we shall say nothing more, seeing we are quite in the dark about them in every respect, but that of their being spoken of as famed prophetesses among the Germans. The reader may, however, see all the different conjectures of the learned about them, in the authors quoted in the margin (9).

and other antient authors, that the Germans had no temples, but performed their religious rites in groves erected for that purpose or in woods, forests, and desert places; tho' this latter seems to have been practised after their conquest, and to avoid the penalties of those severe edicts which the Roman emperors had issued out against the druids, and their inhuman sacrifices: however that be, temples were not introduced in Germany till long after the Gauls had shewed them the way; and it is plain, that after the former had introduced the worship of Jupiter, Mars, &c. they dedicated still oaks, groves, woods, and whole forests to them, and performed their superstitious rites in them a considerable while before they could be brought to erect temples to them. This is evident, from what Tacitus tells us of the goddess Hertha, one of their antient deities, whose idol was preserved in a wood, or grove, Castum Nemus, upon a covered cart, and had but one priest to minister to her, and the only one who dared come near it. He adds, that whenever the deity had a mind to go out and air herself, or to take a view of mankind, that priest, who was her only confidant, gave notice of it to the whole nation; upon which, nothing was to be seen but feasting and jollity amongst them, whilst she was carried about in her covered car, drawn by two heifers, and attended by the priest above-mentioned. His chief business was to observe when she appeared fatiated with rambling, and to convey her into her sacred grove again^d. He doth indeed mention a temple which he there calls the temple of Tanfana (C), and which, he says, the Romans levelled to the ground: but as in the foregoing instance of Hertha he first calls it a temple, though he says in general, that the Germans had none, and afterwards explains his meaning by calling it a grove, and a private lake; might not this of Tanfana be of the same kind? However, suppose it to have been a real temple, there will be no wonder, that such a building should be erected by the Marfi, or, at least, in their country, and, perhaps, by the Romans, who had, by this time, subdued them^e; for this was in Augustus's reign, about eighty years before the time in which Tacitus wrote. For though this be the only one we read of, yet there might as well have

(C) It will be, in a great measure, labour lost, to inquire who this Tanfana was, whether a German goddess, or the place where the temple was: if the former, her name is quite foreign, and no footsteps are left of her, or her worship, unless our author, or his copiers, mistook Tanfana for Onfana, the name of Minerva among the Gauls.

There are some inscriptions, one in particular, dug up in the neighbourhood of Lyons, in which these words are engraven on a marble stone: Pro salute Dom. N. Imp. L. Sept. Sever. Aug. totiusq; Domus ejus Ausanis Matronis & Matribus Pannoniorum & Delmatarum. T. Cl. Pompeianus, &c. from which a modern antiquary (10) would conclude, that it should be Tanfania, instead of Ausania, as bearing some relation to the goddess Tanfania, whose temple Tacitus here speaks of. But since there are other inscriptions which agree with this, and call these Matres Ausania, his conjecture will hardly be allowed.

Who these Matrone were, is as hard to guess; the author last quoted thinks them to have been campestrian deities, such as presided over woods, rivers, lakes, &c. and were, by this time, worshipped both by the Gauls and Germans, as we have seen in the last chapter: but why such aerial beings should be called Maires and Matrones, cannot well be conceived; and to us it seems more probable that they were those famed druidesses, or prophetesses, of whom we have spoken in the last note, and who, being deified after their death, were still invoked by the living, and had altars, and other inscriptions, reared to them by their votaries, as they were supposed to preside still on health, life, pregnancy, &c. whereas those aerial beings, which were thought to live in, or preside over fire, water, earth, woods, &c. and have been since distinguished by the names of salamanders, sylphs, nymphs, and gnomes, were supposed to have been created from the beginning, and to have had those elements assigned them by the Supreme Being.

Hence we may see whence the Roscrucian notion, so much in vogue still among the Germans, and other northern people, had its rise; and that it is no other than a relic of the old northern heathenism, improved by the enthusiastic help of a warm imagination: for, to this day, the same, and even much more preposterous superstitions, are still preserved, in several parts of Germany, among the vulgar, and much more so as you go farther northwards, especially among the Icelanders, Samojedes, Laplanders, &c. some of which can hardly be read without horror, and might be much better passed over in silence, were it not that they plainly shew to us how far unassisted reason may be depraved and warped, by education and custom; since all the pains that have hitherto been taken, especially since the reformation, have not been able to root it out.

Before we dismiss this subject of these Dea Matris, or Matrona, we beg leave to mention an inscription found upon an altar-stone at Lowther in Westmorland, with these words: DEABUS MATRIBUS TRAMAI TRAMAI VEX CERMA. P. V. R. D. PRO SALUTE, &c. in which a German antiquary has endeavoured to shew, that the word Tramai should be read Tarami, or Taran; Taran being one of the Celtic names of Jupiter (11). But we think our learned Gale (12) hath much better corrected the lection, by reading it Brama, the name of a place in that country, mentioned in the Itinerarium Antonini, and from which these Matres might, in all likelihood, be denominated.

- a been some others built by this time, either in imitation of, or obedience, to the conquering Romans, who, as we have formerly hinted, were very industrious to propagate their religion amongst those nations they subdued. For if, either through complaisance or fear, they once adopted their deities, why might they not, from the same motives, erect also temples to them?

We have already spoken of those inferior ones introduced among the Gauls, such ^{Their deities:} as Jove, or Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Venus, Diana, &c. The same, and ^{Jupiter.} very nearly under the same notion, were adopted by the Germans, though some of them under different names: we shall just mention some of those names and attributes, as they were peculiarly given by the Germans to each of them. Jupiter was worshipped under the name of Tbor, Tharam, or Taran, i. e. the thunderer. This name we have already seen, in the last chapter, was given by the Gauls to Mars, also, on account of the clattering noise of the martial trade. The same was done by the Germans, who gave it to their Odin, or Woden, which was the same deity, as we shall see under the next article. As for the name of Jupiter, we have formerly shewn, that it was never adopted by the Gauls, nor doth it appear to have been so by the Germans: if these had any other names for him than those we have mentioned, they have been since lost, and are not worth seeking further after.

- Mars*, called by them Odin, Othin, and Woden (D), has sometimes been con- ^{Mars, or Odin:} founded with Mercury by the Roman authors, and no wonder, when they were so unacquainted with their language, and could have so little information from them concerning their religion or politics. For the Germans, as well as the Gauls, made it a constant maxim, not to communicate any thing of either to strangers; and hence may be assigned the reason why some of them have even more absurdly imagined this Odin to have been the same with Hesus, or Efusus, the Supreme Deity. The great veneration they observed to be paid to the former, their calling upon him at the beginning of a fight, and vowing to him all the plunder, and even lives, of their enemies, might easily lead those authors to mistake him for the latter. Mars, when his worship came to be adopted, was always, as far as can be gathered from antient monuments, represented in armour, though antiently under the type of a naked sword^a; whereas Hesus was only worshipped under the type of an oak, or even the bare stump of one. Mars was looked upon not only as the god of war, but as the patron and guardian of those who were slain, whose souls the survivors bequeathed to him, in words to this effect, Odin receive thee; mayest thou be with Odin (E)! If you ask what they supposed was to be their employment in that place of bliss which was called by them Valhalla, and of which Odinus was the chief ^{The dispenser of} disposer; some of their antient poets will tell you, that one of them was, to carouse ^{future hap-} with exquisite beer in human skulls, whilst Odinus alone is allowed to drink wine. ^{pinefs.} They were, moreover, to be served by elegant virgins, whose business it was to furnish them with a constant supply of whatever could make them happy and merry; and this notion of a Mohammed's paradise was no small spur to warlike actions, since

(D) This deity had several other names, according to the several offices they attributed to him; such as Walfader, and Wallador, the father of slaughter, and of arms; Sigmundur, the giver of victory, and the like. This of Odin seems derived from the antient word Andun, which signifies exterminator, as they prayed to him to exterminate their enemies. The Gauls did, most likely, give him that of Ollodius, as has been found by an inscription dug up near Aix in Provence, which runs thus: Vigilia Melia Massa filia Marti Olloudio, which last word is thought by some to be of Greek extract, as it was found so near Marseilles, where Greek had been so long introduced; and may be either from ὀλλύω, or ὀλλύμι, to put to death, to destroy (13). In the same sense he is called, by Homer, ὀύλδς, fatal, or murderer; as his chief business, according to the heathen theology, was, to supply hell continually with new-comers.

Yet, after all, it may not improbably be derived from the old Celtic ahll, which signifies beer. For as neither Germans nor Gauls had vines till long after the Romans invaded them, as we have lately shewn, beer was not only their choicest liquor, but they believed, that Mars, or Odin, dispensed it in large quantities to his votaries in the next world, as we shall see by-and-by. So that he might be properly enough called Ollodius, or Ollodius, from thence, that is, the god of strong beer.

(E) It seems from some sepulchral inscriptions, and funeral orations, still extant, that in some of the northern regions they bequeathed the souls of the deceased to Odin, in words to this effect: Odin preserve thee, a dear child, faithful friend, an honest servant, and the like; even after their embracing christianity: and the sending any one to Odin, was reckoned a very kind and good wish, though it is since looked upon, especially by the Suevi, as bad as sending one to the devil (14).

every man's felicity there was to rise in proportion to the number of enemies they a had conquered or killed¹ (F). According to this notion, we need not wonder at their consecrating so great a share, and sometimes all the plunder of their enemies, making him heir of all their wealth, keeper of all their treasure, and often vowing their own lives to him; since they expected to be so amply rewarded by him in the next life, and with such a kind of happiness as best suited with their genius^k.

northern hero
by their historians.

THE German, and other old historians, have since transformed this deity into a northern hero, whom they bring from Asia into Scandinavia, where, after a long and bloody prowess, and a reign stuffed with the greatest wonders, during which he gave them a body of laws, some of which we shall speak of in its proper place, that he might end as he began, and inspire his people with the same contempt of b death, he gave himself a slight wound with an arrow, because he would not go into the other world without one, and soon after died; and, after a magnificent funeral, in which his corpse was laid on a large and magnificent pile, that the brighter and higher the flames ascended, the greater might be his glory among the gods, he was deified as the protector and rewarder of those who die in battle^l. This may, perhaps, have been trumped up to wipe off the imputation of their having given into the Greek and Roman idolatry, and to shew, that they only paid a more than ordinary veneration to their heroes and heroines, some of whom they ranked in the same number as Hercules among the men, and Hertha and Fria, or Friga, among the women. Their mythologists, on the other hand, have split this Odin into two; the c antientest of the two they suppose some to have been Mars, others the sun, and the youngest to have been one of their deified heroes: yet there is no doubt but that one may find a great resemblance between the antient Germans, Suevi, Æstii, &c. and other most distant nations; such, for instance, we may reckon the worship of the goddesses Hertha, mentioned a little higher, which agreed with that which the Romans and others paid to the earth, under the name of Magna deorum mater; or, as Tacitus says of the latter^m, their worship of Fria, or Friga, under that denomination (G).

(F) We have properly no antient author to vouch for this their belief of a Turkish paradise; our authority for it is only taken from some of the oldest northern poets (15), who quoted it from more antient songs and verses of their druids, who, as we have often observed, couched all their religion and history in such kinds of poems, and conveyed them down from one generation to another. To this we may, however, add, this collateral proof, from the general agreement of Greek and Roman authors, that the antient Celtes and Scythians made use of the skulls of their slain enemies to carouse with, and that they were in general, but none more than the Germans, very fond of drinking to excess. So that it is very natural to suppose, the druids would carry this notion of happiness beyond the grave, in order to inspire the people with courage, and a contempt of death.

Accordingly, the famous king Lodbrog is introduced singing his own requiem, in these words, as translated out of Edda, by Bartholine.

Pugnabimus ensibus
Quod Balderi (Odin) patris scamna
Parata scio in aula
Bibemus cerevisiam brevi
Ex concavis crateribus craniorum
Non gemit vir fortis contra mortem
Magnifici in Odini domibus

He concludes thus (17):

Fert animus finire
Invisans me dea
Quas ex Othini aula
Othinus mihi misit
Latus cerevisiam cum Asu (diis)
In summa sede bibam
Vita elapsa sunt hora
Ridens moriar (18).

(G) That historian is, however, contradicted by some German authors, who pretend, that Fria, Friga, or Frejun, was the sun (19). This they pretend to prove by what he adds, that they wore the hoar on their standard, and which, these pretend, was owing to an acceptable sacrifice, which Odinnus had offered of this creature to that planet. But, if they worshipped the sun under the name of Frejun, or Friggon, might they not as well do the same by the moon, under the name of Frea, Fria, and Frigga? And might not the wild boar be as fit a sacrifice to that huntress, as to the sun?

Isis, who was the same with the moon, since Caesar calls the same deity Luna which Tacitus calls Isis, was worshipped by Germans and Gauls, and is affirmed, by the latter historian, to have been the chief deity of the Suevi. He doth, indeed, there say (20), that he could find no footsteps upon what account her worship was there introduced; but supposes, by the figure in which she was represented, viz. that of a ship, or frigate, that it was brought thither from

- a How much of this kind of idolatry they may have had before their becoming acquainted with the Romans, is not easy to say; and we shall gladly refer our readers to what has been already hinted on that head in the history of the Gauls; but after that time, especially after their being subdued by them, there is no doubt but they adopted many of their other deities, as well as a great number of their ceremonies and superstitions. However, it plainly appears, upon the whole, that their antient theology differed much from the mythology of the Romans and Greeks. The Germans, even according to the testimony of Roman writers, neither presumed to confine their deities within temples, nor to represent them under any forms^a, nor admitted into that number any but such as they saw, and received assistance and benefit from; such as the sun, moon, and Vulcan^b, or the god of fire (H). Their veneration for their deified heroes and heroines, and the encomiums they gave them in their poetical performances, extended no farther than to their virtues and heroic exploits, their strength and courage, victories and conquests^c; whereas the Greeks and Romans not only attributed to their deities all their own imperfections, but even sanctified their most monstrous and unnatural vices^d.

THE Germans, as well as Gauls, were early taught, by their druids, two momentous truths, viz. an over-ruling providence, and the immortality of the soul. The misfortune was, that these two noble springs of virtue and religion did not run long uncorrupted; for as, on the one hand, a too eager desire in the people of prying into futurity, and a fatal ambition in their druids and diviners of being thought more intimately acquainted with the ways of that providence, introduced an infinite variety of auguries and superstitions; and some of them, as we have elsewhere hinted, were of the most inhuman and diabolical kind; so, on the other, the belief of a future life and immortality, proved but too fatal a spur to rashness, ambition, and cruelty, especially after they came to imbibe that poisonous notion hinted a little higher, that the surest way to that happiness was, to die in the field of battle; and that their felicity in the next world was to rise according to the number of the enemies they had destroyed in this. For this not only inspired them with a barbarous courage and cruelty in their wars, but made them less solicitous to inquire whether the motives of it were just or unjust. We have already given such instances of these bloody superstitions, in the history of the antient Celts and Scythians^e, and lately in that of the Gauls^f, that our readers, we hope, will easily spare us the trouble of repeating them here, seeing they are all of the same kind, and of such a nature, that they can scarcely be read without horror. Only this we must be bound to add, that, whether the Germans received them from their neighbours, or whether they crept in amongst them by degrees, as they did almost everywhere else, they appear not only to have exceeded other nations in them, but to have retained them much longer than any of those who received the abroad; and it is somewhat strange, since she was worshipped by the Romans under that type, as presiding over the sea, and navigation⁽²¹⁾, and had a set festival in their fasti, that he should conclude from thence, that the Suevi, who were of Celtic extract, and given to navigation, should receive that deity from abroad, which was peculiar to all the Celts. However, therefore, Fris and Frius, Ifu and Mithras, Sol and Luna, Apollo and Diana, may be found confounded in antient historians, on account of their joint influence on earthly things, and their common course in the heavens; yet there is no doubt to be made but they were severally worshipped by all the northern, as well as southern nations; and why not more so than earth, water, rivers, lakes, woods, forests, trees, and plants?

(H) So, at least, that author is understood by most writers. We are, indeed, told, by Plutarch (22), that Viridomarus, a king of the Gauls, who lived above 200 years before our Saviour, having declared war against the Romans, made a vow to consecrate all the arms he took from the enemy to Vulcan: so that if that author be right in the name, the worship of that deity must have been very ancient among the Gauls and Germans. But the misfortune is, as a late writer observes (23), that the Roman writers either mistook the names of those heroes or deities, or mentioned them by the names of such of their own gods as they imagined them to resemble most; by which means, that part of German antiquity is become so intricate, that it can hardly be tied on.

Some inscriptions shew, that they had a deity called Volian, or Volianus, according to the Roman termination. Hence some authors have concluded, that the two branches of the K were worn out, and that the name was originally Volkannus, which supposition is natural enough. But Volian being a Celtic word, which signifies either a furnace, or a fiery forge, the latter may, probably, have been the original name, though hardened since into Vulcan.

gospel (1). One piece of superstition, common to all the Germans and Gauls, was, a never to fight, or undertake any material point, before the moon was full six days old, nor even then, if their soothsayers, who were mostly women, did not like the auguries. These were always consulted, upon all emergencies, as the druids and druidesses were in Gaul. They were always admitted to their councils, bore the greatest sway in them, not only as having the chief management of all their auguries, without which they did not do any thing, but as being esteemed by the whole nation to have been endowed with a prophetic spirit¹.

NEXT in authority to these pretended prophetesses, were the druids, or rather priests. Cæsar says, indeed², that they had no druids, as the Celts; but Tacitus, who was better acquainted with them, speaks frequently of their priests, whose office and authority, according to him, being much the same with the Gaulish druids, shews them to have been the same order of men, though they did not, perhaps, bear the same name. For these priests, he tells us³, were not only admitted to their public councils, but accompanied them in the wars, and bore a great sway in both. For we are told, that they were the only ones who had power to impose silence in those meetings, to reprove or punish offenders, which exactly agrees with what Cæsar says of the Gaulish druids, whose office it was to try, condemn, and even to inflict capital punishment⁴. And hence it may be, that the office of hangman is still in so much request all over Germany, contrary to what we find it in all other christian nations; where they are either taken from the dregs of the people, or, when that fails, some noted delinquent is commonly condemned to it.

As, therefore, one main part of the priests' office among the antient Germans, consisted chiefly in stirring them up to martial deeds, in killing and slaying victims, and very frequently human ones, both in their sacrifices and auguries, in condemning and executing criminals, in punishing lesser offenders with milder punishments, and the like; we need not wonder if the external part of their religion was so void of the Greek and Roman pomp, and so full of every thing that could strike an awful dread on that fierce and warlike people, whose devotion might perhaps be better kept up under the covert of thick and gloomy groves, as well as by the bloody rites performed in them, than by all the ornaments of Greek and Roman temples, and the pageantry of their ceremonies and dress. It is therefore no small wonder, that such men should chuse a garb so contrary to their butcherly trade, and to affect to be clad in white, and not rather in the deepest crimson: and may not this contrast be a kind of proof, that their office at first was of a quite different nature, and that from singing the praises of their Creator, and of their famed heroes, or killing, perhaps, some few harmless creatures, in honour to them; their ambition, and thirst of rule over an untractable people, made them degenerate, by degrees, into this pitch of arbitrary power and cruelty? But we offer this only as a conjecture, which is not, however, without some foundation, if we consider, that they received their religion from the same fountain that the Perfes, Brachmans, and other Indian sects, did, who yet, either from their living, perhaps, in milder climes, or from a more conscientious adhering to their primitive institution, have ever been justly famed for a character the most opposite to theirs.

Their laws and government.

As for their antient laws and government, we can only say, that they discover those evident marks by which men, by degrees, were forced to form themselves into societies for their general good and preservation; to have magistrates to govern and protect them in times of peace, and generals to command and lead them in war. This, considering the extent of their territories, and their fierce and warlike genius, prevented their being long united into one common state, whatever they might have been originally. But every tribe of them had its own form of government, independent from the rest, except, perhaps, that they had some laws in common, for the contracts, carnal commerce with demons, and a number of other heathenish forgeries, which cannot be rooted out from among the vulgar of both; all which plainly appear to be owing to their tenaciousness of, and fondness for, the old leaven of the antient Celtic superstition.

(1) Hence all that sad trade of witchery and sorceries still in vogue among the more northern parts; the divining wand, to find out mines, thieves, and murderers, among the southern; their notions of fairies, and other aerial beings, some of a benevolent, others of a malevolent nature; of apparitions, charms, enchantments, fascination, magical and diabolical

- a better union and preservation of the whole body against foreign enemies, or to keep up a kind of balance amongst themselves, that one nation should not grow too strong for the rest: in other things each canton held their national councils at least once a year, that is, in the spring, and oftener, if need required; and there deliberated about peace or war, the choice of magistrates, and other annual officers, both civil and military; the sending out of colonies or auxiliaries, and other such points, according to their present exigence^r. And these assemblies were so exactly observed, that, we are told, the last comer to them was sure to lose his life (K). It is very likely also, that all other matters relating to property, crimes, and such-like, were here also finally determined by the plurality of votes, rather than by any body
- b of laws they can be supposed to have had in these early days. Liberty, being by them looked upon as the *summum bonum*², made them exceeding watchful against every thing that looked like an infringement of it; and as they were too impatient to go through the fatigues of long law-suits, they rather chose to have them decided at once by such an assembly, and sometimes by single combat, rather than stay for their next meeting. These assemblies were commonly accompanied with sumptuous banquets, as they were judged to promote friendship and mutual confidence, to inspire men with greater freedom of speech, and open a door to wholesome counsels^s. In those states which were under a kingly government, as a great many of them were, they applied to the prince only in matters of smaller moment; but in those
- c which concerned the whole nation, to the grand council of it^b: neither allowed they any other revenues to those monarchs but a part of the fines, and such free-will offerings as the people thought fit to make to them of cattle, and the fruits of the earth; so that they had little else to keep up their grandeur, except their hereditary estates^c. Their expence was, indeed, inconsiderable, because all their subjects, fit to bear arms, were obliged to follow them into the field, and their nobles thought it an honour to make part of their retinue; upon which account these had the free use of the prince's table, and were sometimes presented with a horse, or some of his arms^d. The subjects were distinguished into several ranks, or classes, such as nobles, free-born, freed-men, and bondsmen; in each of which classes those were still most
- d esteemed, who had signalized themselves best, by their courage, conduct, or any laudable exploit^e. As for their other laws, if any such they had compiled in a body, they were rather preserved by tradition and custom, than kept upon record, since we have often observed they made it a constant maxim, not to commit any thing to writing. But that some such laws they had, is apparent from this, that they still retained many of them, even after those of the Romans had been introduced amongst them. Judges they likewise had of their own, and their office was held in such esteem, that men of the highest rank were promoted to it, as well as those of the greatest probity, years, and discretion: even their princes sometimes took it upon them. Every judge had, it seems, a number of assessors, with whom
- e he might consult upon occasion; whence, probably, the office of scabinus, or sheriff, had its rise^f.

THESE general assemblies were antiently held in the open country; for the Germans despised cities and fortresses, as monuments of servitude, rather than places of defence; and were some of the latest of the Europeans that either built any for themselves, or would take refuge in them: so that, whenever they were obliged to fight an enemy, they always chose to do it in the open field, and, when worsted, to retire into woods, marshes, and inaccessible places, where they could get provision for their cattle, and keep their pursuers at a distance; rather than to shelter themselves in towns, and fortified places, where they might be caught, as in a trap.

f It was, moreover, a common saying among them, that even wild beasts would lose

(K) This, we are told, they did in imitation of the cranes, to which they, as well as the Gauls, in their auguries, paid a singular regard: and as these birds are said by naturalists to shift their habitations every year, and to appoint a general rendezvous, in order to take their flight, and to kill the last comer to the place; so they did the same by him who came last to the general assembly (24).

all their strength and courage, if penned up^a. And we are told, that this custom subsisted in Gaul till the eighth century, and much longer in Germany^b (L). The whole nation being, moreover, naturally of a warlike genius, and esteeming cowardice as the greatest reproach and disgrace that could be thrown upon them, all such fenced cities and fortified places were looked upon by them as so many shameful asylums for the weak and pusillanimous to flee to, and they, consequently, despised them, as unworthy a brave people, who always scorned to take any advantage of their enemy, whether of weapons, intrenchments, discipline, stratagems, or, indeed, of any other kind but those of strength and bravery, intrepidity, and an invincible love of liberty. It was in these that they solely trained up their youth, leaving all other arts of gaining a superiority to those of their enemies to whom the want of these martial virtues rendered them more necessary. Accordingly, no nation could take more care than they did to inure them to all hardships (M), to inspire them with a contempt of danger, and even of death, and to rear them up to martial deeds. This was their chief and surest road to wealth, honour, and preferment, and, as their priests taught them, even to the greatest happiness in a future life^c. It was for this that the ambitious amongst them neglected agriculture, and despised all mercantile and mechanic employments^k, how necessary and advantageous soever, and obliged all who were able to bear arms to go into the field. Hence it was that they were never at a loss how to raise, in a very short time, such powerful and numerous armies either to repulse an enemy, or to assist their friends and allies^l: for whenever any country was disengaged from a war, the ablest soldiers were sent into foreign service, not singly, or according to their own option, but in considerable bodies, and under the command of such officers as were set over them by the state; by which means, the whole nation not only shared in the honour of their exploits, but was likewise furnished with more experienced generals. Another advantage was reaped from it, viz. that, when a canton or state became too populous, they could draw out such numbers as could be spared, to go and seek out new habitations; and these, by being trained up to the trade of war, could the better fight their way through, and maintain themselves in those countries which they had the good fortune to settle in^m.

Their cavalry,

THEY had but little cavalry, in proportion to their foot, in which they placed^d the main of their strength; but what they had of the former was extremely well disciplined, though their horses were, it seems, inferior to those of the Romans, either in bigness, swiftness, or dexterity, as well as in those evolutions which were so artfully used by the latterⁿ. As for saddles and stirrups, they were quite neglected, by both Gauls and Germans, who were accustomed to mount and dismount by

(L) We have formerly seen, that both antient Germans and Gauls lived in a kind of cantons, or villages, with their houses and grounds about them, at a convenient distance from each other, that every family might have land enough for themselves and their cattle (25); and that, as soon as they had gathered in their harvest, they generally removed to new habitations. But when they came to be either conquered by the Romans, or enslaved, perhaps, by some of their ambitious princes; either of these were forced to build castles, fortresses, and fenced cities, to keep them in awe, and deprive them of all possible means of regaining their liberty. And hence proceeded their aversion to all such strong places, as tending only to bring and hold them the faster in slavery. But as necessity, in process of time, obliged them to have their cities, castles, &c. for their own defence and preservation, they fell into the same superstition with the Greeks and Romans, of dedicating them to certain deities, and even personifying and apotheosing them, and to celebrate a kind of anniversary of their foundation: which custom lasted till long after their embracing christianity, as appears from many antient inscriptions, which the reader may find in Gruter's collection, and from sundry prohibitions of christian bishops against all future observances of them (26).

(M) We are even told, that those who lived nearest the Rhine, or any other rivers, used to dip their children, as soon as born, into them, in order to knit and harden their limbs (27). We have, indeed, formerly observed, from Julian the apostate (28), that the waters of that river were supposed to have some peculiar virtue above others, inasmuch that they threw their children into it whenever they had any suspicion of their mothers fidelity. Whether our authors mistook the design, or confounded the one with the other, we cannot affirm; but it is very probable, that if any such custom they had, it was rather introduced on a persuasion, that such children who were not proof against the severity of such a trial, were not worth the rearing up, and might as well be left to be swallowed up by the waves.

a their own agility, and could, whenever occasion required, fight as well on foot as on horseback (N). In their order of battle, every canton and district were placed together, that every one of them might reap either the glory or disgrace of fighting valiantly or cowardly, which was no small spur to them to behave in such a manner as might be a credit to their own tribe; and, by this means, they commonly fought in several distinct bodies. We are told, indeed, that some of them, especially the Cimbri, formed their whole infantry into one square battalion, and placed their wives, children, and baggage, behind a fence made of their waggons: as soon as every thing was ready for the onset, the signal was given, which was answered by an universal shout, which was redoubled in a most dreadful manner, till they came to close engagement. They used no art or stratagems in fighting, but placed their whole confidence in a joint and furious onset on the enemy, and continuing it with a desperate intrepidity, till they had either won or lost the day; by which means, if they once met with a stout repulse, or were put into disorder, they seldom knew how to rally again, but became stupified and desperate, and either fought till they died, or else betook themselves to flight; for it was reckoned so inglorious amongst them to yield themselves prisoners, that we read but of few instances of their doing so, in comparison to those in which they died with sword in hand. Time and experience did, indeed, at length teach them to trust less to their own strength and courage, and to study a little more the Roman discipline, and art of fighting. But they began too late: had they done so from the beginning, they might, perhaps, have continued unconquered to this day.

THEIR weapons were likewise vastly inferior to those of the Romans; the cavalry had their shields and spears in common with the foot, but the latter had, besides, their darts, bows and slings, and seldom had recourse to their pikes and swords. Helmets, armour, and coats of mail, were generally despised amongst them; some of them did even affect to fight naked: so that if any such armour was worn amongst them, it was rather for distinction, than defence: upon which account, they adorned them with the horns and heads of some wild beasts. Hence those frightful figures which Plutarch observed among the Cimbrian cavalry, some of which are still to be seen upon the seals and arms of those antient times. Their shields, which they distinguished only by different colours, or some particular emblem, were reckoned so sacred amongst them, that they looked upon it as the greatest disgrace to lose them in fight; because none durst appear either at their religious ceremonies, public assemblies, or even funerals, without them (O). Their arms were esteemed their favourite furniture, and chiefest ornament; they never appeared in public without them, and nothing was so earnestly wished for by their youth, as the day in which they became qualified to bear them. The sword was so sacred amongst them, that no oaths were reckoned more binding than those they took upon a naked one; neither did they appear in public, or assist at any solemn rite, without their sword, shield, and spear. We are even told, that they wore them at their familiar visits, banquets, religious dances, and the like. When they sat down, they had their sword by their side, and a servant behind, to hold their shield and spear; and when they rose, every one took them up again: in a word, they looked upon themselves as wedded to their arms; and when they had worn them from their youth to their extremest old age, they commonly caused them to be burnt or buried with them, when they died. It was on account of this excessive

(N) This plainly appears, by Cæsar's own confession (29), who owns, moreover, that he had them in most of his wars; and often boasts of the great services he received from them (30).

(O) Tacitus adds, that they were forced to live in disgrace all the remainder of their days, and excluded from the company of men; insomuch that they chose often to put an end to both by a voluntary death (31). He tells us farther, that the Suevi were the only people in all Germany where private men had not the liberty to wear their arms, or even to keep them at home; and the reason he gives is, that they lived under arbitrary princes, who, to maintain themselves in their tyranny, stripped their subjects of them, and put them under the custody of their favourite creatures (32).

regard they paid to their warlike weapons, as well as from their antient custom of a rearing a sword, pike, or spear, at the head of their army, round about which they all gathered themselves to perform their devotions, that they were supposed to worship them^a; though it is plain, that they only worshipped the Deity, or, at most, the god Mars, since adopted their grand patron and protector, under these types: but, upon the whole, it appears, that both Celts and Scythians, and all their descendants, were accustomed to wear their arms, as well in the time of the profoundest peace, as in war; which was also practised by all the Greeks, Persians, and other antient nations^b (P).

IN their sieges of places they were likewise vastly inferior to the Greeks and Romans, whether in the offensive or defensive, being strangers to those destructive instruments which were used by the latter, such as towers and circumvallations, battering-rams, mining and counter-mining; and, placing the stress of their confidence in their missile weapons, as darts and stones, and their vigorous assaults and scalings, or in a resolute and intrepid resistance, if these failed, as they too often did, especially when they were engaged against the well-disciplined and artful Romans, who, besides that they used all these, and many other such warlike engines, in the greatest perfection, were likewise expert in a great variety of stratagems, with which the Germans were wholly unacquainted, they fell immediately into confusion, and became an easy prey to them. Hence the native strength and valour of the latter is the more conspicuous, as they defended themselves so long, and so bravely, against such powerful and dexterous enemies, and at length conquered them by their own arts^c.

Punishments.

FROM what we have seen we may infer, that the Germans in general, though too long unacquainted with the art of war, did yet observe a strict discipline with their soldiery; and that cowardice and neglect of duty were severely punished amongst them: they were not, indeed, so strict in other cases, but adapted their punishments to the different purposes of the commonwealth; were severe against some offences, and remiss towards others; insomuch, that even murder was not esteemed capital amongst them^a, but was punished by such a fine, of great or small cattle, as was deemed a sufficient compensation to the family for their loss. In disputes and accusations, whenever the case appeared dubious or intricate, they had two expeditious ways of deciding the matter; the one by their pretended divine auguries, and the other by single combat; for in either of these they looked upon Providence as the chief director, and therefore submitted to its unerring judgment. When, therefore, Varus endeavoured to introduce the Roman laws among them, we are told, that they refused it; alledging, that it was their way to decide all their controversies by the sword^b; and this custom continued amongst them several hundred years^c.

Sciences.

SCIENCES they were altogether strangers to, if we except those who lived by the sea-coasts, and had made some considerable progress not only in navigation, and building of ships, but probably, also, in some branches of astronomy, as well by observation, as by their converse with other more polite nations: the rest were all rude and ignorant, and it is even doubted whether they knew the use of letters (Q).

(P) It is not unlikely, that not only the Persians, but likewise the antient Greeks and Romans, had this custom from the old Celts. However, the two last, when they came to form themselves into more regular societies, and under a wholesome set of laws, probably abrogated this custom, and permitted the people to carry their arms, in time of peace, only at their public spectacles, games, &c. (33).

(Q) At least Tacitus, who knew them best, and may be supposed to have been conversant with the politic sort, tells us, that neither men nor women knew any thing of them (34); unless by litterarum se-

creta be meant something more than the bare knowledge of letters, which is not unlikely; since he tells us, in the same book, that both they and the Switzers made use of the Greek characters (35); which is also confirmed by Cæsar (36), and by some antient coins and inscriptions written in that character (37).

We have already taken notice, that the Gauls probably received that character from the Greek colony that settled at Marseilles (38); from whence it might easily pass into Switzerland, and thence into Germany, and have been adopted by these for the same reason that they were by the Gauls; and this is the

- a Their greatest skill in physic consisted in the knowledge and use of certain plants and roots found out by observation and experience, in which these pretenders intermixed a deal of superstitious trash; such as the time of the moon for gathering and applying them, charms, and other occult quackeries, which served only to amuse and raise the admiration of the vulgar. Music and poetry were much better cultivated amongst them, though one would be apt to judge their tongue too harsh and inharmonious for the one, and for the other. But besides that such foreign languages appear more so to us than to the natives, we may reasonably suppose, that both their music and poetry being adapted to the genius of the German nation and tongue, their harshness might be looked upon rather as a majestic beauty, than a defect:
- b however that be, they had a set of men whose business it was to couch the heroic deeds of their warriors in lyric poems, and to sing them to the people, upon proper occasions, as the Gauls did of theirs^d. And as martial deeds were the common topic of these verses, and one part of the instrumental music, which accompanied it, was the clattering their swords against their shields, it is no wonder Julian the apostate, whose ears were accustomed to more gentle and harmonious strains, gives such a frightful account both of the German tongue, music, and poetry^e.

- THEIR sports, games, and exercises, were all, likewise, of the masculine kind, and fit to inure them to the martial trade. The youth performed them naked, and with incredible agility, such as running, shooting, swimming, leaping, and the like. Some equestrian exercises were much in vogue with them, as they were extraordinary horsemen; they were likewise fond of gaming, to such a degree, that, when they had lost all they were worth, they would venture even their liberty upon one cast more of the dice^f. Manufactures were not introduced very early amongst them, that of linen excepted, which was, perhaps, one of the first, if not the only one they cultivated, for a considerable time, as it was the favourite dress of their women, priests, and men of quality^g. Their original dress, when they came first to cover themselves, were the skins of beasts (R); the Germans and Britons seem to have been some of the last who exchanged them for cloaths made of flax and wool: these they did not wear long and full, as the Sarmatians, but short and strait, and fit to display every limb of their body^h. As they became more acquainted with the Romans, they not only improved in their dress, and the manner of weaving, flowering, and embroidering those stuffs of which they were madeⁱ, but adopted a great number of manufactures, in which they have since excelled other nations: for it was their contempt of such trades, and not their want of a capacity for them, which made them be so long neglected, as beneath a martial genius; but when they came to take them up, they soon convinced the world, that their country seemed cut out to produce the best artificers; and we may add, that, in the number and variety of

With respect to the Germans being ignorant of the liberal sciences, we must except what a later author says of the Goths (39), that a Grecian philosopher, named Dicæneus, finding in them a fit capacity for philosophy, astronomy, &c. took the pains to instruct them in every branch of them: for if that be true, the Germans could not be long without them. But our author, who was a Goth, is too justly suspected of partiality for his own nation, in many other particulars as well as this, to be relied on. As for the Germans, it plainly appears, that literature of any kind was not introduced amongst them till even some centuries after him, as we have shewn in the last chapter (40).

(R) These were called by several names, according to those nations among which they were worn. In some parts of Germany they were called remo, which Cluverius thinks is derived from the rein-deer, whose skins they made their garments of (41). In others, mastruga; supposed to have been called so because it made those who wore them appear like monsters (42), or brutes in human shape. Tacitus adds, that the only distinction between men of quality and the vulgar consisted in the richness and fineness of those furs (43).

And here it will not be amiss to take notice of a merry jest which some Greeks, settled in Scythia, had endeavoured to impose upon Herodotus, as a serious truth; viz. that the Neuri, a northern nation, were once a year changed into wolves, and, after some time, resumed their own shape (44). He doth indeed own, that he could hardly give credit to it; but it is plain they only imposed on his too great credulity in this point, as they did in some others, particularly where they told him that on the other side the Danube the air was, at some seasons, so full of feathers, meaning of snow, that a man could scarce see two yards before him. Wolves, it is certain, were in such quantities, and so dangerous, in all these northern countries, that the inhabitants were forced curious mechanic inventions, they have outdone all the world (S). They did not so soon give into the liberal arts, or even that of writing: we are told, that Charles the great caused some of their old barbarous poems, which they till then only sung by heart, and contained the actions of their antient kings and heroes, to be committed to writing for their use, and to encourage them to learn to read^k. The Saxons had such a contempt for letters, that they refused to learn to read the gospels till they were put into verse, and set to such tunes as they could easily sing^l. Even their laws were not, it seems, reduced to writing till about the 12th or 13th century^m: which plainly shews that their runæ, or letters (T), are not of so antient a date as some moderns have imagined.

Robustness.

BEFORE we finish this section, it will not be amiss to say something concerning the character and genius of the antient Germans, which was pretty near the same through all that large country. They are generally described to us by Greek and Roman authors as resembling one another, and differing from other nations by the largeness of their stature, ruddy complexion, blue eyes, and yellow and bushy hair, haughty and threatening looks, strong constitutions, and proof against hunger, cold, and all kinds of hardshipⁿ. Nothing could be more conducive to their bodily strength than their coarse diet, their living in huts rather than houses, their constant and strenuous exercises, and inuring themselves betimes to all kinds of fatigue; to which Tacitus joins another thing, which is not, perhaps, quite so authentic, viz. their drinking of strong liquors made of barley or wheat^o, and which they drank in large quantities. Cæsar adds, that their animal spirits not being exhausted in their youth by study, learning, or any troublesome occupations, nor enervated by early amours and gallantry, their bodies were more apt to grow large and robust^p. Pliny attributes much of this to the temperateness of their climate^q; but though it be true, that the perspiration is not so copious in such cold countries, yet it may be much doubted whether this doth so much contribute to the growth and strength of

to destroy them as fast as they could. Their skins they probably dressed, and made them into close garments, to wear during the winter, and, when spring came on, they exchanged them for some lighter habit: and this is all that could be meant by this pretended transformation. Unless we will suppose, not without some probability, that those Greeks had so far corrupted their native language, by their long abode in Scythia, that our author, naturally fond of wonders, understood them quite differently from what they meant.

(S) Amongst these, that of clocks, watches, and other such kind of useful and curious machinery, they have been long since famed for; but for none more than for the noble art of printing, which was found out at Mentz, soon after the year 1440, by John Fust, or Faust, a citizen of that place, and improved by his son-in-law, Peter Shœffer, and from thence propagated, by some of his countrymen, through all the famous cities of Europe, in less than half a century (45).

In speaking of this noble and useful invention, we cannot pass by a pathetic reply which a German made to a Frenchman, who allowed, indeed, that the Germans were generally good mechanics, but in other cases, said, that they had but a low and groveling genius, and no wit. To which the German gravely asked the following question: "Pray, Sir, which of the two nations shewed the brighter genius; ours, which invented the art of printing; or yours, which condemned the inventor of it to the flames for a conjurer?" For it plainly appears, that the parliament of Paris had condemned John

Faust to be burnt for magic, and that he with great difficulty obtained his pardon, at the expence of discovering his new invention to the archbishop of Paris (46).

(T) The runæ, or antient characters, are supposed to have been called so ab incidendo, from cutting out, because they were either cut out of wooden blocks, or cut into the bark of some trees (47), and in a very rude manner. The antientest author who appears to have made mention of those runæ, is Venantius Fortunatus, who lived about the beginning of the 6th century; he speaks of them as being used by the Franks, whose manner of writing, as well as of the Goths, was as yet but coarse and uncouth. He gives us their method of painting, or rather gravating them upon wooden planks, which were called runæ. The Germans have retained the same etymon in their language, in calling their letters buchstaben, which implies their being engraven on wood, and in strait lines (48). It has been much disputed whether those letters were Latin or Greek, and much has been urged on both sides; but a sepulchral inscription, dug up at Rome, and the only one, perhaps, that has been preserved of that old character, shews them to have been mostly Greek, with here and there a Roman one (49). Some old coins also confirm it, in some of which the legend is wholly Greek, and, in others, partly that, and partly Latin (50). And this is, in all probability, the character which is, by Venantius abovequoted, called the runic, and was, at that time, common to all the Europeans; only among the northern nations they were very coarse and ill-shaped, in comparison of the rest.

a their inhabitants : on the contrary, experience shews, that there are very small people in some of the coldest climates, as in Lapland; and very gigantic ones in some of the warmest, as among some of the Ethiopians, as the same author justly observes. What may have farther contributed to the strength and stature of the Germans, was, their never or rarely intermarrying with other nations, nor adopting any of their soft customs; by which means, they transmitted these qualities to their children pure and uncorrupted^r.

THEIR native disposition displayed itself chiefly in their martial genius, and in Valour and their singular fidelity. The former of these they did indeed carry to such an excess, fidelity. as came little short of downright ferocity; but as to the latter, they not only valued

b themselves highly upon it, but were greatly esteemed by other nations for it; insomuch that Augustus, and several of his successors, committed the guard of their persons to them, and almost all other nations either courted their friendship and alliance, or hired them as auxiliaries: though it must be owned, at the same time, that their extreme love of liberty, and their hatred of tyranny and oppression, has often hurried them to treachery and murder, especially when they have thought themselves ill used by those who hired them: for, in all such cases, they were easily stirred up, and extremely vindictive. In other cases, Tacitus tells us, they were noble, magnanimous, and beneficent, without ambition to aggrandize their dominions, or invading those from whom they received no injury; rather chusing to c employ their strength and valour defensively, than offensively; to preserve their own, than to ravage their neighbours^s. Their friendship and intercourse was rather Hospitality.

a compound of honest bluntness and hospitality, than of wit, humour, or gallantry.
All strangers were sure to meet with a kind reception from them, to the utmost of their ability; even those who were not in a capacity to entertain them, made it a piece of duty to introduce them to those who could; and nothing was looked upon as more scandalous and detestable, than to refuse them either the one, or the other^t.
They do not seem, indeed, to have had a taste for grand and elegant entertainments; they affected in every thing, in their houses, furniture, diet, &c. rather plainness and simplicity, than sumptuousness and luxury. If they learned of the d Romans and Gauls the use of money, it was rather because they found it more convenient than their antient way of bartering one commodity for another; and then they preferred those antient coins which had been stamped during the times of the Roman liberty, especially such as were either milled or cut in the rims, because they could Money.
not be so easily cheated in them, as in some others, which were frequently nothing but copper, or iron, plated over with silver. This last metal they likewise preferred before gold, not because it made a greater shew, but because it was more convenient for buying and selling^u. And as they became, in time, more scared by, or more useful to the Romans, so they learned how to draw enough of it from them to supply their whole country, besides what flowed to them from other nations.

e As they despised superfluities in other cases, so they did also in the connubial way;
every man was contented with one wife (U), and both were so faithful to each other, Marriages.
and chaste, true, and disinterested, in their conjugal affections, that Tacitus prefers their manners, in this respect, to those of the Romans. The men sought not dowries from their wives, but bestowed them upon them^v. Their youth, in those cold climes, did not begin so soon to feel the warmth of love, as they do in hotter ones; and it was a common rule with them, not to marry young; and those were most esteemed, who continued longest in celibacy; because they looked upon it as an effectual means to make them grow tall and strong: and to marry, or be concerned with a woman, before they were full twenty years old, was accounted shameful wantonness^w. They have been, indeed, unjustly taxed with permitting a promiscuous Unjustly char- and unnatural commerce of parents with their children, brothers with their sisters, ged with in- and the like; but the only thing that seems to have given a colour to this pretended cessuous com- merce.

incestuous mixture was, their living together in their plain and homely cottages, and the whole family lying promiscuously in the straw, and stark-naked : which custom, though shocking to more polite nations, yet, being natural to them, was much more likely to restrain such unnatural commerce, than to give birth to it. But though they did lie thus together in the same hut, yet we can scarcely doubt but nature taught them to observe some decency ; and that the husband and wife lay in some corner apart, and the boys and girls at a convenient distance from each other. We may add, that such a brutish intermixture is quite opposite to that care which they took to keep their youth chaste and unmarried, till after twenty ; and to that conjugal fidelity for which they are so justly admired. The women shared with their husbands not only the care of their family, and the education of their children, but even the hardships of war. They attended them in the field, dressed their victuals for them, dressed their wounds, stirred them up to fight manfully against their enemies, and sometimes have, by their courage and bravery, recovered a victory, when it was upon the point of being snatched from them. In a word, they looked upon such constant attendance on them not as a servitude, like the Roman dames, but as a duty, and an honour. We find, in most parts of Germany, especially where vassalage is still in use, some notable relics of this antient female submission ; we have even lately seen some remarkable, and, as they appeared to us, shocking instances of it here, in those Palatines and Saltsburghers whom persecution and distress drove hither for shelter ; young, hale, and lusty fellows, fauntering along, with their pipes in their mouths, and a staff under their arm, whilst their obsequious wives trudged and sweated after them, under a load of their cloaths, and other lumber, and a child or two in their arms (W). But what appears to have been still a harder fate upon the antient German dames was, that their great Odinus excluded all those from his valballa, or paradise, who did not, by some violent death, follow their deceased husbands thither. We shall have occasion to speak of it in the next paragraph, and conclude this with an observation, that, notwithstanding their having been antiently in such high repute for their wisdom, and supposed spirit of prophecy, and their continuing such faithful and tender helpmates to their husbands, yet they sunk, in time, so low in their esteem, that, according to the old Saxon law, he that hurt or killed a woman, was to pay but half the fine that he should have done, if he had hurt or killed a man.

THEIR funerals. THERE is scarcely any one thing in which the Germans, though so nearly allied in most of their other customs to the Gauls, were yet more opposite to them than in their funerals. We have shewn, in the last chapter, with what pomp and profusion the latter performed theirs : those of the former were done with the same plainness and simplicity which they affected in all other things : the only grandeur they affected in them was, to burn the bodies of their great men with some peculiar kinds of wood ; but then the funeral pile was neither adorned with the cloaths and other fine furniture of the deceased, nor perfumed with fragrant herbs and gums : each man's armour, that is, his sword, shield, and spear, were flung into it, and sometimes his riding-horse. The Danes did, indeed, fling into the funeral of a prince, gold, silver, and other precious things, which the chief mourners, who walked, in a gloomy guise, round the fire, exhorted the by-standers to fling liberally into it, in honour of the deceased. They afterwards deposited their ashes in urns, like the Gauls, Romans, and other nations ; as it plainly appears, from the vast numbers which have been dug up all over the country, as well as from the sundry dissertations which have been written upon them by several learned moderns of that nation, a list and account of which the reader may see in the author last quoted. One thing we may observe, in general, that, whatever sacrifices they offered for their dead, whatever presents they made to them at their funerals,

(W) We have ourselves taken upon us to reprove their husbands for it, and told them, in a friendly manner, that our nation was much offended at it ; but have been gravely answered, by their passive dames, that it was the fashion of their country, and that it would cast a much greater disgrace on their good men to help them off with any share of the burden. And what appeared still more surprising was, when these poor women have been offered a draught of ale or beer to refresh them, they have desired it might be given to their husbands, for that themselves could drink water : so great is the force of education and custom.

a and whatever other superstitious rites they might perform at them, all was done in consequence of those excellent notions which their antient religion had taught them, the immortality of the soul, and the bliss or misery of a future life^c.

It is impossible, indeed, as they did not commit any thing to writing till very lately, and as none of the antient writers have given us any account of it, to guess how soon this belief of their great Odin, and his paradise, was received among them. ^{Notion of the state of souls after death.}

It may, for aught we know, have been older than the times of Tacitus, and he have known nothing of it, by reason of their scrupulous care of concealing their religion from strangers: but as they conveyed their doctrines to posterity by songs and poems, and most of the northern poets tell us, that they have drawn their intelligence from those very poems which were still preserved among them; we may, rightly enough, suppose, that whatever doctrines are contained in them, were formerly professed by the generality of the nation, especially since we find their antient practice so exactly conformable to it. Thus, since the surest road to this paradise was, to excel in martial deeds, and to die intrepidly in the field of battle, and since none were excluded from it but base cowards, and betrayers of their country, it is natural to think, that the signal and excessive bravery of the Germans flowed from this antient belief of theirs: and, if their females were so brave and faithful, as not only to share with their husbands all the dangers and fatigues of war, but, at length, to follow them, by a voluntary death, into the other world; it can hardly be attributed to any thing else but a strong persuasion of their being admitted to live with them in that place of bliss. This belief, therefore, whether received originally from the old Celts, or afterwards taught them by this, since deified Odin, seems, from their general practice, to have been universally received by all the Germans, though they might differ one from another in their notions of that future life (X). In general, they seem to have had a twofold notion of this future state, the one to precede, and the other to come after, what they called, in their language, ragna rockur, or the crepuscule of the gods, or heroes; by which they meant the consummation of all things by a general conflagration^d. So that, according to them, there was to be a future life of bliss and misery, till the destruction of the world; and another which was to follow it presently after, when a new sun, new heavens, and a new earth, were to be created, and in them a place of endless happiness for the good, and another of endless misery for the bad: which notion one would be apt to imagine they had imbibed from the christians, did it not appear, from Seneca, to have been the doctrine of the stoics; unless we should suppose that author had it rather from some of the apostles^e, or their disciples, than from his own sect (Y). However that be, some of the circumstances, which these old Germans believed would attend this general conflagration, seem to us to have been taken from the apocalypse, and adapted to their own antient notions and taste: we shall give our readers some few instances of this in the margin (Z), they being scarcely worth mentioning any-where.

(X) What the bliss of this paradise consisted in, we have already seen; but, besides this, there are some notions attributed to them, by these writers lately mentioned, which do not seem to square altogether with it (51): such as that of the transmigration of souls, which, if we may believe some antient christian writers (52), Pythagoras received from them. We have shewn, in the last chapter, that the Gauls were unjustly charged with adopting the same notion; and the same thing may, for aught appears, have been done with respect to the Germans. But if these had any such belief amongst them, it can only be reconciled with that of Odin's paradise, by supposing the latter to be reserved for their brave and enterprising heroes; whilst the rest, who had no title to it, were left to transmigrate from body to body, more or less noble and happy, according to their merit or demerit, in a continual rotation, till the consummation of all things.

(Y) It is not to be doubted, that the doctrine of a general conflagration was believed by many antient nations, as we have had occasion to shew at the beginning of this work; but Seneca, in the place last quoted, speaks of it in such a manner, as makes one believe he had conversed with some christians, or, at least, some Jewish rabbis, from whom he had adopted many particulars, which the stoics, till then, knew nothing of.

(Z) They tell you, among other things, the old earth, being thus destroyed, a new one is to start up out of the sea, which will produce all things, necessary and delightful to its inhabitants; and that the males and females which escape the general destruction are quickly to replenish it with a more hopeful where else. We shall finish this section with observing, that the notion of a future a happiness obtained by martial exploits, especially by dying sword in hand, made them bewail the fate of those who lived to an old age, as dishonourable here, and hopeless hereafter: upon which account, they had a barbarous way to send them packing into the other world, willing or not willing. And this custom lasted several ages after their receiving christianity, especially among the Prussians and Venedi; the former of whom, it seems, dispatched, by a quick death, not only their sick children, servants, &c. but even their parents, and sometimes themselves^f: and of the latter we have instances of this horrid paricide being practised even in the beginning of the 14th century^g. All that need be added is, that, if those persons, thus supposed to have lived long enough, either desired to be put to death, or, at least, b seemed cheerfully to submit to what they knew they could not avoid, their exit was commonly preceded with a feast, and their funeral with another; but if they endeavoured to shun it, as it sometimes happened, both ceremonies were performed with the deepest mourning. In the former they rejoiced at their deliverance, and being admitted into bliss; in the latter they bewailed their cowardly excluding themselves from it. Much the same thing was done towards those wives who betrayed a backwardness to follow their dead husbands. We need not here observe, that, in these funerals, as well as in all their other feasts, they were famed for drinking to excess; and one may say of them, above all the other descendants of the ancient Celtes, that their hospitality, banquets, &c. consisted much more in the c quantity of strong liquors, than in the elegance of eating. Beer, and strong mead, which were their natural drink, were looked upon as the chief promoters of health, strength, fertility, and bravery; upon which account, they made no scruple to indulge themselves to the utmost in them, not only in their feasts, and especially before an engagement, but even in their common meals. Tacitus tells us, that they could bear neither heat nor thirst; and that they thought it no disgrace to spend whole days and nights in quaffing^h: so that though they were in no case more invincible than in this, yet, if you plied them with enough of it, you could not fail of overcoming themⁱ. As for wine, though they at first betrayed an excessive fondness for it, yet they quickly found by experience, that it only tended to enervate d and emasculate the men, and obstructed the fecundity of the women; for which reason some of them, especially the Suevi, forbade the importation of it^k. And it is thought, to this day, that the degeneracy of the modern Germans, in this respect, as well as that of the Gauls, Spaniards, and other nations, is, in a great measure, owing to their exchanging their old natural liquors for the foreign juice of the grape^l.

offspring: that on the south side of heaven there is a court vastly brighter than the sun itself, and which will be proof against the flames which are to destroy the rest of the creation; and there it is that the good will be preserved for that new and endless life. That the general destruction is to be preceded by the most severe seasons, bloody wars, enormous crimes, &c. after which, two monstrous wolves are to be let loose, who shall devour sun, moon, and stars. That the rainbow, by which the souls of the good went up to heaven, will be broken down. That some of the asa, or deified heroes, shall begin an unsuccessful war, and Odin himself be devoured by one of the wolves; after which, the universe is to be set on fire: that there is another court, as dismal as the other is glorious, whose gates open towards the north; the fences of it are woven with the hinder-parts of venomous serpents, whose heads are all turned towards the inside of it, and cast continual streams of deadly poison, which infects all the rivers round it, through which the wicked are forced to wade; and much more to the like purpose.

We shall not trouble ourselves further, to inquire whence those northern poets drew all this mythological rhapsody; but only observe, from the whole, that they plainly appear not to have had so high an opinion of their country, as some of a modern date, who have taken a vast deal of pains to prove, that the earthly paradise was situate there, and that they, especially Suedland, afforded every thing that is useful and delightful to mankind (53); for if those old ones had entertained any such favourable opinion of these cold regions, they would hardly have made them the abode of miserable souls, and removed the seats of the blessed to the southern side of the universe (54).

The history of the antient Germans.

- ^a WE have taken notice, at the beginning of this chapter, that the most antient The antient history of the Germans unknown. historians, both Greek and Roman, have so injudiciously confounded the whole German nation under the names of Scythians and Celtes, and that Tacitus himself, who had conversed so much amongst them, is, in some cases, so manifestly fabulous, and, in many others, so obscure and inconsistent, that no tolerable certainty can be expected, either with relation to their origin, or antient history, except we can strike out some light from better hands, and from some such concurring circumstances as may add weight to their testimony. This, we hope, we have done, in some measure, with relation to the first of these two points; but it is much more difficult to adjust the latter to any satisfaction, considering what a vast number of nations are comprehended in the general name of Germans, their constant fluctuations, and driving each other from place to place, their various intermixtures with each other, till the name of the one was quite swallowed up in the other; that many of them did, in time, come to differ widely from the rest, in their customs, government, laws, and politics; and others are scarcely known to us by any thing but their names; and especially, considering that none of them wrote any thing of their own affairs, and that both Romans and Greeks had but a very confused, if any knowledge of them, till the Romans did, by their wars and commerce with them, open a more easy way to it (A). Upon these accounts, we must be contented to set down the epocha between the coming and settling of the former in the several parts of Germany, and the invasion of the latter, for dark and uncertain, and as impenetrable as their famed Hercynian forest; except what we have been able to gather from those authors concerning their names, situation, and some few other particulars, which we have already, or shall have occasion to mention, in the sequel of this section.

^b WHAT occasioned the Romans breaking in upon Germany, as they did upon all other nations they could come at; we have already seen, in the course of the Roman history^a; the Germans were then so far from being formed into one single community, that they were divided into a vast number of small kingdoms and commonwealths. They might, indeed, look upon themselves, in general, as a nation descended originally from the same stock, and so have some laws in common to them all, either for the supporting of each other against foreign invaders, or for the preservation of a due balance amongst their vast variety of commonwealths; but, in other things, each had its particular form of government, laws, policy, and interest. They were all of them bred up with an excessive love of liberty, and hatred to all kinds of invasion; and could not, but with jealousy and resentment, behold

(A) It is plain, that, before the Romans came over the Alps, they had so little knowledge of them, that they confounded them with the Gauls, and called both nations by that name. The general one of Germans doth not, indeed, appear to have been of so early date as some have thought it, as we have shewn at the beginning of this chapter; so that each nation being distinguished by their peculiar names, unknown then to the Romans, it was natural for these to include them all under the name of Celtes, Gauls, and Galatae, as they were so nearly allied in their origin, religion, customs, &c.

There is, indeed, one passage, in the fasti Capitolini (1), in which mention is made of that great victory so much cried up by Virgil and other writers (2), which Marcellus gained over Viridomarus and his Gauls, who are here joined with the Insubri and Germans, and which, if this last name be not corrupted by the transcriber, will plainly shew it to have been longer in use than we suppose it. But a late writer hath shewed it very probable, at least, both from the similitude of the names, and other concurring circumstances, that Germani is here transcribed, instead of Cenomani (3); for these were not only next neighbours to the Insubri, and concerned with them in the same war against the Romans, but were defeated with them, not long after, by Cethegus, who, thereupon, triumphed over them both at the same time (4).

This Viridomarus is by some styled a king, and by others a general of the Gauls (5); and his invasion threw the Romans into such a consternation, that, to turn away the impending evil, they were guilty of that inhuman piece of superstition we have mentioned out of Plutarch, in a former volume (6).

the daily encroachments which the Romans continually made on all their neighbours, a or, consequently, without uniting themselves more closely against them, and assisting those of their neighbours, who were likely to fall the next sacrifice to their ambition; as we have seen they did, with respect to the Gauls, Helveti, and other neighbouring states. Hence arose those wars and conquests which ended in their total conquest; for the politic Romans soon took the advantage of their being divided into so many different republics; and by fomenting jealousies among some of them, bribing and corrupting others, and by using all their force and art against the rest, they found means to subdue them gradually, and by piece-meal: so that one state after the other fell a prey to their conquering arms, till the whole country was reduced into a Roman province. This part, therefore, of their history, is not to be looked b upon as a general one of a whole nation, but as a separate one of such a number of different states subdued one after the other, and in a great measure independently one from the other, till we come to that period of time the Franks brought and united all the other Germans, who remained in those countries, together with many other Roman provinces, under their dominion. For this reason, and because a full and particular account has been given of all these conquests in the Roman history, we shall, to avoid all unnecessary repetitions, content ourselves with giving a chronological summary of the reduction of each of these nations, till we come to the grand epocha of the Franks above-mentioned; and refer our readers to the volume and page where each of them is more fully and severally mentioned. For the Roman c history being not only the most considerable one in this whole work, in all respects, but being, as it were, the basis, or pivot, on which that of all the nations they subdued doth chiefly turn, we thought it would render it more complete, useful, and instructive, to give them all in one view, or series, in that part of it, than if we had detached them from the main body, and branched them out into so many distinct parts of history; which could hardly have been done without either great confusion, or endless repetitions. From the conquest of Germany by the Romans, our next point in view will be, to shew by what means they regained their liberty, and made such ample reprisals upon their conquerors under the Franks; and as the defection of these gave rise to the German empire, which will make a considerable d part in our modern history, which is to follow, we shall, to avoid confusion, give the history of all those several nations, and of those kingdoms which they erected in other countries, in their several transmigrations, each in a distinct chapter, and confine ourselves, in the latter part of this, to mentioning the most considerable of those other countries which have been since conquered and possessed by the Germans who now inhabit the empire, at least as far as will be necessary to open the way to the modern history of it.

Germany invaded by the

BUT before we come to the Roman invasion, it will be necessary to mention some transactions, relating to the antient Germans, which are previous to it, and have yet been but touched upon; the first of which is, the Gaulish irruption into their e territories, under the conduct of Sigovesus, whilst his brother, Bellovesus, made the like over the Alps. These two valiant princes were sons to the sister of Ambigatus, a king of the Celtae, or Gauls, about the time of Tarquinius Priscus. That monarch, finding his subjects to increase too fast for the extent of his territories, resolved to send two large colonies out of it, to settle somewhere else, under the conduct of his two nephews. These being directed, as the Gaulish manner then was, by the flight of birds, the former of these was directed over the Rhine, and settled in the Hercynian forest f, whilst the other went and penetrated into Italy, as we have seen in a former volume (B). Whether the Germans had any hand in this latter expedition, doth not clearly appear, for the reasons mentioned in the last note. Only if the regions f

(B) We find, however, no farther mention of the former colony, and their settlement in Germany, unless we suppose, that it is of them which Julius Caesar speaks, when he informs us of a Gaulish nation, which in his time inhabited the heart of Germany, along the Hercynian forest, and all the most fertile parts of that country between the Rhine and that famed wood, and had intirely conformed themselves to the customs and manners of that country (7). Tacitus, likewise, by placing the Boii and Helvetii much about the very same spot of ground, and making them both to be descended from the Gauls (8), doth, in all probability, mean the very same nation and colony with Caesar and Livy.

a lying at the foot of the Apennine hills were at that time inhabited by Germans, or semi Germans, as Livy calls them^d, there is no question to be made but they might be hurried, by those Gaulish swarms, to follow them in those excursions, and share in those devastations and pillages, which they committed. But hitherto it doth not appear, that the rest of the German nation were at all concerned in them, since Tacitus gives them this peculiar character, that they rather studied how to preserve their own, than how to invade the territories of others^e; and it is most likely, that they did not begin to act offensively against the Romans, at least, till they were alarmed at the greatness of their power, and the daily encroachments they made round about them. Swarms of colonies they must be supposed to have sent abroad, to prevent b the want of elbow-room, as they multiplied so fast: but there was so much of that to spare towards the north parts of Europe, and so little on the south parts, where they were, moreover, sure to meet with a stout opposition, that they poured most of them towards the other way, at least till the Gauls did, in some measure, oblige them to make reprisals upon them.

THE first of these we meet with, and which, in all appearance, is of much later date than that of Segovesus into Germany, is that of the Belgæ, one of the fiercest, and most warlike nations of Germany; who, having passed the Rhine, and driven the Gauls out of a canton of it, seated themselves so firmly in it, that neither their neighbours, whom they continually annoyed, nor any other nation, could ever c drive them out of it. Cæsar adds, that they were not a little proud of this their settlement, and that they assumed a high hand over all their neighbours^f; and we have elsewhere observed, that they were, probably, called Belgæ, upon that account, that word, in the old Teutonic, signifying fierce and quarrelsome^g (C). They afterwards peopled the coasts of Britain, and drove the natives into the inland parts, and waged continual wars with the Germans^h. We have already given an account of these Belgæ, of their origin, wars with the Romans, and reduction to their yoke, in a former volume, to which we refer our readersⁱ. From this irruption of the Belgæ into Gaul, which is the first the German nation made upon them, at least that we read of, these two nations continued in a kind of alternate state of hostility and d friendship, as occasion served; sometimes invading each other's territories, at other times assisting each other against the Romans, as we have had frequent occasion to hint in the last chapter, and shall again in this: but it is time that we should speak of those wars and defeats which the several German nations waged against the Romans, the defeats they received from them, and by which they were subdued by them, in the succinct method and order of time, as we have promised.

THE first we read of, who ventured to invade the Roman territories, were the Cimbri invade Cimbri and Teutones: we have already spoken of their antient settlement, the former Italy, in the Cimbrica Cæronesus, and the latter on the coasts and isles of the Baltic^k; but whether, for want of room there, or, perhaps, invited by the beauty of a warmer c clime, both these (D) marched, with their wives and children, through, and ravaged Noricum and Illyricum, penetrated into Italy, defeated the Romans, at several pitched

(C) And which is the character Cæsar gives them, and attributes this roughness of theirs to their living at a distance from the more civilized provinces of Gaul, and having few or no foreign merchants to trade with them, and bring them such commodities as serve to effeminate mankind (9).

(D) It doth not, indeed, appear, that these two nations began their first excursions jointly, or at the same time; much less, that they all left their territories, for they left a much greater number behind; but only that some of the resolute of each resolved to exchange them for new ones. It is more likely, that, upon the sight of the vigorous opposition they were likely to meet with from the consular armies, and under such experienced generals, the Cimbri invited the Teutones, who were their neighbours, to come and join them, as they did some others, both

Germans and Gauls, through whose territories they passed; particularly the Thyrini and Ambrones, who are mentioned in the same invasion (10). They parted, indeed, from them all, upon what account doth not appear; but, instead of pursuing their Italic invasion towards the Pyrenæi, being there repulsed by the Celtiberi, they rejoined the Teutones again, and made sad havock in Gaul, which was then in no condition to withstand them. They moved, at length, towards Italy, by several ways, and were forced to fight their way through each of them. It proved, however, a fatal expedition to them all, particularly to the Teutones, who, after having insulted the Roman army with the most biting taunts (11), were cut off by them, to the number of 100,000, by the same victorious consul (12).

battles¹, and threw all Italy into the greatest consternation^m. In the first of these actions they vanquished the famed consul, Papyrius Carbo; in another, M. Junius Silanus, another consul, who was soon after called to a severe account for it; and, in a third, L. Cassius; and, in a fourth, the brave M. Aurelius Scaurus, whom they took prisoner, and put to death, by their king, Bolos (E), for speaking too boldly in praise of the Romans: but, after several other successes in Italy, they were totally defeated and destroyed by the policy of consul *Marius*ⁿ. For this general took care to post himself so advantageously, on the day of battle, that the Cimbri had not only his army, but the sun, wind, and dust, to combat with, and were the more easily overthrown, by that subtle stratagem (F). How greatly the Romans esteemed this victory, may be seen by the triumph, and other singular honours^b which they decreed both to Marius, and to Catulus, as well as by the monuments which these caused to be reared in memory of it^o (G). Those Cimbri who escaped this dreadful slaughter, did, in all likelihood, return into their own country; for they are said to have sent afterwards a submissive embassy to Augustus P; and are likewise mentioned, by authors of later date, as the most warlike of all the northern Germans^q, down to Claudian's time, who calls the north sea by their name^r. But it is likely the Saxons, their neighbours, joining with them in their excursions, and growing, by degrees, more famous, the Cimbrian name was swallowed up in theirs^s.

THE next excursion we find recorded of the Germans, is that which happened in c
Julius Cæsar's time, on occasion of the jealousy, which it is justly supposed that politic conqueror fomented between the Ædui and the Arverni, the then two most potent nations in Gaul; the former of whom being then in friendship with Rome, and the latter allied with the Sequani, these thought fit to call in the neighbouring Germans to their assistance. At first, only 15000 came over to them, but they became so enamoured with this delightful country, that, to keep their footing in it, they sent for fresh supplies from over the Rhine, inasmuch that they amounted, at last, to 120000. The Sequani, by their assistance, soon subdued the Ædui, as we have formerly seen^t; but their victory cost them dear, for they were forced by Ariovistus, the German king, to evacuate one third part of their kingdom, to settle his d troops in. He soon after obliged them to yield another third to him, as a settlement for 40000 Harudes, who crossed over to him, and, at the same time, did, by his address, induce Julius Cæsar, then consul, to allow him the title and honour of a king^u. But it proved a short-lived kingdom, and Cæsar, who only caressed him

(E) This is, in all likelihood, the same whom Plutarch calls Bolorix, king of the Gauls (13), but Livy Bolos, king of the Cimbri (14). We have formerly mentioned the murder of the brave Scaurus, by that young hot-headed prince, and the occasion of it (15); and there we followed the former of these authors, though, most likely, the latter is in the right. We lately took notice, how apt the Greeks and Romans were to confound the Gauls and Germans; the Cimbri were, doubtless, antient Celts, as their name imports, with respect to their origin; but Gauls they could not be, since they inhabited the most northern parts of Germany.

(F) This circumstance we are beholden to Plutarch for (16), and need the less question it, seeing that author had it out of Sylla's memoirs, who was himself in Marius's army, and had wrote a description of this victory, besides Catulus, who likewise left an account of his consulship; and, perhaps, some other helps he might have had besides. The description which he and some others (17) give us of the order of battle of the Cimbrians, their accoutrements, weapons, valour, and intrepidity to the last, plainly shews what brave warriors they were, and that they only wanted some parts of the Roman discipline and policy to have made them, in all points, superior to the conquerors of the world.

We are told, farther, that their wives behaved, in this action, with incredible bravery; and at length preferred an honourable death for themselves and their children, to a dishonourable captivity (18); and Seneca adds, that, after their death, their very dogs fought in defence of the carriages, which these heroines had lost their lives for.

(G) Among these was the famed temple of Virtue, built by the former, and the brazen bull, which the latter is said to have taken from them, and caused to be preserved in his own house (19). What this bull was, hath puzzled most antiquaries, because it is not mentioned by any other author: some think, that the Cimbrians had it upon their standards, as the Romans had the eagles; others, that it was only a bullock's head (20); but all this is mere conjecture, and not worth dwelling upon.

- a for his own ends, soon found a specious pretence to dispossess him of it. The vast numbers of Germans which Ariovistus had brought into Gaul, and the success which their bravery had gained them, could not but raise the Roman jealousy, and alarm not only the Sequani, but the greatest part of the Gauls, who thereupon applied to the consul with bitter complaints against the German devastations, and the danger they were in of being quickly swallowed up by them. Cæsar turned all this to his own advantage, and sent to desire an interview with the German prince, who found means to excuse himself from it, and to get six other nations, or cantons, to join with him, besides his own Suevi (H), and a fresh reinforcement of those which were hastening over to him; upon which, Cæsar made what haste he could towards
- b him, to prevent their joining. A conference was, at length, agreed upon, in which Cæsar used some threats to him, and plainly told him, that the Romans would doubly resent his tyrannic use of their old friends the Ædui, after they had shewed him so much regard, and bestowed such honours upon him; and therefore insisted, that he should restore their hostages to them, send back part of his German troops, and forbear all future hostilities. To all this imperious stuff, Ariovistus, in vain, pleaded the right of conquest, his being invited into Gaul, and his treaties with the Sequani, and even offered his services and friendship to Cæsar himself: the conference was broken, and followed with a dreadful engagement, in which the Roman policy got the advantage of the German bravery (I), gave them a total overthrow^w, and forced them over the Rhine, some by swimming, and others in boats, and,
- c amongst the rest, Ariovistus himself, who, by what may be guessed by a passage in Cæsar, did not long outlive his disgrace^x. After this, the nations which fought under him dispersed themselves, the Marcomans into Boiobemum, under the conduct of Maroboduus; the Tribochi, Nemetes, and Vangiones, stayed in Gaul, or went over the Rhine, and submitted, with the Ubii, to the Romans; for we find them still seated along the banks of that river^y. As for those Suevi who were assembled on the same side, they retired, upon their receiving the news of this defeat; only a great number of them were cut off, in their flight, by the Ubii, who had been treated in a hostile manner by them^z. And thus ended this second expedition of the
- d Germans into Gaul. On the very next year the Belgæ, alarmed at the success of the Romans, formed a great alliance with the Celtes, Germans, and Gauls, in order to drive them farther from their neighbourhood. Cæsar, according to custom, found means to sow such divisions amongst them, that many of those allies submitted to

(H) These were the Marcomans, Harudes, Tribochi, Vangiones, Nemetes, and Sedusii. We have given an account of these German nations, at the beginning of this chapter; besides these, the Treviri gave notice to Cæsar, that a fresh swarm of Suevi were got as far as the banks of the Rhine, under the command of Nasua and Cimberius, two brothers, who were just on the point to cross over into Gaul, and join the German army (21).

(I) Cæsar played a double stratagem against them; the first, by animating his Romans and Gaulish allies, with a pretence, that Ariovistus had been guilty of the blackest treachery against him (22); which notion, whether true, or false, would not fail exasperating them, and disheartening the Germans: the other, by obliging them to fight before the new moon, which, he had been informed, both Gauls and Germans carefully avoided, as ominous to them: and, accordingly, Ariovistus strove all he could to shun it, till the Romans fell suddenly upon him, and obliged him to fight, which both he, and his men, did, with greater fury than discretion; and being once put into disorder, betook themselves to a hasty flight, in spite of the cries and endeavours of their wives and children to rally them, and stopped not till they got safe over the Rhine.

The misfortune is, that we have no other account of these things but what Cæsar has been pleased to give us, who is evidently partial to his own nation, and much more to himself. Had they been written by a more impartial hand, it is likely we should find them in a very different light from what he has given them. However, even as we have them from him, it is not difficult to discover such inconsistencies as seem to us to carry their own confutation. Such as is that which he says of the Germans at this action, viz. that they formed themselves into such a thick and impenetrable phalanx, and held their shields so close over their heads, that the Romans were forced to leap upon them, and tear them asunder, and, sinking down between them, kill those who lurked under them, till they had opened a passage for their companions to come in upon them (23).

But Cæsar was not the only Roman writer who betrays such fond partiality for the glory of that nation; the account which some of them give of the total overthrow of such a vast army as that of the brave Cimbrians, and their allies, mentioned a little higher, and with the loss of only 300 men on Marius's side (24), seems no less stretched beyond all probability, especially considering how bravely they tell us the enemy behaved on this occasion, and how much superior they had proved in all former actions.

him; only the Nervii, Atrebatæ, and Veromandui, stood firm against him, and, a though defeated at length, yet yielded him one of the dearest victories he had ever got: so that the whole Belgic nation was forced to submit to the Roman yoke^a. Comius, a faithful dependent on Cæsar, was by him made king of the Atrebatæ, and soon gained a considerable authority over all that country^b; the Atuatii, about the same time, hearing of these swift conquests, came in one body to the succour of the Atrebatæ, and entertained no small contempt of the Romans, when they found them so far inferior in stature: they were, however, soon undeceived, to their cost, when, being briskly besieged by them in their capital, into which they had been forced to retire after the defeat of the Atrebatæ, and unable to obtain better terms than to surrender it at discretion, both their city, and all the garrison of it, to the b number of 53000, were sold by the conqueror^c (K).

Cæsar was, not long afterwards, forced into a war with two other German nations, viz. the Tencteri, and Ulpetes (L): these, having been forced out of their own territories by the Suevi, the fiercest and most warlike of all the northern Germans, of whom we shall speak in the sequel of this volume, had passed into Gaul, and settled themselves in the neighbourhood of the Eburones and Condrusi. Cæsar was then at Rome, to obstruct the cabals of Lucius Domitius against him, but was obliged to hasten into Gaul, to prevent their joining with that nation against the Romans. Upon his arrival, they sent an embassy to acquaint him with the reasons of their coming into that country, and to beg, that he would allow them settlements there, c promising him, if he did, to serve him upon all occasions; otherwise, that they would maintain their ground by force of arms. Cæsar not only refused to grant them their request, but fell suddenly and furiously upon them, and made a terrible slaughter of them, together with their wives and children; and of those who escaped, the greatest part perished, with endeavouring to cross the Muse^d; only their cavalry, who happened not to be in the battle, crossed the Rhine, and fled to the Sicambri, whose territories were sited between those two rivers. This, and the assistance which the Ubii about Cologne sent to beg of him against the threatening Suevi, afforded him a pretence for building a bridge over the Rhine, to the great surprise of all the Germans (M), but especially of the Sicambri, whose country he ravaged at an unmerciful rate, set fire to their houses, cut down their corn, and returned to the Ubii; whilst they, at his approach, ran with all their effects into their forests, and exhorted the Tencteri and Ulpetes to do the same^e. This was the first time, in all likelihood, that the Romans set foot on the German territories, which became afterwards the scene of so much bloodshed on both sides, both under that conqueror, and his successors, and which ended in the almost total conquest of this brave nation. The Treviri were the first who gave an occasion to that general to invade their country, who doth not appear to have had any intention, upon his first entering Germany, to carry on a war against them, but only to keep them in awe, by convincing them, that he was not afraid to come and attack them e in their own territories (N). However that be, the Treviri, grown jealous of the

(K) Cæsar, in his account of this action, seems to intimate, that he had extirpated the whole nation by it (14): for he says, that they had all abandoned their cities and towns, and had sheltered themselves in this capital, where those who escaped being killed in the siege, were all sold for slaves. But they are found, in process of time, to have made such powerful head against the Romans, as shews plainly enough how apt that conqueror was to exaggerate every advantage he got against those who fell under his hand.

What this capital was, he doth not tell us: Cluverius thinks it to have been Namur; if so, it is strange, that Cæsar, when he describes the strength of the place (15), should say nothing of the Muse, on which that place is situate, and which could not but add considerable strength to it.

(L) We have given an account of these two nations, and their country, in a former volume (16):

(M) The Ubii, indeed, offered to waft him over in their boats; but the politic general told them, that it would be more for the honour of the Romans to build a bridge over that river; which, it seems, was the first attempt of that kind, they being used before to cross it in floats, and other slight and flat vessels. What increased their surprize, if his account can be credited, was, that he finished it in ten days, and set a strong guard on each side of it. The reader may see this famed fabric described by himself (17).

(N) Cæsar had two other views, the one to shew the Germans, by the example of the Sicambri, how dangerous it was to exasperate the Romans; and the other, by the timely assistance he gave the Ubii against the Suevi, though for his own ends, to induce them to set a high value upon Roman friendship.

^a Romans, and of their own liberty (O), had, by their credit and valour, well nigh stirred up a general revolt in Gaul, which had groaned some time under the Roman yoke: this obliged Cæsar to send Labienus against them, whilst he went to the assistance of Cicero, who was, in some measure, besieged by the Nervii. We have given already a full account of all these transactions, in a former volume; for which reason, we shall refer our readers to them, as they are quoted in the margin, to avoid needless repetitions ^f.

For the same reason we shall content ourselves with just recapitulating the principal and brave efforts which they made, upon all favourable conjunctures, for the recovery of their liberty, and the desperate wars which they renewed, and carried on, upon all proper occasions, against several Roman emperors, and during several centuries, till they had accomplished their end, and subdued their conquerors; and refer our readers to those parts of the Roman history, where they have been as fully treated of as could be done in a work of this extensive nature. It is not, indeed, to be supposed, that their insuperable love of liberty could suffer them to be longer patient under the Roman yoke, than till an opportunity offered itself for shaking it off; and this, in spite of the Roman caresses, policy, and vigilance, could not but often happen, considering the continual distractions of that unwieldy empire: neither could the ill success, which too often attended these attempts, discourage them from fresh ones: so that it would unavoidably draw us too far, to particularize them all here again; especially considering that they were, in process of time, divided into many distinct nations, and appear, in history, under several names; such as those of Franks, Alemans, Gepidæ, Burgundians, &c. of each of whom, as well as of the other considerable northern nations, such as the Hunns, Goths, Sueves, Dacians, Lombards, &c. we shall give a full history, in the subsequent chapters (P).

WITH relation to the Germans in general, the most considerable transactions which remain to be taken notice of, are those which follow, and which having been already spoken of in the two last volumes, we shall here only recapitulate and refer our readers to the places quoted in the margin. In Augustus's reign, who, as we formerly took notice, had issued out some edicts against the inhuman superstitions of the druids, which, in all likelihood, affected both nations, the Germans took that opportunity to pass the Rhine, and to ravage those countries which were subject to him. Against them Agrippa was sent, whose arrival so intimidated them, that they quickly repassed that river ^h. But whilst he was gone into Spain, they repassed it, and defeated a body of Roman horse, and afterwards the Gallie proconsul M. Lollius, from whom they carried off a standard: but he soon recovered his honour, and drove them back again ⁱ, with considerable loss. All this while the Gauls were in great ferment, and meditating a general revolt; upon which he sent Drusus thither to quell them, which he had no sooner done ^k, but he passed the Rhine, drove all before him, and penetrated almost to the German ocean ^l.

(O) They had been formerly reckoned a very powerful nation among the Germans (28), and, having since passed the Rhine, had extended their dominions from that river quite to the country of the Rhemi. They had, a little before, shook off the Roman yoke, and were even reported to have invited other Germans to come, and assist them, and the Gauls, in defence of their liberty (29); which occasioned their being defeated by Labienus, as has been elsewhere hinted (30).

(P) It will not, however, be amiss to advertise our readers here, that, as those nations branched out into a vast multitude of tribes, governments, and names, it will be impossible, in a work of this extent, to take notice of them all under separate articles, especially as many of them are known to us by little more than their names, or, at most, on account of some of their alliances with, or assisting other more considerable ones, and sharing with them either in some notable victory or defeat. Of such, we hope, it will be sufficient to speak occasionally, as we find them mentioned by ancient authors, and to give the best account which can be found of them, in as few words as possible.

But of those who have made a greater figure in ancient history, such as the Alemans, Gepidæ, Lombards, Vandals, Suevi, &c. among the ancient Germans, the Hunns, Goths, eastern and western, and other Scythian nations, together with their migrations, settlements, wars, conquests, &c. they will be best treated of, each under a separate chapter, according to the best accounts we can get from ancient authors, and in such a manner as may best open the way to the modern history of the German empire.

THE famed revolt which happened among the Roman legions left in Pannonia, and a which was happily quelled, in part, by Drusus, and afterwards wholly by Germanicus^m, gave occasion for a fresh invasion, which the last-mentioned general carried on with great success, and much greater havock and slaughter of the Germans for fifty miles about; and, if we may believe Tacitus, without the loss, or even the wounding of one single *Roman*ⁿ. This action, which may be more properly called a massacre than a conquest (Q), alarmed some other German nations against them; but these, likewise, had the misfortune to be defeated, as we have seen in the Roman history^o. The Roman general had soon after a fairer field offered to him, on occasion of the rupture between the two German chiefs, Arminius and Segestes, the former a sworn enemy to the Romans, the latter a staunch friend to them. What advantage Germanicus made of this rupture, we need not repeat here, but only that the Germans received several defeats, and Arminius himself, after some advantages gained over them, was totally routed^p. All that we shall add concerning this war is, that though it cost the Roman general very dear^q, yet he had received such reinforcements of men and arms from Gaul and other parts, that he hoped in one campaign to have reduced all Germany; but his success raised the jealousy of Tiberius, and occasioned his being recalled^r.

THEIR other most considerable wars with the Romans the reader will find in the places quoted in the margin^s; in the reign of M. Aurelius^t, and afterwards under the following emperors, which we shall but just mention here, and refer to the places^c where they are spoken of in the Roman history, viz. against Alexander and Maximin^u, against Valerian^w and Aurelian^x, Probus^y, Constantius^z, Julian^a, Valentinian, and some of his successors^b: but these, and the sequel of their history, will be best seen in some of the subsequent chapters, where we shall speak of them under the names of Alemans, Gepidæ, Franks, &c. by which they were distinguished, and better known, by that time.

BUT before we come to their several histories, it will be necessary to pass, according to our plan, over to the British isles, whose first inhabitants being undoubtedly of antient Celtic extract, as we have, we hope, sufficiently shewn in a former volume^c, as well as in this and the foregoing chapters, claim a preference, in point of time; d whereas those northern people above-mentioned, so far as they appear, at least, under those new names, being not only of recenter date than the antient Britons, but of more uncertain origin, we think will more properly be spoken of in the subsequent chapters, and each in its due order.

(Q.) That general was, it seems, informed, that the Germans were then celebrating some great festival; and as he knew it was their custom to drink very hard, and to carouse it all night, he did not doubt but to find them either dead-drunk, or fast asleep, as he actually did. For having, with a numerous army, crossed the Casian forest all night, he fell upon them, before they either knew any thing of his coming, or were recovered from their debauch.

The confusion that reigned amongst them upon such a surprize, made them become an easy prey to him, and he failed not to make the best advantage of it; permitting his troops to put all to fire and sword, sparing neither age or sex, or even their most sacred groves; witness that famed one of Tanfana, of which we have had occasion to speak at the beginning of this chapter, and which they burnt, and levelled to the ground (18).

The antient state and history of Britain, to its desertion by the Romans, and the invasion of the Angles and Saxons.

S E C T. I.

Description of Britain. The first inhabitants. The customs, religion, government, &c. of the antient Britons. The state of Britain under the Romans.

- ^a THE island, which is now called Great Britain, and comprehends the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, with the principality of Wales, was, in more antient times, by way of distinction, styled Albion, the name of Britain being then common to all the islands, that lie round it. Hence, Agathemerus speaking of the British islands, They are many in number, says he; but the most considerable among them are Hibernia and Albion^a. And Ptolemy, to the chapter, wherein he describes the island now called Great Britain, prefixes the following title; The situation of Albion, a British island^b. But, as this far excelled the other British islands, the name of Albion, in process of time, was quite laid aside, and that of Britain, by way of excellency, used in its room. By this name it was known in Pliny's time, and even in Cæsar's. The island of Britain, says Pliny, so much celebrated by the Greek and Latin writers, was formerly called Albion, the name of Britain being then common to all the islands round it^c. And Cæsar, The other angle of Britain, shooting out to the west, lies over-against Spain; on which side is Hibernia, an island thought to be half as big as Britain, and about the same distance from Britain, as Britain is from Gaul^d. Hence it is manifest, that the name of Britain, once common to all the islands in our ocean, was, in Cæsar's time, and Pliny's, become peculiar to the island, which is still known by that name. Whence it had the name of Albion, is uncertain, some deriving it from the Greek word alphon, which, according to Festus, signifies white, the chalky cliffs, that, in several places, rise on our coasts, being of that colour; while others pretend this name to have been borrowed from a giant, feigned to have been the son of Neptune, and mentioned by several antient writers. Some of our etymologists have recourse to the Hebrew tongue, and some to the Phœnician; alben, in the former, signifying white; and alp, in the latter, high. The derivation from the Greek word alphon, or from the Hebrew alben, seems to be countenanced by the British poets, who style Britain Inis Wen, that is, the White Island^e. The origin of the name Britain is no less uncertain, than that of Albion. Nennius, and some other British writers, derive it from Brutus, whom they likewise call Brito, the fifth in descent from the celebrated Æneas. Others bring it from the British words Pryd Cain, that is, a white form, softened, by degrees, into Britannia. The learned Camden derives it from the words Britb, which, in the antient language of the island, signifies painted, and Tania, importing, in Greek, a region or country; so that the name Britbania, changed in process of time into Britannia, expresses what the Britons really were, that is, painted. Somner, disliking Camden's etymology, proposes another, viz. that the name Britain comes from Brydio, signifying, in the British tongue, rage, and pointing out the violent motion of the sea, that surrounds the island. Of these four etymologies, the first is founded on a fable; and against the other three lies one common, and, in our opinion, unanswerable objection; which is, that the name of

Britain was given to the island by foreigners, who could not borrow it from the British tongue, with which they were, in all likelihood, unacquainted. That the island received the name of Britain from foreigners, is evident, since the natives never styled themselves Britons, nor their country Britain, their true name being Cumri, or Cumbri; whence Cambria the name of Wales to this day among the Welsh. Besides, the second of the above-mentioned etymologies, deriving Britain from Pryd Cain, seems too far fetched. As to Camden's etymology, Somner observes, that Cæsar, in telling us the Britons painted their bodies with woad, speaks only of the inhabitants of Albion; whereas all the isles in our ocean were called by one general name insula Britannica, British islands. Is it probable, that a name, common to all the islands in our ocean, should owe its origin to a custom peculiar to one, though the most considerable among them? As for the rage and fury of the sea, whence Somner derives the name of Britannia, it is not true, that the sea rages more on the coast of Great Britain than elsewhere. The learned Bochart, speaking of the colonies and language of the Phœnicians, offers a conjecture, which most of our modern writers have adopted as the most natural. The Phœnicians, according to that writer^f, called this island, and some others near it, Barat Anac, that is, the land or country of tin or lead, and more contractedly Bratanac; which name, passing from the Phœnicians to the Greeks, and from these to the Romans, might have been softened into that of Britannica and Britannia. That the Phœnicians first discovered those isles, which were afterwards by the Greeks called Cassiterides, and are proved by Camden to be our Silly islands, appears both from Strabo and Pliny, of whom the former tells us, that the Phœnicians first brought tin from the Cassiterides, which they sold to the Greeks; but kept the trade to themselves, and the place private^g; and the latter writes, that Medicritus was the first, who brought lead from the Cassiterides^h; where Bochart shews, that we ought to read Melichartus, who is the Phœnician Hercules of Sanchoniathon, to whom the Phœnicians ascribed their first western discoveriesⁱ. But, notwithstanding the care of the Phœnicians to conceal these islands, the Greeks at last discovered them, and gave them the name of Cassiterides, which, in the Greek tongue, answers that of Barat Anac in the Phœnician. This name was at first given to the above-mentioned islands, but, by degrees, communicated to all the others lying in the same sea. Thus Bochart. But, after all, his opinion, however plausible in appearance, may be as foreign to the purpose, as any of the rest, the late instances of names given to new-discovered countries teaching us, that the origin of such names is not always owing to reason, but often to chance and caprice. As therefore the origin of the names given to this island is of too antient a date to be traced with any certainty, we shall dismiss this subject, and proceed to some more material account of the country.

Description of the country.

Britain lies over-against France and Germany, as Cæsar observed, in a triangular form, having three promontories shooting out three different ways, viz. Belerium, the Land's-end towards the west, Cantium, the Kentish or North Foreland towards the east, and Travisum or Orcas, Calbness, towards the north. It is divided from Ireland, to the west, by the Vergivian or Irish sea; washed on the north by the northern ocean; on the east, where it faces Germany, by the German ocean; and on the south, towards France, by the British chanel, called by the Romans Fretum Britannicum. Some writers have thought, that, where the chanel is most contracted, the island was antiently joined by an isthmus to the continent^k. It lies between the 50th and 59th degrees of north latitude, extending from north to south about 560 miles. Its breadth is various; and in compass its three sides are found to contain, allowing for the windings of the coast, about eighteen hundred miles. The south side, extending from the North Foreland in Kent to the Land's-end in Cornwall, contains about three hundred miles; the west side, from the Land's-end to the most northern point of Scotland, about eight hundred; and the east side about seven hundred. Were Great Britain to be considered as a perfect triangle, formed by three right lines, the length of its three sides, put together, would amount to about fifteen hundred miles. The fertility and pleasantness of Britain gave occasion to Isaacius Tzetzes to imagine, that these were the fortunate islands, described by the poets, where the face of nature smiled with a perpetual spring. It was, in former times, the granary of the western empire; for hence was every year transported an immense quantity of corn for the

- a supply of the armies on the frontiers of Germany. But the convenience of its situation, the fertility of its soil, and the innumerable blessings, with which it has been enriched by nature, are, with high encomiums, described by two ancient panegyrists, one of whom pronounced his speech before Constantine, and the other before Constantius. To these we refer the reader, and pass to the first inhabitants of this island.

THE southern parts of Britain were peopled, according to *Cæsar*¹, by the Gauls. ^{Its first inhabitants.} Tacitus is of the same opinion: If we consider all circumstances, says he, it is probable, that Gaul first peopled Britain, which lies so near it^m. This opinion, which is followed by most of the ancient, as well as the modern writers, is chiefly founded on the agreement observed by the Roman writers between the two nations in their customs, manners, language, religion, form of government, way of fighting, &c. Besides, as the Gauls sent colonies into Italy, Spain, Germany, Thrace, and Asia, it is but reasonable to conclude, that they did the same with respect to Britain, which lay so near them, that they could discern it from the continent, and was no less plentiful than the other countries, where they settled. As for the more northern inhabitants of Britain, Tacitus infers, from the make of their limbs, and other circumstances, that they came from *Germany*ⁿ; and Cæsar telling us, that they were Aborigines, seems to imply, that he discovered no affinity in their language, manners, customs, &c. with those of Gaul, and the southern parts of Britain.

- As for the Picts, who held the eastern parts of Britain, which lay north of the ^{The origin of the Picts.} Tine, the venerable Bede tells us, that they came out of Scythia in long ships, and landed first in the north of Ireland; but, not being suffered to settle there by the Scots, who then possessed that island, they were advised to plant themselves in the north part of Britain; which they did accordingly, with the assistance of the Scots, who moreover supplied them with wives to perpetuate their colony; but upon this condition, that, in all disputes concerning the succession to the crown, the Picts should prefer the female to the male line of their former kings; which is observed among them, says Bede, to this day^o. By Scythia Bede perhaps meant the northern parts of Germany; for that Scandinavia, now comprehending the kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, was, by the best writers of the middle ages, styled Scythia, is shown by the learned Usher^p, and Stillington^q, of whom the latter admits, as not improbable, the conjecture of Helior Boetius, deriving the Picts from the Agathyrsi, who, from Sarmatia, came into Cimbrica Chersonesus, and from thence into Scotland. As no Roman author makes mention of the Picts before Ammianus Marcellinus, who ^{Whether the Picts and Britons were one and the same people.} lived about the end of the fourth century, some writers are of opinion, that the Picts were not a distinct people from the Britons, but such of that nation as, to avoid the tyranny of the Romans, had retired into the northern parts of the island, where, continuing to paint their bodies, they were, by the Romans, called Picti, to distinguish them from those, who, submitting to Rome, had laid aside that custom, and adopted the Roman manners. To confirm this opinion, they allege the authority of Camden, who, in his introduction, endeavours to shew, that the names of places, formerly held by the Picts in the south and west parts of Scotland, are British, and consequently, that one and the same was the language of the Britons and Picts. But that these two nations spoke different languages, is manifest beyond dispute from Bede, who tells us, that, in his time, God was served in five several languages in Britain, viz. of the Angles, of the Britons, of the Scots, of the Picts, and of the Latins; which latter was commonly used in divine worship^r. Now, this difference of language, which Bede, who lived so near a neighbour to the Picts, could not be ignorant of, weighs down, with us, all the arguments, that are alleged to prove, that the Britons and Picts were one and the same people. Besides, it is certain, that the Picts were, for several ages, a separate and distinct nation, differing both from the Scots and Britons, not only in their language, but in their laws and customs. The contrary opinion is intirely built on the conformity of the name Picts with the Latin word Picti; which is but a weak foundation, since some writers, and among the rest Verstegan, derive the name of the Picts from a word in their own language signifying warrior. The Scots called them Pebiti, which name, in the opinion of some antiquaries, answers that of Picts, from the Latin word Picti; but others think it highly improbable, that the Scots, who were late subdued by the Romans, and continued but a short time under their dominion, should give their neighbours a Roman name. Buchanan takes the name of Picts to be Roman; but at the same time pretends they came from certain Gaulish colonies settled in Thrace, where they painted their bodies, as well as in Britain. The same author adds, that the Picts spoke the same language as the Britons and Scots. But herein he is contradicted, not only by Bede, whom we have quoted above, but by John Major, one of the most antient Scots historians, who tells us, that as yet, that is, in his time, almost half Scotland spoke the Irish tongue, which they had brought over with them from Ireland.

the Scots.

As for the origin of the Scots, Bede tells us, that they came into this island out of Ireland: In process of time, says that writer^a, Britain received a third nation, viz. the Scots, besides the Britons and Picts, who, coming out of Ireland, under the conduct of one Reuda, possessed themselves of those territories, which they still hold among the Picts.^b From this Reuda, adds our historian, they are called, to this day, Dalreudini, the word Dal, in their language, signifying share or portion. But of this colony, and the time, in which it is supposed to have settled in the north part of Britain, called afterwards Scotland, we shall speak more at length in the history of that kingdom.

and manners of the antient

To return to the Britons: their manners, customs, religion, form of government, &c. are described, not only by Cæsar in his commentaries, but by others, and perhaps more fully, who wrote after the Romans were become masters of the island. The country was, according to Cæsar, well peopled, and stocked with cattle. Their houses were not unlike those of the Gauls. They used copper or iron plates, weighed by a certain standard, instead of money. If they bred domestic fowls, hens or geese,^c it was for their diversion, being strictly forbidden by their religion to eat them. Of all the Britons those, who inhabited Cantium or Kent, were the most civilized, not differing much in their manners from the Gauls. The more inland people, for the most part, sowed no corn, their usual food being milk and game, with which their woods and plains were well stored. The use of cloaths was scarce known in the island. Only the inhabitants of the southern coast covered their nakedness with skins of wild beasts, carelessly thrown over them, not so much to defend themselves against the cold, as to avoid giving offence to the strangers, who came to trade with them. All the Britons painted their bodies, with the juice of woad, of a sky-colour, and wore long hair; but shaved the rest of their bodies, except their upper-lip. One^d custom prevailed among them, which seemed detestable to other nations; which was for ten or twelve men, brothers or friends, to have wives in common^e. This custom continued among them some time after the Romans were masters of the island; for Diodorus Siculus tells us, that a British lady, being upbraided with this usage by Julia, wife to the emperor Severus, returned her this smart answer: Surely the Roman ladies ought not to reproach us on this account, since we do publicly with the best of men no more what they do privately with the worst of their freemen and slaves^f. They abstained from all manner of fish, though the seas, that surrounded their island, and their rivers, were plentifully stored with them^g. Their towns, or rather villages, were a confused parcel of huts, placed at a small distance from each other, and, generally^e speaking, in the middle of a wood, whereof the avenues were defended with slight ramparts of earth, or with the trees, that were cut down to clear the ground^h. Strabo tells us, that they exceeded the Gauls in stature, but their bodies were not so well-set; that he saw, at Rome, some of their youth taller by half a foot than other men; that they had many princes and distinct governments among them; that their woods served them instead of cities; for having cut down trees, and inclosed with them a large, round spot of ground, there they built huts for themselves, and folds for their cattleⁱ. Diodorus Siculus speaking of the manners and customs of the antient Britons, Their houses, says he, are made of reeds or wood; they lay up their corn in the ear in granaries, taking from thence no more than what they consume in one day; they are simple and upright in their dealings, and strangers to the craft and subtlety of our countrymen; their manner of living is remote from the luxury of other nations; they are satisfied with a very mean and frugal diet; their island abounds with men, who are subject to divers kings and princes. Thus Diodorus^b. And Pomponius Mela: Britain is well peopled, and obeys several kings; but they are all rough and unpolished, and the farther they live from the continent, the less they are acquainted with foreign riches, abounding chiefly in cattle. They dye their bodies with woad, but whether by way of ornament, or for some other cause, is uncertain. Ambition of

- a empire, and desire of enlarging their dominions, prompt them to disturb each other with frequent wars^c. Tacitus writes, that the Britons, in their manners, resembled the Gauls, which was owing either to the same original, or the like climate; that the Britons however, not yet softened by a long peace, shewed greater intrepidity in war; that they were formerly governed by kings, but were then, that is, in Agri- cola's time, divided by petty princes into parties and factions. Tacitus adds, that nothing was of greater advantage to the Romans against the most powerful among them, than their not consulting one common interest, nor their joining to repel common dangers. Thus, while they fight separately, says that author, they are all alike overcome^d. Dion Cassius, as epitomized by Xiphilin, speaking of the more northern Britons, says, that they tilled no ground, their food being game and fruits; that they lived in their huts naked; that they had wives in common; that the chief authority resided in the people; that, in war, their arms were a shield, and a short spear, to the lower end of which was fastened a ball of brass, in order to terrify the enemy with the noise, when they shook it. They are inured to hunger, cold, and all manner of hardships, continues the same writer, and, when in the woods, can live upon the bark and roots of trees. He adds, that, on all occasions, they had ready a certain kind of food, of which if they took but the quantity of a bean, they were not troubled with hunger or thirst for a considerable time after^e. Herodian and Solinus, in describing the more northern nations of Britain, tell us, that they knew not the use of garments, but girt their waists and necks with iron, by way of ornament, that metal being no less in request among them, than gold was among other nations; that they made deep incisions in their bodies in the shape of flowers, trees and animals, which, with the juice of woad, they painted of a sky-colour, that never wore out^f. They are a warlike nation, adds Herodian, and most greedy of slaughter. In war they use a narrow shield, a lance, and a sword. As for breast-plates and helmets, they look upon them as an incumbrance^g. Pliny observes, among their other customs, that they wore rings on their middle fingers, and manured their land with marl; which must be understood of the more civilized Britons dwelling near the coast; for the others, as we have related above, did not apply themselves to agri-

As to their manner of fighting, Cæsar, who extols their valour, and the undaunted bravery, with which they went to battle, tells us, that they made use of chariots, driving furiously among the enemy's ranks, and discharging their darts, by which means they often put the Romans in disorder. When they engaged the horse, they left their chariots to fight on foot, their charioteers in the mean time retiring, and placing themselves so, that their masters, if overpowered with numbers, might readily find them, and have an easy retreat. By this manner of fighting, they had, says Cæsar, both the speed of the horse, and the steadiness of the foot, and were, by daily practice, so expert, that they could stop their horses on a steep descent, though in full career, turn them in a narrow compass, run along the pole, sit upon the yoke, and from thence, with incredible quickness, return to their chariots. Thus Cæsar^h. But why they chose to engage the horse rather on foot than in their chariots, is not easily conceived.

THEIR trade was very inconsiderable, notwithstanding the convenient situation of their island for carrying on an extensive commerce. Their vessels were very small, with their keels and ribs made of slight timber, interwoven with wicker, and covered with hides; which shews, that they undertook no long voyages; nay, in all likelihood, they never ventured to sea beyond the coasts of Gaul. Their chief traffick was with the Phœnician merchants, who, after the discovery of the island, which happened, according to Sammes, before the Trojan warⁱ, yearly exported great quantities of tin, which they sold to the Greeks, and other distant nations. As this trade proved very profitable, the Phœnicians, with great care, concealed, for many ages, the fountain-head; but the Greeks discovered it at length, about an hundred and sixty years before Julius Cæsar, as Sammes will have it^k, and traded to the same place, giving the islands, from whence chiefly they brought the tin, the name of Cassiterides, answering, as we have observed above, the Phœnician name Barat-Anac. But this

Their religion. THE religion of the antient Britons was, as Cæsar informs us¹, much the same with that of their neighbours the Gauls. They worshipped Jupiter under the name of Taranis, or Taran, signifying in the antient British language, as it does still in the Welsh, thunder. Maximus Tyrius writes, that they paid divine worship to the highest oak they could find, as the figure or representation of this god. Their other deities were Tutates, called by the Britons Duw Taub, the god of journeys, and supposed to be the same with Mercury; Hesus, called also Camuius, according to Camden, the god of war, or the Mars of the Britons; Beleus or Belinus, that is, as appears from a passage of *Julius Capitolinus*², Apollo, who is also supposed to have been called Belatucardus, this inscription, Deo Belatucardo, being found in several monuments of antiquity. As for their goddesses, they worshipped Diana under the name of Camma, and paid a very particular veneration to Andate, their goddess of victory, who had a temple at Camalodunum, now Maldon in Essex. To her they are said, by Dion Cassius, who calls her Andrasie, to have sacrificed their prisoners of war³. The care and direction of all religious matters was, by the Britons as well as the Gauls, committed to the Druids, whose authority was great, not only in religious, but civil affairs. Their name seems to come from the British word Deru, or the Greek word Drus, both signifying an oak, not only because they esteemed nothing more sacred than the mistleto that grows on the oak, but likewise because their usual residence was in groves among oaks; nor did they perform any of their ceremonies without some branches or leaves of that tree⁴. They were held, both by the Britons and Gauls, in such veneration, that their authority was almost absolute. To them belonged the care of private and public sacrifices, the interpretation of religion, the bestowing rewards, or inflicting punishments, the deciding controversies, let the difference be of what nature soever; and whoever refused to obey their decree, whether lord or vassal, was excluded from the sacrifices, which was accounted the greatest punishment that could be inflicted; for such as were thus, we may say, excommunicated, were reckoned in the number of the wicked, and, as such, avoided by all, not allowed to commence a suit, to discharge any public office, or to have the least regard paid them. These Druids had a superintendant or pontiff, to whom they were all subject. Upon his decease, the most worthy succeeded him; but, if there happened to be several candidates of equal merit, the election was decided by a majority of votes, and sometimes, as Cæsar tells us, by the sword. Once a year, the Druids of Gaul had a general assembly in the midst of the country, to which resorted persons from all quarters, who had any controversies to decide, every one submitting readily to their decrees⁵. The discipline of the Druids was thought, as Cæsar writes⁶, to have been first instituted in Britain, and from thence transferred to Gaul; for, even in his time, those who were desirous to have a thorough knowledge of it, came over to this island to learn it. The Druids were exempted from all military duties, taxes, and imposts, and met with such encouragement, that many embraced that profession. The youth, especially the nobility, were educated by them. Those who embraced the same profession, were, first of all, obliged to learn by heart a great number of verses; which employed some, says Cæsar, for the space of twenty years; for the Druids never committed any thing to writing, not that they were ignorant of letters, for, on all other occasions, they made use of Greek characters, but in order to lock up, by that means, their mysterious learning from the vulgar, or to exercise the memory of their disciples. Thus Cæsar. But from hence we must not conclude, that they had any knowledge of the Greek tongue, since Cæsar himself, when he wrote to Q. Cicero, besieged among the Nervii, penned his letter in Greek, to prevent its giving, if intercepted, any intelligence to the enemy; which plainly shews, they were strangers to that language. Selden thinks the word Græcis has crept into the text, the meaning of Cæsar being, that the Druids never committed their learning to writing, but, on all other occasions, made use of letters; which opinion does not appear to us ill grounded. One of the chief tenets they taught, was the immortality of the soul, and its transmigration from one body to another; which doctrine they looked upon as proper to inspire them with courage, and a contempt of death. They instructed their youth in several other traditions concerning the stars, and their

a motions, the extent of the world, the nature of things, and the power of the immortal gods¹. There were women as well as men Druids; for a female Druid of Tungria, now the bishoprick of Liege, foretold to Dioclesian, as we read in Vopiscus, when yet a private-soldier, that he should one day be emperor. The sect and religion of the Druids spread as far as Italy; for Augustus published an edict, forbidding the Romans to celebrate their mysteries. Besides the Druids, there were, among the Britons and Gauls, priests of an inferior rank, called Bards, whose province it was to celebrate the exploits of their heroes in verses, which they sung to the harp. The Bards were still in Britain, after the Romans had intirely abandoned it.

b THE same form of government prevailed in Britain, as in Gaul; that is, the whole country was divided into several small states, with a head over each, dignified by authors with the name of king. Of these heads or kings, Cæsar mentions four in the small compass of Kent. Whether these states were hereditary, or elective, we find no-where recorded. On great and imminent dangers, one of these heads or kings was, in a general assembly, and by common consent, chosen commander in chief of all their forces. Thus, when Cæsar invaded the island, the chief command of all the British forces was conferred upon Cassibelanus; and when the Britons revolted in the time of Claudius, Caradacus, king of the Silures, was chosen general. As in other cases, the several states, into which Britain was divided, had no dependence upon each other, they had, no doubt, quarrels and contests among themselves. But of their affairs before Cæsar's invasion, we have no account, but such as may be deemed fabulous; and therefore at that period, and no higher, ought the English historian, as Camden well observes, to begin his history.

c THAT part of Britain, which comprehends the present kingdom of England, and the principality of Wales, was in antient times divided into seventeen petty states, whereof the inhabitants were distinguished by the following names, viz. the Danmonii, the Durotriges, the Belgæ, the Attrebatii, the Regni, the Cantii, the Dobuni, the Catticuchlani, the Trinobantes, the Iceni, the Coritani, the Cornavii, the Silures, the Dinettiæ, the Ordovices, the Brigantes, the Ottadini. That part of Britain, which extends a great way to the west, and is bounded on the north by the Severn sea, on the south by the British ocean, and on the west by St. George's chanel, was antiently inhabited by those Britons, who are called by Solinus, Dunmonii, by Ptolemy, Dam- nonii, and, in the more correct copies, Danmonii. In this tract, or, as we may call it, peninsula, now comprehending the counties of Cornwall and Devon, the following places are mentioned by Ptolemy, viz. the estuary Vexalla, formed by the confluence of the two rivers Pedredus and Iwellus, now the Parret and the Ill; the promontory of Hercules, about half-way between that estuary and another promontory, called by Ptolemy, Belerium, and by Diodorus Siculus, Belerium. The promontory Belerium, which is by Ptolemy called also Antivestæum, is the most western point of Britain, now known by the name of the Land's-end. Not far from this shoots d out to the south the promontory Danmonium, or Ocrinum, now the Lizard. On the south coast the following places are taken notice of by our geographer, viz. Voliba, now Falmouth; the mouth of the Tamara, now the Tamar or Tamer, on which stands the town of Plymouth; the mouth of the Isca, now the Ex. The inland places mentioned by Ptolemy are, Isca Danmoniorum, Exeter; Tamare, Tavistock; Uxella, according to Camden, Lestwithiel.

e NEXT to the Danmonii, eastward, were the Durotriges, inhabiting that tract, which is now called Dorsetshire. In this county Ptolemy takes notice of one place only, which he calls Dunium, and Antoninus, in his itinerary, Durnovaria. All critics agree, that, instead of Dunium, we ought to read in Ptolemy, Durnum; and f that this was the antient name of Dorchester, the chief town of the county of Dorset. To the north and east of the country of the Durotriges, were situated the Belgæ, who possessed Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire. In this country Ptolemy and Antoninus mention on the coast Magnus Portus, Portsmouth; and Trisantonis Portus, Southampton, so called from the river Trisanto, now Hampton, on which it stands. Either Portus Trisantonis, or another place very near it, is called by Antoninus, Clausentum. In the inland country stood Venta Belgarum, Winchester, a place of great note in antient times, as we read both in Ptolemy and Antoninus; Aquæcalida, or, as Antoninus styles it, Aquæsolis, so called from its hot waters, now Bath; Ischalis or Ischalis, Ilchester. On the Belgæ bordered the Attrebatii, the inhabitants of Berkshire. The Attrebatii, as well as the Belgæ, came originally from Belgic Gaul, as we read in Cæsar^a, and settling in Britain, retained their ancient names. The chief city of the Attrebatii was Calcuæ, as Ptolemy calls it, or Caleva, as it is named by Antoninus, now Wallingford. Antoninus mentions another place, viz. Spina, which, according to Camden, still retains its ancient name, being called Spene; but is now only a village near Newbury, which rose out of its ruins. On the country of the Attrebatii, bordered that of the Regni, comprehending Surry, Sussex, and part of the sea-coast of Hampshire. In this country Ptolemy mentions but one city, viz. Noviomagus, which is also taken notice of by Marinus Tyrius, as appears from Ptolemy^b. Some antiquaries take this to be the present town of Guilford; but Noviomagus was only ten miles distant from London, as we read in Antoninus's itinerary; whereas Guilford is thirty. Camden tells us, that, in his time, were still to be seen the ruins of a city, answering exactly the distance set down in the itinerary. Besides Noviomagus, Antoninus mentions several other places in the country of the Regni, viz. Oibona, where was, according to the Notitia, the station of the Roman soldiers called Fortenies. Camden takes Oibona to have stood where Hastings now stands. Portus Adurni, now the small village of Ederington, and Regnum, now Ringwood, that is, the wood or forest of the Regni, into which they fled for protection. In the country of the Regni, namely at Ockham in Surry, where the Wey falls into the Thames, at a place to this day called Coway-stakes, from the stakes, with which the Britons had fenced the bank, Cæsar passed the Thames, and entered the territories of Cassivelaun. Cæsar crossed the Thames eighty miles from the sea; and this is the only place, at that distance, where the river is fordable. To the east of the Belgæ and Attrebatii, lay the country of the Cantii, called by Ptolemy and Cæsar^c, Cantium, by Bede, Cantia^d, now Kent. The Cantii were, according to Cæsar, the most civilized of all the Britons, not differing much, in their customs and manners, from their neighbours the Gauls^e. The places in Cantium, mentioned by the ancients, are, Durovernum, Durobrivis, Durolenum, Portus Rutupiae, Portus Dubris, Regulbium or Regulvium, and Portus Lemanis, now Canterbury, Rockester, Lenham, Dover, Reculver, and Lime. Whether Rutupiae and Portus Rutupensis, called by Tacitus Portus Trutulensis, were one and the same place, is questioned by our antiquaries. Somner thinks they were two places^f, contrary to the opinion of Leland, Lambard, and others. Perhaps he may be in the right; but it is not probable, says Camden, that Sandwich was the Portus Rutupensis, it being evident, that Stonar was the road, where the ships lay, that came to Rutupiae; and Somner himself allows Stonar to have been an ancient port^g. In the opinion of Camden therefore, Portus Rutupensis was Stonar, and Rutupiae the present village of Richborough, at some distance from the sea. Be that as it will, it is certain, that, in the Roman times, Gessoriacum, now Bologne, and Rutupiae or Portus Rutupensis, were, for those who from Gaul came into Britain, or from Britain crossed over into Gaul, what in our times are Dover and Calais. Hence, frequent mention is made of Rutupiae by the Latin writers^h; nay the word Rutupinus was, by some of the poets, used instead of *Britannus*ⁱ, so famous was Rutupiae in the Roman times. Portus Dubris, now Dover, is first mentioned by Antoninus; but, before the Romans abandoned the island, it became no less famous than Rutupiae itself. At Rutupiae was quartered the second legio Augusta; at Portus Dubris the Tungricani; at Portus Lemanis, or Novus Portus, as Ptolemy calls it, the Turnacenses; and at Regulbium or Regulvium, the first cohort of the Betasii, as we read in the Notitia. Ptolemy reckons Londinium, London, among the cities of the Cantii; but he was therein certainly mistaken. When the Roman government was established in Britain, the sea-coast of Kent, which they termed littus Saxonicum, or the Saxon shore, had, from the time of Dioclesian, a particular governor, called by Marcellinus, count of the sea-coast, and by the Notitia, count of the Saxon shore, whose province it was to prevent the barbarians, especially the Saxons, who began then to infest Britain, from plundering the country. In imitation of the Romans, our ancestors set over this coast a governor or portreeve, commonly called the warden of the cinque ports, from his presiding over five ports. Cæsar landed, when a he invaded Britain, in the country of the Cantii, and, as is commonly believed, at Deal, on the twenty-sixth of August, in the afternoon, fifty-four years before the birth of Christ^f. Cantium is parted from the continent by a narrow sea, called by Solinus, Fretum Gallicum; by Tacitus and Ammianus Marcellinus, Fretum Oceani, and Oceanus Fretalis. Thus far of that part of Britain, which is bounded by the ocean, the Severn sea, and the river Tbames.

On the north side of the Tbames, near its head, are placed by Ptolemy the Dobuni, Dobuni. the antient inhabitants of Glostershire and Oxfordshire. In their country that writer mentions but one city, namely Corinium, called by Antoninus, so far as we can conjecture from the distances set down in his itinerary, Durocornovium, which stood in or near the place, where the present town of Cirencester stands. Two other places are taken notice of by Antoninus, viz. Altona, or Avone, and Clevum, or Glevum, built by the Romans, as a curb upon the Silures, now Alvington and Glocester. To the east of the Dobuni lay the country of the Cattiueclani, Calyeueclani, Cattidudani, Catbicludani, as they are styled in different copies of Ptolemy's works. Dion calls them Cattuclani, and also Cassii. In their country, which comprehended Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Hertfordshire, the following places are named by Antoninus; Lastodorum, Bedford; Magiovinium, Ashtwell; Durocobrivis or Durocobriua, Hertford; Pontes, placed in the itinerary twenty-two miles from London; and Verulamium, mentioned not only by Antoninus, but by Ptolemy, and all the Roman writers, who speak of Britain. Camden conjectures Verulamium to have been the town of Cassivelaun, which was taken by Cæsar g. In Nero's time it was a municipium, as we read in Tacitus h; but being afterwards destroyed, as is supposed, in the Saxon war, the town of St. Albans rose out of its ruins, which are still called Verulam. In the country of the Cattiueclani, Ptolemy mentions only Verulamium, which he calls Urolanium, and Salena, of which no footsteps are remaining. Before the arrival of Cæsar, the Cattiueclani had reduced great part of the country belonging to the Dobuni, and were constantly at war with their neighbours.

Next to the Cattiueclani were the Trinobantes, as Cæsar calls them, or Trinonnantes, Trinobantes. as they are styled by Tacitus and Ptolemy. They inhabited the present counties of Middlesex and Essex. To them belonged the city of London, called by Tacitus, Ptolemy, and Antoninus, Londinium; by Ammianus, Lundinum; by Stephanus, Lindonium; and by Bede, Lundonia and civitas Lundonia i. There seems to have been no such place as London in Cæsar's time; and yet it was a town of great note and trade in Nero's, as appears from Tacitus k. It must therefore have been founded between the times of these two emperors, and, in all likelihood, as the learned bishop of Worcester thinks, about the time of Claudius. Tacitus calls it a place famous for trade, and the concourse of merchants, though not distinguished with the title of colony l. Whether in process of time it attained this honour, may be questioned; for though Ammianus Marcellinus styles it Augusta, yet we cannot from thence conclude, that it was a Roman colony, since antiquaries, of no mean character, are of opinion, that the emperors allowed some towns, that were not colonies, to assume that title m. Perhaps it took the name of Augusta from Constantine the Great, who is said to have surrounded it with a wall. Ptolemy, as we have observed above, and also Ravennas, place London in Cantium, on the south side of the Tbames. The other towns of the Trinobantes were, Durolitum, Cæsaromagus, Cononium, Camalodunum, and Colonia, now Leiton, Burghstead, Cannonden, Maldon, and Colchester. Camalodunum, called by Ptolemy, Camudolanum, was the first Roman colony in Britain, granted by the emperor Claudius to the veterans, who, driving out the natives, settled there; but they were afterwards themselves, in a general insurrection, either driven out, or put to the sword, the theatre, the temple of Claudius, and the several villa's in the neighbourhood, belonging to the Roman commanders, being utterly demolished by the incensed Britons, who looked upon the colony as the seat of slavery n. The country bordering on that of the Trinobantes, and comprehending the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, was inhabited by the Iceni, called by Ptolemy, Iceni. Simeni, and by others, Tigeni. Camden is of opinion, that the Iceni were the people, whom Cæsar calls Cenomagni o. To them belonged the following places, mentioned both by Ptolemy and Antoninus, Villa Faußini, Cambretonium, Sitomagus, Venta Icenorum.

rum, Garienis Ostium, Iciami, Brannodium, and Durobrivæ, now St. Edmundsbury, Brettenham, Tbetsford, Castle, Tarmouth, Icbburrough, Brancaſter, Dornford. In the Roman times, the commander of the horſe under the count of the Saxon ſhore was ſtationed at Oſtium Garienis, called alſo Oppidum Garianorum; and the Dalmatian horſe, as appears from the Notitia, at Brannodunum. To theſe we may add Camboriturum, mentioned by Antoninus, though not by Ptolemy, and in the itinerary placed on the Cam, where the preſent city of Cambridge ſtands; which Camden ſuppoſes to have been built out of the ruins of Camboriturum.

Coritani.

On the Iceni bordered the Coritani, whoſe country comprehended Northamptonſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and Derbyſhire. Their chief places were, Lindum, Lincoln; Tripontium, Towceſter; Bennaveſſa or Beneventa, thought to be Northampton; Ratæ, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Rage, according to Camden, Leiceſter; Verometum, Burrowhill; Margidunum, Margedoverton; Pontes, Panton; Crococolanum, and Agelocum, or, as Camden will have it, Adelocum, Iſleton. Lindum, called by Bede, Lindocolina civitas, was, according to Ptolemy, the metropolis of the Coritani. In this country, between the ſprings of the Nen and the Avon, are ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of antient fortifications and military fences, erected, as Camden believes, by Oſtorius governor of Britain, after he had fortified the banks of the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, in order to prevent the irruptions of thoſe who inhabited Wales, and the north parts of Britain. When the banks of the two latter rivers, the one running eaſtward, and the other weſtward, were well defended, the only paſſage from the north into the hither part of Britain was between the ſprings of theſe two rivers; and this paſs was defended with ſtrong works, whereof the ruins are ſtill to be ſeen at Gildsborough and Dantrey. Oſtorius, ſays Tacitus [†], after having diſarmed ſuch as were ſuſpected, by fortifying the banks of the Antona and Sabrina, reſtrained them from breaking into the province; where, inſtead of Antona, mentioned by no other writer, Camden reads Auſona, or Avona, which name was, according to him, common to the Nen and Avon [‡]. To the weſt of the Coritani, were ſituated the Cornavii, who, according to Ptolemy's deſcription of their country, ſeem to have poſſeſſed Warwickſhire, Worceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, and Cheſhire. Their chief towns were, Branonium, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Branogenium, Worceſter; Præſidium on the Auſona or Avona, Warwick, where the præfect or commander of the Dalmatian horſe was poſted by the appointment of the governor of Britain, as we read in the Notitia; Pennocrucium, Penkridge; Viroconinum or Uriconium, as Ptolemy calls it, the metropolis of the Cornavii, probably built by the Romans, when they fortified the banks of the Severn, which is here fordable, and no-where lower. It is now a ſmall village, called Wrockceſter. Out of its ruins roſe the preſent town of Shrewsbury. Deva, or Deuna, as Ptolemy calls it, on the river Deva, from whence the town borrowed its name, now Cheſter. It was antiently a Roman colony, and the ſtation of the twentieth legion, ſurnamed Victrix. Condate, Congleton; and Rutunium, now Routon.

THE principality of Wales, formerly comprehending the whole country beyond the Severn, was, in the Roman times, inhabited by the Silures, the Demetæ, and the Ordovices. To theſe belonged not only the twelve counties of Wales, but likewiſe the two others lying beyond the Severn, viz. Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire, now reckoned among the Engliſh counties. The Silures and Demetæ, according to the deſcription Ptolemy gives us of them, inhabited that part, which is now known by the name of South Wales, and comprises the following counties, Radnorſhire, Brecknockſhire, Glamorganſhire, with Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire. As to the origin of the people, Tacitus is of opinion, that they came originally from Spain, on account of their ruddy complexion, their curled hair, and their ſituation over-againſt that country. They were a warlike people, of great intrepidity and reſolution, utterly averſe to ſervitude, and great ſticklers for their liberties, as will appear from their wars with the Romans under Oſtorius, Veranius, and Julius Frontinus, who in the end ſubdued them. In Herefordſhire ſtood Bletium, now the Old Town on the Munow; and about three ſhort miles weſt of the preſent city of Hereford, near the village of Kencheſter, Ariconium, mentioned by Antoninus. In this country are to be ſeen the veſtiges of ſeveral Roman camps. In Brecknockſhire, towards the north, where it is divided from Radnorſhire by the Wye, ſome place Bullæum Silurum; but others think it ſtood in Glamorganſhire.

- a shire. Brecknock, the chief town of the county, was inhabited, in the Roman times, as appears from several Roman coins found there, from a Roman brick discovered with this inscription, Leg. II. Aug. and from a square camp near this place, called by the natives Gaer, that is, fortification. In Monmouthshire, about three miles from Chepstow, which stands near the fall of the Wye into the Severn, is placed by all our antiquaries Venta Silurum, called to this day Kaer-went, that is, the city Venta; but now only some ruins of it are to be seen. On the north-west border of the county stood Gobannium, mentioned by Antoninus, at the confluence of the Isca, now Wyck or Uck, and the Gavenni; whence it took the name of Gobannium, which, with a small alteration, it retains to this day, being called Aber-Gavenni, that is, the confluence of the Gavenni or Gobannium. About twelve miles from Gobannium, Antoninus places Burrium, where the birdbin or Birtbin falls into the Uck. This place is now known to the Welsh by the name of Brynbiga, and to the English by that of Uck. On the other side the Uck, twelve miles from Burrium, stood Isca Silurum, where the second legion was stationed; whence it is styled by Antoninus, Legio Secunda, and by the Britons to this day Kaer-Lbeion, or Kaer-Wyck, that is, the city of the legion, or of the river Uck. The Legio Secunda, called also Britannica Secunda, was raised by Augustus, and removed out of Germany into Britain by Claudius, under the conduct of Vespasian, to whom, upon his aspiring to the empire, it secured the British legions. It was placed in garrison at Isca by Julius Frontinus against the Silures, and long after that, that is, in the reign of Valentinian, translated from thence by count Theodosius, the father of Theodosius the Great, to Rutupia, as we read in the Notitia, and in Marcellinus. At Isca Silurum, many monuments of antiquity have been discovered, as the reader will find in Camden. The most southern county formerly belonging to the Silures, is Glamorganshire, where, at a small distance from the Remney, which divides it on the east from Monmouthshire, is to be seen Kaer-phily-castle, in the opinion of Camden, the most noble and ancient piece of architecture remaining in Britain. That this castle was built by the Romans, seems highly probable, though we have no other reason to conclude it Roman, but the stateliness of its structure, no Roman inscriptions, statues, coins, or other monuments of antiquity, having ever been discovered there. Camden thinks it was the Bullaum Silurum, of which we have spoken above.

- THE remaining part of South Wales, comprehending Caer-Mardbinshire, Pembroke-Demetae-shire, and Cardiganshire, was likewise inhabited, according to Pliny, by the Silures; but Ptolemy, to whom Britain was better known, placed another nation here, called by him Demetæ and Dimetæ. Besides, both Gildas and Nennius style this country Demetia; and the Britons to this day call it Dyved, changing M into V, according to the dialect of that language. Perhaps the Latin name Dimetia owes its origin to the British Dyved; for it was the custom of the Romans, as Camden observes, to retain such names of the places they conquered, as had been given them by the natives, adding only to them a Latin termination. In the country of the Demetæ, Ptolemy takes notice only of two places, Loventium or Luentium, at the mouth of the Tuerobis, now the Towy, and Maridunum, or, as Antoninus calls it, Muridunum, now Caer-Mardbin. The country now known by the name of North Wales, and comprehending Montgomeryshire, Merionethshire, Caernarvanshire, Denbighshire, and Flintshire, was inhabited by the Ordovices, a brave and powerful nation, who held out first against the Romans, and afterwards against the English, after the other Britons were subdued; for by the Romans they were not reduced till the time of Domitian, nor by the English, till the reign of Henry I. In their country, namely in Montgomeryshire, where the village of Meivod stands at present, stood formerly, according to the conjectures of the best antiquaries, the city of Mediolanum, celebrated both by Ptolemy and Antoninus. Besides Mediolanum, Antoninus mentions other places in the country of the Ordovices; viz. Segontium, on the river Sejont, whence, without all doubt, it took its name; Conovium, now Conway; and Varis, of which the ruins were to be seen in Camden's time, near the village of Bodwar. In this country are the ruins of several ancient forts raised by the Romans, to awe and keep in subjection the natives. Over-against Caernarvanshire lies the island of Mona, now Anglesey, the ancient seat of the Druids, first attempted by Paulinus Suetonius, and afterwards reduced by Agricola. It was called in the British tongue Mén, and, when conquered by the English, Anglesey, that is, the English island.

Brigantes.

THE Brigantes, whom Stephanus calls Brigæ, a numerous and powerful people, and much commended by the ancient writers, possessed the following countries; viz. Yorkshire and the bishoprick of Durham towards the east and the German ocean, and to the west Lancashire, Westmorland, and Cumberland. In Yorkshire, and in the west-riding, on the Dan, now the Don, stood the city of Danum, mentioned by Antoninus, and in the Notitia called the station of the Crispinian horse. Nennius styles it Caer-Dann; but it is now known by the name of Doncaster. Olicana, mentioned by Ptolemy, is, from its situation with respect to Eboracum or York, thought by Camden to have stood where Ilkly, on the Wharf, now stands. It was rebuilt in the reign of Severus by Virius Lupus, legate and proprætor of Britain, as appears from an ancient inscription dug up there¹. The second cohort of the Lingones was quartered here. Near the confluence of the Calder and the Aire stands the small village of Castleford, formerly, according to Camden, Lageolium, or as Antoninus styles it, Lagetium. This our learned antiquary conjectures from its situation, by a Roman way, from several monuments of antiquity discovered there, and its distance from Danum and Eboracum. Colcaria, according to some Tadcaster, according to others Aberford, is mentioned by Antoninus, but not by Ptolemy. Isurium Brigantum is placed by both on the Ure; and by Camden thought to have stood where the present village of Aldborough stands, at a small distance from Borrowbridge. Eboracum or Eburacum, now York, on the Ouse, for the Ure takes that name at Aldburrow, where the Ouseburn, a small brook, falls into it, was the metropolis of the Brigantes. It owed, no doubt, its origin and grandeur to the Romans; for it was both a Roman colony and a municipium, as appears from several ancient inscriptions². The sixth legion, called Viatrix, sent out of Germany into Britain, was quartered here in the time of the Antonines, and likewise the ninth in Galba's reign³. In this city the emperors had a palace, in which died Septimius Severus, and Constantius Chlorus. Upon the death of the latter, his son Constantine, who afterwards acquired the surname of Great, was here first declared emperor. The rescript of the emperors Severus and Antoninus, de rei vindicatione, is dated from this place. Upon the death of Severus, justice was, for some time, administered here by the great oracle of the law Æmilius Paulus. When the Romans abandoned Britain, Eboracum was, by the Scots and Picts, reduced to the shadow of what it had been. In the east-riding, about seven miles from York, stood Derventio, now Auldby, a small village on the Derwent, formerly Derventio. At the same distance from the Abus, now the Humber, where the small town of Wigton stands, stood, in the Roman times, Delgovitia; and on the promontory called by Ptolemy, Ocellum, now Holderness, the city of Prætorium, now Patrington. The only places in Lancashire mentioned by Antoninus, are, Mancunium, now Manchester, and Alione, called in the Notitia, Alione, now Lancaster, the chief town of the county to which it gives name. In Westmorland, two short miles from the Ituna or Eden, stood Vetere, now a village called Burgh. It is mentioned by Antoninus; and from the Notitia we learn, that upon the decline of the Roman empire, was quartered there a præfect, with a band of Diretores. Not far from hence stood Aballaba, on the Ituna, the station, as we read in the Notitia, of the Mauri Aureliani. It retains its ancient name, being now called by contraction Apelby. At Wharfedale appear vast ruins of an ancient town, where Roman coins and urns have been frequently dug up. Here stood, according to Camden, Gallagum, mentioned by Ptolemy, and called by Antoninus, Gallatum; which conjecture agrees with the distances in the itinerary. From this place, an old causeway runs almost in a strait line, for the space of about twenty miles, to Caer-Varran, near the Picts wall. Upon this causeway, now commonly called the Maidenway, Camden thinks, that the stations and mansions, mentioned by Antoninus in his ninth iter, were settled. At Brougham, according to Camden, the ancient Brocovum and Brevoniacum of Antoninus, called in the Notitia, Brocaniacum, where a cohort of the Defensores was quartered, several coins, and other monuments of antiquity, have been dug up. In Cumberland, the sea-coast was fortified by the Romans in such places as were convenient for landing; whence the Scots, when from Ireland they invaded our island, met here with the greatest opposition. Many remains of antiquity are still to be seen at Moresby, perhaps, as the present name seems to imply, the Morbium of the ancients, where, according to the Notitia, the equites cataphracti were quartered. At the head of the Wize, a small river, that falls into the Waver, are

Alauna and Viſtoria. The Horeſti, mentioned by Tacitus, are placed by Camden ^a between the Selgovæ and the Ottadini. Agricola entered their country, as we read in Tacitus; and, having received hoſtages, commanded his admiral to ſail round Britain. Hence Camden infers, that their country bordered on Solway-frith, and that the Roman fleet was then riding there. In this voyage were diſcovered the Orcades, unknown to the world till that time. That narrow neck of land, by which Gleſta and Bodotriæ æſtuaria, that is, Dumbrion and Edinburgh friths, arms of different ſeas, are kept from joining, was fortified by Agricola with gariſons and caſtles; by which means all Britain, on this ſide, being poſſeſſed by the Romans, the barbarians were removed, as it were, into another iſland. Thoſe who dwelt beyond the two friths, are by Dion Caſſius comprehended under the two denominations of Meatae and Caledonii. ^b The ſouth part of Britannia Barbaræ, as the Romans ſtyled it, was poſſeſſed by the former; and the north part by the latter. From the Caledonii, Calidones, Deucaledonii, or Dicalidones, as they are ſtyled by different authors, the north part of Britain was called Caledonia; nay, Florus calls the woods adjoining to the Thames, Caledonian woods; for ſpeaking of Cæſar ſoon after he had paſſed that river, Having followed the Britons, ſays he, into the Caledonian woods, he took one of their kings priſoner ^a. But herein he ſhews himſelf little acquainted with the country. Of the Picti no mention is made either by Tacitus or Ptolemy; but under that denomination the Caledonians were comprehended in Conſtantine's time: I do not mention, ſays Eumenius in his panegyric upon that prince, the woods and marſhes of the Caledonians and other Picti ^b. And Ammianus Marcellinus, writing of the time of Valentinian and Valens; The Picti, ſays he, under which denomination are comprehended the Dicalidones and the Vecturiones, the Attacotti likewise, a warlike nation, and the Scotti, roaming about, committed great deſtroyations ^c. Hence it is manifeſt, that, in the reigns of thoſe two princes, the Attacotti, and the Scotti or Scots, were two different nations from the Caledonii and the Picti. But of Scotland, and its antient inhabitants, we ſhall ſpeak more at length hereafter. Thus far of the inhabitants of Britain, of their towns and territories, while the Romans were maſters of the iſland, in the deſcription of which we have followed Ptolemy, Antoninus, and our beſt modern antiquaries. But, after all, we cannot pretend exactly to aſcertain the bounds of ſo many different nations ſubject to ſo many kings, who were continually making encroachments upon ^d each other. Moſt of the towns we have mentioned were, in all likelihood, built after the Romans had made themſelves maſters of the iſland; but that the Britons had no towns at all before their arrival, as Strabo ſeems to inſinuate ^d, is what we can hardly believe. What that geographer wrote of Gaul and Britain, he copied from Cæſar, who tells us indeed, that the Britons gave the name of towns to woods, after they had fortified them with a ditch and rampart, to reſtrain the incuſſions of thoſe with whom they were at war ^e. But, from their giving the name of towns to the woods, which they choſe for places of ſhelter, and fortified in time of war, we cannot conclude, that they had no other places, deſerving that name, to dwell in, when under no apprehenſion of an enemy. Who can believe, that the twenty towns, which ^e Veſpaſian reduced under the emperor Claudius, as we read in Suetonius ^f, were only woods thus fortified and fenced in?

WE cannot diſmiſs this ſubject, without taking notice of the walls or ramparts raiſed by the Roman emperors in this iſland, to ſecure the countries belonging to Rome againſt the incuſſions of the northern barbarians. That three walls were erected for that purpoſe by three different emperors, is manifeſt from hiſtory. Of theſe the ^f firſt and hithermoſt was, without all doubt, the work of Adrian; for Spartian tells us in expreſs terms, that he was the firſt, who, by a wall or rampart eighty miles in length, parted the Romans and barbarians ^a. This wall is, by our beſt antiquaries, placed between Solway-frith and Tinmouth; and truly, conſidering its extent, it can be placed no-where elſe. This wall or rampart, (for ſome writers ſtyle it muris, and others vallum) was made, ſays Spartian, in modum muralis ſepis, or ſepti, that is, after the manner of a mural hedge, with large ſtakes fixed deep in the ground, and faſtened together. Upon it ſtood Pons Ælia, perhaps Pont-Eland in Northumberland, Claffis Ælia, Cobors Ælia, and Ala Sabiniana, which took their names from Ælius Adrianus, and his wife Sabina. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, the ſucceſſor of Adrian, the a Brigantes revolted; but Lollius Urbicus, then governor of Britain, having overcome them, and driven back the barbarians, built another wall of turf or earth, says Capitolinus in the life of Antoninus Pius^b. As no ancient writer mentions the place where this second wall was built, it is impossible to determine it with any certainty. Some learned antiquaries, whom we have followed in our Roman history^c, place it between the friths of Forth and Clyde. But Camden and Brietius, upon the authority of a very ancient chorographical table, are of opinion, that it began at the mouth of the Taus or Tweed, and was carried southward to the head of the Eske in Eske-dale, so as to secure the east coast, and inclose part of the country of the Ottadini. Upon second thoughts, this opinion does not seem to us improbable, since Antoninus begins his itinerary from the mouth of the Tweed, as the most northern boundary, at that time, of the Roman empire. The first wall was built, according to our best chronologers, in the year of the christian æra 123. the fourth of Adrian's reign, Glabrio and Torquatus being then consuls; and the other in 142. the third of Antoninus Pius, then consul with Marcus Aurelius Antoninus^k. That a third wall was built by the emperor Severus, is plain from Spartian, who, in the life of that prince, tells us, that he secured Britain with a wall carried on cross the island from sea to sea^l. There is a great disagreement among antiquaries about the place where this wall was built. Camden maintains, that Severus's wall was raised in the same place, where Adrian had erected his about eighty years before. But we cannot help disagreeing herein with that learned antiquary, since Eutropius, in the life of Severus writes, that he built a wall thirty-two miles in length, reaching from sea to sea; whereas Adrian's wall extended eighty, viz. from Solway-frith to Tinmouth. Besides, we cannot persuade ourselves, that Severus, after having overcome in several battles the barbarians, after having marched from one end of the island to the other, and been at an immense trouble and charge, not to mention the loss of fifty thousand men, in draining marshes, cutting down woods, and making highways, should have abandoned so extensive a country, which Agricola had formerly reduced, and Antoninus inclosed with a wall, and this at a time when the enemies of Rome were quite dispirited, and suing for peace. It must therefore be placed on the isthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde; and indeed, if it was but thirty-two miles in length, it could stand in no other part of the whole island, that was ever possessed by the Romans. But the hithermost wall, says Camden, is still called Gual Seuer, that is, Severus's wall. May not those, who call it so, be mistaken? Is it not well known; that many appellations, or, as we may style them, traditions, of this nature, when narrowly examined, prove quite groundless? Such is this, if we believe the Scots writers, who, as Camden himself observes, have always called the hithermost wall Adrian's wall. The neck of land between the two friths of Forth and Clyde is not above sixteen miles over. This tract Agricola secured with castles and forts placed at convenient distances, that the forces might easily draw together upon the first apprehension of danger. In building afterwards the wall, those who were employed in the work, took the most direct line; which must be the cause why some of the forts are at a distance from it. They began it where the rivers are narrow, and carried it along the neck of land between the friths. It begins between the Queen's-ferry and Abercorn, and, for the space of thirty-six Scots Miles, runs westward to Dumbrition, with a great ditch on the north side of the wall, and many square fortifications in the form of a Roman camp. It is called by the inhabitants of the neighbouring country Graham's dyke. But of Severus's wall, we have spoken at length in our Roman history^m, to which we refer the reader. The hithermost was, as we have observed already, built by Adrian, not with stone, but turf or earth, and defended by a rampart, and sharp stakes driven deep into the ground. However, it is certain, that afterwards a stone wall was built in the same place; but when, or by what emperor, we cannot determine. The remains of this wall were still to be seen in Camden's time. That learned antiquary traced it with great care, and, according to the account he gives us of it, it began at Blatobulgium, or Bulnefs, on the Irish sea, kept along the side of Solway-frith by Burgh-upon-sands to Lugovallum, now Carlisle, where it passed the Ituna or Eden. Thence it was carried on cross the little river of Cambeck, where the ruins of a great castle were to be seen. Afterwards passing the rivers Irthing and Poltrofe, it entered Northumberland, and through those mountains along the river South Tine, was continued by a bridge over North Tine, and ended at the German ocean. On the north side of the wall was a ditch twelve a yards broad. In some places it is six yards deep, hewn out of the solid rock. The wall itself was about eight foot thick, and in very few places built upon that of Adrian. Camden takes this to be the wall, that was built by the Romans about the middle of the fifth century, upon their abandoning the island. But one legion only was then sent over, and that was soon after recalled: and could one legion, in a very short time, and in great haste to return, build, even with the assistance of the Britons, a stone wall eight foot in breadth, twelve in height, and eighty miles in length? This to us seems incredible, and therefore we are inclined to think, that this last wall was built upon that of Severus between Bodotria and Glota, where, in Buchanan's time, were discovered the remains of a stone wall^a. This is the opinion of the learned b Usher, who maintains, that Bede was mistaken in placing the last wall between the Eden and the Tine^c. The last legion, sent to the assistance of the Britons, drove out the barbarians with great slaughter, and recovered the country they had seized. Is it therefore probable, that, abandoning such a vast tract to the enemy, they would have chosen to build a wall eighty miles in length, though in great haste to return to the continent, when they might have inclosed a much larger country with a wall not half so long?

Britannia Superior and Inferior.

THESE three walls were, in different times, the boundaries of the Roman empire, dividing Britannia Romana from Britannia Barbara, which last appellation they gave to that part of Britain, which was not subject to Rome. Britannia Romana was c divided into Britannia Superior, and Britannia Inferior, or Upper and Lower Britain. The former reached from the Chanel at least as far as Chester, comprehending both England and Wales, as they are now styled; for, on one hand, we read in Dion Cassius, that the legio secunda Augusta was quartered in Upper Britain^d; and on the other, in Ptolemy, that it had its station at Isca Silurum, now Caer Lleon, about four miles from the Severn in Monmouthshire^e. The same Dion Cassius tells us, that the Legio vigesima, called likewise Valeriana and Vittrix, was quartered in Upper Britain; and both Ptolemy and Antoninus determine the place, viz. Deva, now Chester, on the Deva, now the Dee. The Legio sexta Vittrix is placed by Dion Cassius in Lower Britain; and by Antoninus, as well as by Ptolemy, at Eboracum or York, which, as it d is plain from hence, stood in Lower Britain. Under this division was comprised only that part of Britain, which was subject to the Romans, the other more northern part being by them distinguished with the name of Britannia Barbara. This division owed, without all doubt, its origin to the emperor Severus, who, having settled the affairs of Britain, divided it, as we read in Herodian^f, into two prefectures. Before that prince's reign, no mention is made of any division of Britain; and Ptolemy, who divides Germany, Pannonia, and Mæsia into Upper and Lower, takes no notice of any such division in his description of Britain; a convincing proof, that, when he wrote, that is, in the reign of Marcus Antoninus, this division was not yet introduced. If Severus was, as he seems to have been, the author of this division, e Britannia Inferior extended to the isthmus between Glota and Bodotria, where he built a wall, parting Britannia Romana from Britannia Barbara.

Britain divided into five governments.

Britannia Romana, comprehending the Upper and Lower Britain, was first divided, probably by Constantine the Great, into four governments; viz. Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cæsariensis, and Maxima Cæsariensis. Britannia Prima lay between the Chanel on one side, and the Thames and the Severn on the other; Britannia Secunda reached from the Severn to the Irish sea; Flavia Cæsariensis was inclosed by the Thames, the Severn, and the Humber; and Maxima Cæsariensis extended from the Humber to Adrian's wall. To these was added afterwards the province of Valentia, probably so called by the emperor Valentinian from his brother Valens; for, in f the reign of Valentinian, this country, extending from Adrian's wall to the friths of Bodotria and Glota, was recovered by Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name. This division we have copied from the breviary, which Sextus Rufus wrote, and dedicated to the emperor Valentinian. Of this work, some imperfect copies leave out Flavia Cæsariensis; and one of these Camden has followed. Each of these provinces had its particular magistrate, some a consular, others only a præses or president. They were all, according to the Notitia, subject to the vicarius of Britain, as he was to the præfectus prætorio of Gaul, one of the four præfecti prætorio instituted by Con-

a stantine. The vicar of Britain had several officers under him for the better and more expeditious administration of civil affairs, viz. his princeps or lieutenant; a cornicularius, who published the sentences and decrees of the vicar and other magistrates, and was so called from cornu a horn, with the sounding of which he commanded silence in the court; two numerarii or accountants, whose province it was to set down the sums of the public revenues; a commentariensis or jailor, so called from the commentaria or kalendars of the prisoners, which he kept, and delivered to the judges; officers called ab actis, that is, public notaries, who wrote testaments, contracts, and other instruments; secretaries called de cura, and de cura epistolarum, whose office it was to write and send letters and dispatches from the governors of the provinces to the emperor, or to each other. Besides a great number of petty officers, viz. informers, pursuivants, apparitors, &c. the vicar had under him the governors of the five above-mentioned provinces, who were three presidents, and two consulars; for by presidents were governed Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Casariensis; and the other two, Maxima Casariensis and Valentia, by consulars, as appears from the Notitia, and was agreeable to the custom of the Romans, who, on the decline of the empire, committed to consulars the care of those provinces only, that, lying next to the enemy, were most exposed to their attempts. The vicar had the power of reversing the judgments and decrees of the other governors; and with the same power was the præfectus prætorio of Gaul vested, with respect to the judgments and decrees of the vicar. The ensigns of the vicar's office were a book of mandates in a green cover, and five castles placed on the triangular form of the island, with the names of the five above-mentioned provinces, which they represented.

By the vicar, and the governors of the five provinces under him, was the civil government administered. As to the military, it was executed by three chief officers under the magister militum of the west; viz. the comes Britanniarum, the comes littoris Saxonici, and the dux Britanniarum. No mention is made in the Notitia of the troops under the command of the count of Britain, nor of the places under his jurisdiction; but as the other two commanded on the coasts, and in the northern parts of Britain, as appears from the places where their forces were quartered, we conclude from thence, that the inland and south part of the island was subject to his command. The comes littoris Saxonici, or count of the Saxon shore, whose province it was to cover the eastern coast, lying over-against Germany, and prevent the Saxon pirates from ravaging the country, had no fewer than eight præpositi under his command, and one tribune; viz. the præpositus or commander of the numerus or cohort of the Fortenses, quartered at Osbona, thought to be Hastings; the præpositus of the Tungricani at Dubris or Dover; the præpositus of the Turnacenses at Lemanis or Lime; the præpositus of the Branodunenses, who were Dalmatian horse, at Branodunum or Brancaaster in Norfolk; the præpositus of the Stablesian horse at Gariannonum or Caistor, near Tarmouth; the præpositus of the second legion, called Augusta, quartered at Rutupie or Richborough; the præpositus of the Abulci at Anderida or Newenden; and the præpositus of the exploratores, whose office it was to discover the state and motions of the enemy, at Portus Adurni, or Ederington in Suffex. The tribune commanded under the præpositus of the legion. The dux Britanniarum had under him fourteen præpositi; viz. the præpositus of the sixth legion quartered at York or Eboracum; the præpositus of the Dalmatian horse at Præsidium, or Patrington in Holderness; the præpositus of the Crispian horse at Danum or Doncaster; the præpositus of the Catafractarian horse at Morbium, perhaps Morsby in Cumberland; the præpositus of the Barcarii Tigrinenses at Arbeia or Jerby in the same county; the præpositus of the Nervii Diētenses at Diētis or Diganwy in Caernarvanshire; the præpositus of the Vigiles or scouts at Concangii or Kendal in Westmorland; the præpositus of the Exploratores at Lavatres or Bowes in Yorkshire; the præpositus of the Direlli at Vetera or Burgh upon Stanmore in Westmorland; the præpositus of the Defensores at Broconiocum or Bougham in the same county; the præpositus of the Solenses at Magona, thought by Camden to be Macbleneth in Montgomeryshire; the præpositus of the Pacenses at Magi or Old Radnor; the præpositus of the Longonicarii at Longonicus or Langcheester, in the bishoprick of Durham; and lastly, the præpositus of the Derventionenses, so called from Derventio, where they were quartered, a town upon the Derwent, seven miles from York, thought to be Auldbury. All these præpositi are named in the Notitia, with the places where they were quartered.

* Vide PANCROL. in notit. imperii.

BESIDES the above-mentioned forces, a strong guard or watch was kept on the wall, or, as the Notitia expresses it, along the line of the wall; per lineam valli. Here was posted the tribune of the fourth cohort of the Lergi, at a place called Segodunum, now Seaton, on the sea-coast of Northumberland. The tribune of the cohort of the Comonii had his station at Pons Ælii or Pontland in Northumberland. This bridge was probably made by order of the emperor Ælius Adrianus. The tribune of the ala of the Astores was quartered at Condercum or Chester-upon-the-street, in the bishoprick of Durham. Next to him was stationed the tribune of the first cohort of the Frixagi at Vindobala, as we read in the Notitia, or Vindomora, as it is styled in the itinerary, the former name importing, in the British language, finis muri, and the latter finis valli; and hence the place is now called the Wall's-end, in Northumberland, the river Tine serving perhaps instead of a rampart from this place to the sea. The prefect of the ala Saviniana was posted at Hunnum, which Camden conjectures to be Sevenshale in the same county. The prefect of the second ala of the Astores lay at Cilurnum, which some take for Cillerford, and some for Scilicest-on-the-wall, likewise in Northumberland. The tribune of the first cohort of the Batavi was stationed at Procolitia, according to some, Colchester upon the Tine. The tribune of the first cohort of the Tungri was quartered at Borcovicus or Borwick in Northumberland. The tribune of the fourth cohort of the Gauls at Vindolana or Winchester-on-the-wall. The tribune of the first cohort of the Astores at Æsica, thought to be Neiberly on the Esk in Cumberland. The tribune of the second cohort of the Dalmatae at Magni, a place without all doubt near the wall, and not Raanor, called by the same name. The tribune of the first cohort Ælia at Amboglanna, according to some Willoford in Cumberland, according to Camden, Ambleside in Westmorland. The prefect of the ala Petriana at Perith in Cumberland. The prefect of the Mauri Aureliani at Aballaba, or Apleby in Westmorland. The tribune of the second cohort of the Lergi at Congavata, or Rose-castle near Carlisle in Cumberland. The tribune of the cohort of the Hispani at Axelodunum, now Hexham in Northumberland. The tribune of the second cohort of Thracians at Gabrosetum, Gatehead, close to Newcastle. The tribune of the first cohort, called Ælia Classica, at Tinnocellum or Tinmouth. This cohort, Camden thinks, was employed in naval affairs, induced thereunto by the surname of Classica given it in the Notitia. That the Romans kept some vessels on the Tine, to hinder the Caledonians from making descents on their territories, is not improbable; for that they maintained a fleet in the ports of this island, is manifest from a law still extant in the pandects, wherein mention is made by Javolenus of one Seius Saturninus, archigubernus or admiral of the British fleet*. The tribune of the first cohort of the Morini was stationed at Glannobanta, thought by Camden to have stood on the Wentbeek in Cumberland. The tribune of the third cohort of the Nervii at Alione, now Whitley-castle in Westmorland. The cuneus of the Armatura is placed by the Notitia at Brementuracum, a station near the wall, and not in the neighbourhood of Preston in Lancashire, sixty miles distant from the wall, as Camden would have it. The prefect of the first ala Herculea had his station at Olenacum or Ellenborough in Cumberland, where many monuments of antiquity have been discovered. The tribune of the sixth cohort of the Nervii is mentioned the last of all in the Notitia, and placed at Verosidium, thought to be Werewich upon the Eden near Carlisle. All these forces were appointed to defend the limit, that is, to secure the wall, under the command of the dux Britanniarum. These three officers, viz. the comes Britanniarum, the comes littoris Saxonici, and the dux Britanniarum, were equal in power, but subordinate to the vicar. The forces maintained in Britain under the two latter officers, amounted, according to Pancirolos, to nineteen thousand two hundred foot, and seventeen hundred horse. Of the troops under the comes Britanniarum, we find no account in the Notitia; Pancirolos thinks, because the greater part of the island was then in the power of the barbarians. But this reason might have served against enumerating the forces under the two other commanders; for, at the very time the Notitia was compiled, the Britons were, by frequent embassies, soliciting the emperor, and his officers in Gaul, for aid; which they could not have wanted, had the fourth part of the troops, set down in the Notitia, been quartered towards the wall. In the times before the Notitia, no mention is made of the comes Britanniarum, but only of the dux, and the comes tractus maritimi, called comes littoris

- a Saxonici, when the Saxon pirates began to infest the coasts. The first vicar of Britain we find mentioned in history, and probably the first who, with that title, governed here, is Pacatianus, to whom we find an edict directed in 319. enacting, that one decurio should not be bound to pay the taxes that were due from another*. The authority of the count of the Saxon shore was thought to have been confined within Britain, till it was by the learned Selden extended to the opposite coasts of Cimbria, Batavia, Belgica, and Armorica†; for to them he finds the name of littus Saxonicum given by the writers of those times, no doubt from their being infested by the Saxon pirates. The count of Britain had for his ensigns a book of mandates, and the island represented in a triangular form; the count of the Saxon shore a purple book, with nine castles, representing the nine places where the præpositi and tribune, under his command, were quartered; and the dux likewise a purple book, with the fourteen places, where the prefects under him were stationed. Of these munitions or forts, fourteen have over them the names we have mentioned; but the first has only the word sextæ, signifying, we suppose, the station of the sixth legion, which was quartered at York; whence that city is styled by Antoninus, in his itinerary, Eboracum legio sexta; and in a coin of Severus, Col. Eboracum Legio vi. Victrix. If the power and jurisdiction of the count of the Saxon shore had extended to the opposite coasts of Gaul and Germany, as Selden maintains, mention would have been made in the Notitia of the forces under his command in those places; but as the Notitia is quite silent upon that head, and, in the ensigns of that officer, we find only the names of nine British towns or garrisons, we conclude from thence, that his authority was confined to this island. His troops were quartered in several towns or stations along the coast from Kent to the most northern part of Norfolk. The more northern coasts, and that facing Ireland, with the inland countries in those parts, were under the jurisdiction of the dux Britanniarum; for Danum, now Doncaster, seems to have been the most southern station of his troops. These stations, designed at first for camps, called in Latin castra, grew, by degrees, into cities; and this is the origin of almost all our great cities and towns, built either in the same places where the Roman camps were, or at a small distance from them. This observation holds especially in those, the names of which end in chester or cester, derived from the Latin word castra; for, to this day, the stations or forts near the Picts wall, the remains of which are to be seen in several places, are, by the common people, called Chesters‡.

- To maintain a communication between one station and another, and for the convenience of the armies, when they marched, or of the governors, when they visited the provinces, the troops, in peaceable times, were employed in making roads or causeways, called viæ militares, consulares, prætoriae, stratæ, publicæ, &c. As no fewer than an hundred and fourteen mansions through fifteen different roads are mentioned in the Itinerary, and in the Notitia forty-six garrisons, viz. nine on the sea-coast, under the command of the comes littoris Saxonici, fourteen more inland; and twenty-three per lineam valli, or along the wall, under the jurisdiction of the dux Britanniarum, many highways must have been made for passing, according to the Roman custom, from one place, however distant, to another. Our historians indeed mention only four of note; but, in a province so abounding with stations, camps, fortresses and cities, there must, without all doubt, have been a great many more. Had the Notitia given us an account of the forces and places under the command of the dux Britanniarum, as well as of the other two great officers, we should have had knowledge of more cities and places of note in this island; for Bede tells us out of Gildas, who flourished about the time the Notitia was composed, that, in those days, there were twenty-eight most stately cities, besides innumerable castles, fortified with strong walls, towers, and gates§. The four ways, or, as we call them, streets, mentioned by our historians, are, Watling-street, so called, as is conjectured, either from Vitellianus a Roman, perhaps employed in making it, or from a Saxon word signifying a beggar, it being much frequented by beggars. This way is thought by some to have reached from Dover to Cardigan in Wales; by others to have extended from Dover to the coast over-against Anglesey, passing through London, Dunstable, Towcester, Allerstun, and crossing the Severn near the Wrekin in Shropshire. The Foss-way, so called perhaps, because in some places it was never perfected, but left like a ditch. This way is thought to have reached from Totness in Cornwall to Lincoln, and from Lincoln to

It led from Southampton to York, and from thence to Tinmouth. Ermine or Erminage-street, reaching from St. David's to Southampton^a. Besides these, we find two others mentioned in history; viz. Julia Strata in Monmouthshire, made, as Camden conjectures, by Julius Frontinus, who subdued the Silures; and Strata Marcella, mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis, as lying at a small distance from Julia Strata: The former is thought to have been the work of Ulpus Marcellus, proprætor of Britain in the reign of Commodus.

Several corps of Britons in the Roman armies

THE forces, employed in the defence of Britain, were all foreigners, as the reader must have observed, the Romans not thinking it safe to trust the natives, who perhaps would have defended their country with more vigour and resolution against the barbarians, but might, when masters of all the strong places, have turned their arms against their masters, and shaken off the yoke. To prevent this, the Romans transplanted into other countries the numerous levies raised here. It appears from the Notitia, and several antient inscriptions, that bodies of British troops were dispersed almost over the whole empire; for we find the following corps mentioned; viz. Ala Britannica milliaria, Ala quarta Britonum in Ægypto, Cobors prima Ælia Britonum, Cobors tertia Britonum, Cobors septima Britonum, Cobors vicecima sexta Britonum in Armorica, Britanniciani sub magistro peditum, Invieli juniores Britanniciani, Excubitores juniores Britanniciani, Britones cum magistro equitum Galliarum, Invieli juniores Britones intra Hispaniam, Britones seniores in Illyrico. These different corps were supplied from time to time out of this island. No wonder therefore, that Britain, exhausted and deprived of its youth by so numerous levies, became, upon the withdrawing of the foreign troops quartered here, a prey to the northern barbarians. Having thus described the state of Britain before and after the arrival of the Romans, we shall now proceed to the history of that part of it, which was subject to Rome, from the time of its being first invaded by Julius Cæsar, to its desertion by the Romans in the reign of Valentinian III. containing the space of about five hundred years.

The history of Britain, from the first coming of Julius Cæsar, to its desertion by the Romans.

Cæsar's first expedition into Britain.

BRITAIN was but little known to the Romans till the time of Julius Cæsar (A), d who, having carried his victorious arms to the opposite coast of Gaul, parted from Britain by a narrow chanel, there formed the design of bringing the Britons, as he had already done the most warlike nations of Gaul, under the dominion of Rome. Whatever

(A) We must ingenuously confess, that we have no accounts, but such as are evidently fabulous, of what passed in this island before the Romans were acquainted with it. Gildas, who flourished in the latter end of the sixth century, freely owns, that, as for the antient monuments of his country, they were no-where to be found in his time, being either destroyed by the enemy, or carried into foreign countries by the banished Britons. However, Annius of Viterbo, in his Berosus, gives us a long succession of Celtic kings, whom he derives from Samothet, one of the sons of Japhet, supposing him to have planted colonies first on the continent of Celtica or Gaul, and afterwards in this island, from him named Samothet. But Annius has been long since unmasked, and the fables he vends in his counterfeit Berosus universally exploded. What Geoffrey of Monmouth writes of Brutus, and the kings descended from him, supposed to have reigned in this island, deserves no more credit, than the fables of Annius, whether Geoffrey was the author, or only the translator of that pretended history; for, in the preface prefixed to it, he tells us, that he received an anti-ent British history from Walter archdeacon of Oxon, which he faithfully translated out of the British tongue into Latin. This history, or rather romance, he inscribed to Robert earl of Glocester, natural son to Henry I. But though it was at first received with uncommon applause by the Welsh, who, to this day, are unwilling to give it up as fabulous, yet it began very early to be cried down, as appears from what we read in William Niobrigensis, who flourished not long after Geoffrey, and writes of him thus: "In these our days a certain writer is risen, who has devised many foolish fictions of the Britons. His name is Geoffrey." And a little after: "With how little shame, with what great confidence, does he frame lyes!" However, as it would be unpardonable in us to pass over in silence what all our historians have thought fit to take notice of, we shall here relate, in a few words, what we read in Geoffrey's fabulous history of Brutus, and his successors, said to have reigned in this island many ages before the arrival of the Romans. According to that writer, Brutus, the great-grandson of Æneas by his son Ascanius, having accidentally killed with an

- ^a Whatever was the real motive that prompted him to this undertaking, whether his unbounded ambition and thirst of glory, as to us seems most likely, or the hopes of enriching himself with the British pearls, as we read in Suetonius ^b, the pretence he alleged was, that, in all the wars of Gaul, the Britons had assisted with considerable supplies the enemies of the republic. Upon this either real or pretended provocation, he attempted to pass over into Britain, and, by the conquest of this island, enhance the reputation, which he had already acquired in Gaul. As the summer was already far spent, and winter came on very early in these northern climates, he was sensible, that the time of the year would not allow him to finish the war. However, he thought it would be no small advantage to view the island, to learn the temper, ^b customs, and manners of the inhabitants, and to get some knowledge of their ports and havens, then visited by none but merchants, who were acquainted with the coast lying over-against Gaul, but seemed utter strangers to the rest of the country; for, being called together by Cæsar from all parts, they could not inform him of what extent the island was; by what nations, and how powerful, it was peopled; how they understood the art of war; by what customs they were governed; or what ports were capable of receiving a fleet of great ships (B). In order therefore to discover what he could not learn of the merchants, he sent out C. Volusenus with a galley, injoining him to return as soon as possible with what intelligence he could get. Suetonius tells us, that Cæsar went in person to view the coast; but Cæsar's own ^c account shews that writer was mistaken ^c. In the mean time Cæsar marched all his forces into the country of the Morini, now the province of Picardy, whence was the shortest passage into Britain, ordering at the same time all the vessels, that lay in the neighbouring ports, and the fleet, which he had built the year before for his expedition against the Morini, to attend him. The Britons, alarmed at these preparations, dispatched ambassadors to Cæsar, offering to submit to Rome, and deliver hostages for their fidelity. Cæsar received them with great kindness; and having encouraged them, with fair promises, to persist in their resolution, he sent them back to their own country, ordering Comius, whom, for his extraordinary wisdom, virtue, and fidelity, he had made king of the Atrebares, to attend them into Britain, an arrow his father Sylvius, king of Alba, was forced to leave Italy; and flying into Greece, joined there the Trojans, who had settled in that country after the destruction of their city. With these he put to sea, being supplied with a fleet by Pandrusus, king of the country, whose daughter he had married; and entering the Atlantic sea, performed wonders in several places, particularly in Gaul, where he overcame Goffarius king of Aquitain, and drove him from his kingdom. But the banished king having prevailed upon the other princes of Gaul to lend him powerful succours, Brutus, not finding himself in a condition to withstand so great a force, put to sea again, and, after a few days sail, arrived on the coast of Albion, and landed at the place in Devonshire, where Tonnes now stands. He immediately marched up into the country, which he found peopled by giants, whose chief or king was Gogmagog. These he overcame; and having rooted them out, and divided the lands among his people, he called the island, from his own name, Britain. Having got possession of the whole country, he built a city in a proper place, which he made the seat of his kingdom, calling it Troja Nova, a name afterwards changed into Troynovantium or Trinobantum. Before his death, he divided his kingdom among his three sons. Loetrinus, the eldest, had for his share Leogria, so called from him, now England. Camber, Brutus's second son, had Cambria, now Wales; and Albanactus, Albania, now Scotland. Having laid this foundation, the author pursues his history, giving us an account of the various revolutions, that happened in the island in the reigns of the kings, who succeeded each other, from Brutus to Cassibel- lan, who, being appointed guardian to Androgeus and Temmanius, his two nephews, the sons of king Lud, prevailed upon the people to transfer the kingdom upon himself. Lud is said by Geoffrey to have surrounded the city of London with new walls and towers, and to have built a gate, which, from him, is still called Ludgate. In the reign of Cassibelan, Cæsar landed in Britain; and here it is, as Camden well observes, that the English historian ought to begin his history, whatever Geoffrey or others have written of the British affairs before this period being altogether groundless. As for Geoffrey's history in particular, it sufficiently confutes itself, bringing with it such marks of forgery, as must evidently convince every reader, that the whole is a fiction either of Geoffrey himself, or of the author, whom he pretends to have copied.

(B) Cæsar tells us elsewhere (1), that Divitiacus, one of the most powerful men in Gaul, was not only master of a considerable part of that country, but had some footing likewise in Britain; that several provinces of Britain were peopled by colonies from Gaul; that the Britons had assisted the Gauls in most of their wars; and lastly, that such of the Gauls as were desirous to be perfect masters of the learning of the Druids, used to pass over into Britain to study it there. How could Britain therefore, at that time, be so utterly unknown in Gaul, or only known to merchants, nay, and to them so little, that being called together by Cæsar from all parts, they could not give him any tolerable account of the people, of their customs, manners, laws, method of fighting, &c. nay, not even of their ports and harbours?

with instructions to visit as many states as he could, to persuade them to accept of an alliance with Rome, and to acquaint them with his design of landing in a short time in their country. In the mean time Volusenus, having made what discoveries he could from his ship, for he did not think it advisable to venture ashore, returned after five days to Caesar, and acquainted him with what he had observed. Hereupon Caesar, having embarked two legions on board eighty transports, and appointed eighteen more, which were wind-bound at a port about eight miles off, to convey over the cavalry, weighed anchor about the third watch, commanding the cavalry to embark at the port, where the vessels lay ready to receive them, and follow him; which orders were too slowly executed. Caesar himself arrived in a few hours on the British coast; but finding the hills and cliffs hanging over the sea covered with armed men, who from thence might, with their darts, easily prevent his landing, he lay by till three in the afternoon, waiting for some of his ships, that were not yet come up, in order to look out for some other place, where he might land his troops with less danger. Upon their joining the fleet, he summoned the chief officers to a council of war; and having acquainted them with the intelligence he had received from Volusenus, and given them such orders as he thought proper for the occasion, he set sail, and arriving at a plain and open shore about eight miles farther, he there came to an anchor. The Britons, apprised of Caesar's design, sent their cavalry and chariots before, the rest of the army hastening after them, in order to oppose his landing. The main difficulty in getting to land proceeded from the largeness of the ships, which required a considerable depth of water; so that the Roman soldiers were obliged, loaded as they were with heavy armour, to leap into the sea, and at the same time to struggle with the waves, and encounter the enemy, who, having their hands disengaged, as they either stood on dry land, or waded but a little way into the water, could boldly cast their darts, and drive back an enemy thus incumbered. This disadvantage so discouraged the Romans, as Caesar himself owns, that they did not appear so chearful, nor so eager to engage the enemy, as in their former conflicts on dry land; which being perceived by the general, he ordered his long ships or galleys to advance with their broad sides towards the shore, in order to force the Britons, with their slings, arrows and engines, to retire from the water-side. This had, in some degree, the desired effect; for the Britons, surprised at the make of the galleys, a sort of shipping they had never seen, and overwhelmed with showers of darts and arrows thence discharged upon them, began to give ground. But the Romans still betraying great backwardness to throw themselves into the water, the standard-bearer of the tenth legion, having first invoked the gods, cried out aloud, Fellow soldiers, unless you will forsake your colours, and suffer the Roman eagle to fall into the hands of the enemy, follow me; for I am resolved to discharge my duty to the commonwealth and my general. Having thus spoken, he leaped into the sea, and advanced with the eagle towards the enemy. Hereupon the soldiers in the same ship, encouraging each other not to suffer so great a disgrace as the loss of their ensign, followed his example; which those in the other ships perceiving, they too cast themselves boldly into the sea, and, pressing forward, began the fight, which proved very sharp on both sides, and, for some time, no-ways favourable to the Romans; for not being able either to keep their ranks, get firm footing, or, leaping out of several ships, follow their particular standards, they were put into great confusion by the Britons; who, being acquainted with the shallows, when they saw them coming in small numbers out of their ships, spurred their horses into the water, and attacked them incumbered and unprepared; which Caesar observing, he caused several boats to be manned, and sent them to the assistance of those, whom he saw most distressed. By this means, the Romans, having at length gained firm footing, charged the enemy so briskly, that they put them to flight; but could not pursue them for want of horse, the cavalry not being yet arrived; which, Caesar says, was the only thing wanting to complete his wonted success^d.

UPON this defeat, the Britons immediately sent ambassadors, and with them Comius, whom they had committed to prison, to sue for peace. This treatment they endeavoured to excuse, by laying the blame on the multitude. Caesar, having upbraided them with their breach of faith, in making war upon him after they had sent ambassadors to him into Gaul, desiring peace, promised to forgive them, on condition they

- a delivered a certain number of hostages. Part of these they brought immediately, promising to return in a few days with the rest, who lived at some distance. Peace being thus concluded four days after Cæsar's landing in Britain, the British princes, having disbanded their men, and sent them back into their several countries, came to submit themselves and their states to Cæsar. In the mean time the eighteen transports, that were conveying over the Roman cavalry, being overtaken by a violent storm, were driven back to the ports of Gaul. By the same storm, Cæsar's fleet, Cæsar's fleet which lay in the road, was greatly damaged, several of them being dashed to pieces, greatly damaged by a storm. and others, by the loss of their anchors, cables, and rigging, rendered wholly useless; which caused a great consternation in the army, for they wanted materials
- b wherewithal to refit them, in order to return to the continent, and provisions to support them any considerable time in the island, Cæsar having all along intended to pass the winter in Gaul. What added to the misfortune, the same night, it being then full moon, the tide rose so high, that the galleys, which had been drawn ashore, were filled with water. This caused a new panic, the Roman mariners being quite unacquainted with the tides. The British chiefs, who were assembled to perform their agreement with Cæsar, perceiving his want of horse, ships, and provisions, and judging of the number of his men from the smallness of his camp, which was narrower than usual, because the legions had left their heavy baggage behind them, resolved to take arms again, in order to protract the war till winter, persuading themselves,
- c that, if they could cut off the few Romans that were come over, or prevent their return, they would thereby deter others from invading Britain for the future. The plot being thus laid, they began to steal out of the camp by degrees, and privately to lift again their disbanded troops. Cæsar knew nothing of their design; but nevertheless, suspecting an alteration from their delay in delivering their hostages after the loss of his shipping, resolved to prepare against all events. Accordingly he caused all the provisions, that could be found in the neighbouring country, to be brought into his camp, and gave orders, that those ships, which had been the least damaged by the storm, should be refitted with the materials of those, that had been shattered to pieces. He sent likewise to Gaul for what things were farther necessary; which
- d were so well applied by the soldiers, who, on this occasion, laboured with uncommon diligence, that only twelve ships being lost, the rest were soon in a condition to put to sea again. In the mean time the seventh legion being sent out to forage, while part of the soldiers, having quitted their arms as under no apprehension of danger, were employed in reaping the corn, and the rest in gathering it, and conveying it to the camp, the Britons, who had lain all night concealed in the neighbouring woods, not questioning but the Romans would come and forage in that place, the harvest being brought in every-where else, fell upon them unexpectedly; and having killed some of them, drove the rest into a small compass, and surrounded them with their horse and chariots in such manner, that not a single man would have escaped, had not the
- e advanced guards, observing a greater dust than usual rising from that quarter, acquainted Cæsar therewith; who, suspecting the Britons had begun hostilities anew, hastened to the assistance of the legion with the two cohorts, that were upon guard, ordering two others to supply their room, and all the rest to repair to their arms, and follow him with all expedition. Upon his arrival, the Britons gave over the attack, and the Romans resumed their courage. However, Cæsar, not thinking it advisable to engage the enemy, stood some time with his troops drawn up in battle-array, and then retreated to his camp. After this, the heavy rains, which continued several days successively, kept the Romans in their camp, and hindered the Britons from attempting any thing against them. The latter however were not idle in the mean
- f time; but having dispatched messengers into all parts of the island, to inform their countrymen how small an army the Romans had, how great a booty they might get, and what a favourable opportunity offered of freeing themselves for ever, by forcing the Roman camp, they drew together a great body of horse and foot, and boldly advanced to the Roman entrenchments. Upon their approach, Cæsar drew up his legions in order of battle before the camp, and gave the Britons so warm a reception, that they immediately turned their backs, and fled. Cæsar pursued them with great slaughter, till his men were out of breath, burnt several towns and villages in the neighbourhood, and then returned to his camp. The Britons, disheartened at the loss they had sustained, sent the same day ambassadors to sue for peace; which
- g Cæsar readily granted, upon their promising to send him over into Gaul double the number number of hostages he had required before. His want of horse, and the fear of a exposing his fleet to another storm, if he staid till the equinox, made him hasten his departure. The same night therefore, the wind proving favourable, he weighed anchor, and arrived safe in Gaul, whence he immediately wrote to the senate, acquainting them with his exploits in Britain; for which a supplication, or general thanksgiving, was decreed for twenty days^e.

expedition into Britain
Christ 55.

THE Britons, it seems, were not much awed by Caesar's arms; for of all the states, into which the island was then divided, two only sent him hostages. Provoked at this neglect or contempt, he resolved to make a new descent the following spring with a far more powerful fleet and army. With this view, before he left Gaul to return to Italy, where he used to pass part of the winter, he ordered his lieutenants to refit the old ships, and build as many new ones as they could. His orders were executed with such diligence, that, upon his return, he found six hundred ships, and twenty-eight galleys, ready to launch in a few days. Having therefore commended the application and diligence of his soldiers, and the supervisors, he commanded them to repair with the fleet to Portus Itius (C), while he marched with four legions, and eight hundred horse, into the country of Treves, to prevent a rebellion there; which he had no sooner done, than he hastened to the above-mentioned port, and leaving Labienus there with three legions, and two thousand horse, to secure it, to provide corn, and to send him intelligence from time to time of what might happen on the continent, he embarked with five legions, and two thousand horse, and weighing anchor about sun-set, arrived with his whole fleet the next day by noon on the British coast, where he landed, without opposition, in the same place, which he had found so convenient the year before. The Britons had assembled in vast multitudes to oppose his landing, as he afterwards understood from the prisoners; but being terrified at the sight of so numerous a fleet, amounting, with the vessels which several persons had provided for their own use, to eight hundred and upwards, they had left the shore, and retired to the hills. Caesar, being informed, after landing his troops, where the Britons were lodged, left ten cohorts, and three hundred horse, to secure the fleet, and with the rest marched in quest of the enemy, whom he found posted on the other side of a river, about twelve miles from the place where he had landed (D). Their design was to oppose his passage; but, notwithstanding the advantage of the ground, they were obliged, by the Roman cavalry, to quit their post, and retire to a wood, whereof all the avenues were blocked up with huge trees cut down for that purpose. Out of this place, which seemed to have been fortified in some former war, they never ventured but in small parties. But, notwithstanding their utmost efforts to prevent the Romans from entering it, the soldiers of the seventh legion, having cast themselves into a testudo, and thrown up a mount against their works, obliged them to abandon their asylum, and save themselves by flight; but the day being far spent, Caesar, who was quite unacquainted with the country, thought it more adviseable to return, and fortify his camp, than to pursue the fugitives^f.

The Romans
sustain a great loss by a storm.

EARLY next morning, Caesar dispatched both his horse and foot, divided into three bodies, in pursuit of the enemy; but when he was already come in sight of their rear, he was acquainted by some horsemen from Q. Atrius, that, by a dreadful storm, which had happened the night before, most of his ships were dashed to pieces, or driven ashore. Upon this intelligence, he hastened back to the sea-side, where he was an eye-witness of the misfortune, which he had heard from the messengers; for forty ships were intirely lost, and the rest so damaged, that they could not be refitted without great trouble and labour. However, having, without loss of time, set all the carpenters in the fleet and army to work, and sent over to Gaul for others,

(C) Cluverius, and Somner in his dissertation de Portu Itio, will have Bologne to be the Portus Itius mentioned by Caesar; others look for the Portus Itius at Calais, or in that neighbourhood. Horsely observes, that Caesar calls the passage from Portus Itius to Britain the shortest and easiest, being about thirty miles. Now, by an accurate survey, the distance at Calais from land to land is twenty-six English miles, or twenty-eight and a half Roman.

(D) This river is supposed to be the Stour, the Thames being too distant; so that the battle was fought on the banks of that river, to the north of the town. Horsely is of opinion, that the strong place, to which the Britons retreated after their defeat, must have been Durovernum, now Canterbury, distant twelve miles from the place where Caesar landed (1).

- a ordering at the same time Labienus to build as many ships as he could with the legions that were there. To prevent the like misfortune for the future, he resolved upon a very difficult undertaking, which was, to draw all his ships ashore, and inclose them within the fortifications of his camp. This stupendous work being completed in ten days, the soldiers labouring the whole time night and day without intermission, and the camp being strongly fortified, Cæsar, leaving the same guard as before to defend it, marched with the rest of his forces to the place, whence he had returned from pursuing the enemy. Upon his arrival, he found their numbers greatly increased, under the conduct of Cassibelan, king of the Trinobantes, whose territories lay about eighty miles from the sea. He had formerly made war on his neighbours; but,
- b upon the arrival of the Romans, they had all unanimously committed the whole management of the war to him, as the most proper person to head them at so important a conjuncture. While the Romans were on their march, they were attacked by the British horse and chariots, whom they repulsed with great slaughter, and drove into the woods; but pursuing them too eagerly, they lost some of their own men. Not long after, the Britons made a sudden sally out of the woods, and fell upon the advanced guard, while the Romans were busied in fortifying their camp. Cæsar immediately detached two cohorts to their assistance; but the enemy, while the Romans stood amazed at their new way of fighting, boldly broke through the two cohorts, and returned again without the loss of a man. Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, was slain in this action; but some fresh cohorts coming to the relief of the
- c Romans, the Britons were, in the end, put to flight. The next day they kept on the hills, at a considerable distance from the Roman camp, till about noon; when three legions being detached by Cæsar, with all the cavalry, under the command of C. Trebonius, to forage, they fell upon the foragers with great fury; but meeting with a vigorous resistance, they betook themselves to flight; and being pursued by the Roman cavalry so close, that they had not time to rally, to make a stand, or to get down from their chariots, according to their custom, great numbers of them were cut in pieces. Upon this overthrow, the auxiliary troops, that had come from all parts, abandoning Cassibelan, returned to their respective countries; nor did the
- d Britons ever after engage Cæsar with their united forces*.

The Britons fall upon three Roman legions, but are defeated.

- AFTER this victory, Cæsar marched towards the Thames, with a design to cross that river, and enter the territories of Cassibelan; but when he came to the only place where the river could, though not without great difficulty, be forded, he saw the enemy's forces drawn up in a considerable body on the opposite bank, which was fortified with sharp stakes. They had likewise driven many stakes of the same kind so deep into the bottom of the river, that their tops were covered with the water. Though Cæsar had intelligence of this from the prisoners and deserters, yet he ordered the cavalry to ride in, and the legions to follow; which they did with such resolution and intrepidity, that, though the foot were up to the chin in water,
- e the enemy, not able to sustain their assault, abandoned the bank, and fled (E). Cassibelan, now despairing of success by a battle, disbanded the greatest part of his forces, retaining only about four thousand chariots, to observe the motions of the Romans. With these he kept at some distance in the woods, or in such places as were scarce accessible to the Romans, carrying off the cattle and corn from those countries through which the Romans were to march. As he was well acquainted with the roads and by-ways, if the Roman cavalry ventured a little too far to lay the country waste, he detached part of his chariots to attack them; which they could not engage without great disadvantage. This prevented the Romans from making excursions, as they would have otherwise done, and obliged Cæsar not to suffer his horse to go farther to
- f burn and plunder the country, than the legions were able to follow them. In the meadow facing them is called Coway. They are even now to be seen at low-water; and one of them was lately pulled out of the Thames, but with great difficulty. They are of oak, and, tho' they have been so long in the water, are as hard as brazil, and as black as jet. At Shepperson, they have several knife-handles made of them (4).

mean time the Trinobantes sent ambassadors to Cæsar, promising to submit to him, ^a and at the same time intreating him to protect Mandubratius against the oppression of Cassibelan, and send him to them for their king and governor. Mandubratius, called by Lutropius and Bede, Androgeus, was the son of Imanuentius, king of the Trinobantes; but, upon the death of his father, who was slain by Cassibelan, to avoid the like fate, he had fled to Cæsar, who had granted him his protection. Cæsar readily complied with the request of the Trinobantes, injoining them to send him forty hostages, and corn for his army; which they did accordingly. The example of the Trinobantes, whose submission secured them from being plundered by the Roman soldiers, was soon followed by other states; viz. the Cenomagni, Segontiaci, Anaclites, Bibroci, and Cossi (F), who, by their ambassadors, submitted to Cæsar. From these he had intelligence, that the town of Cassibelan, supposed to be Verulamium, now St. Albans, well fortified with woods and marshes, whither the country people had retired with their cattle, was but a little way from his camp. Thither therefore he marched with his legions; and though he found the place strongly fortified both by nature and art, he ordered it to be stormed at two different places; which was done with such resolution, that the Britons, not able to sustain the fury of the assault, fled out at one of the avenues of the wood; for this town was only a thick wood, surrounded with a ditch, and fortified with a rampart. Many of the Britons were overtaken as they attempted to make their escape, and cut in pieces. Here Cæsar found great store of cattle ^b.

To repair, in some degree, this loss, and divert Cæsar from pursuing his conquests, ^c Cassibelan, by his messengers, persuaded four petty princes of Kent, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, whom Cæsar styles kings, to raise what forces they could, and attack the camp, where the ships were laid up; but the Romans, having made a sally, repulsed them with great slaughter, took Cingetorix prisoner, and returned, without any loss, to their trenches. Upon the news of this defeat, Cassibelan, considering the many losses he had sustained, how his country was laid waste, and, above all, that several states had already submitted to the conqueror, resolved to follow their example; and accordingly sent ambassadors to treat of a surrender, who were introduced by Comius of Atrebatum or Arras. As the summer was already far spent, Cæsar, who was determined to winter in Gaul, to prevent sudden insurrections there, readily hearkened to their proposals; so that a treaty was soon concluded upon the following conditions; viz. that the Britons should pay an annual tribute to the people of Rome; that Cassibelan should leave Mandubratius in the quiet possession of his dominions, and not molest the Trinobantes; and that he should deliver a certain number of hostages. These Cæsar no sooner received, than he marched back to the sea-side, where he caused his fleet, which he found refitted, to be launched. As he had a great number of captives, and some of his ships had been lost in the storm, he resolved to transport his army at two voyages. But most of those vessels, which were sent back from Gaul after they had landed the soldiers, that were first carried over, and of the sixty, that Labienus had taken care to build, being driven ^e back by contrary winds, Cæsar, after having long expected them in vain, lest the winter should prevent his voyage, the equinox being near at hand, crowded his soldiers closer than he designed, and putting to sea about the second watch of the night, reached the continent with his whole fleet by break of day ⁱ.

(F) Lipsius, instead of Cenomagni, reads Iceni, Cangi (5), the names of two nations mentioned elsewhere by Cæsar. The Iceni inhabited Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire; and the Cangi the country lying on the Irish sea; for when Ostorius led his army against them, he approached the sea, says Tacitus (6), that faces the island of Ireland. Camden agrees with Lipsius in changing the first part of Cenomagni into Iceni; but as for the latter, he reads Regni, who were the inhabitants of Sussex and Surrey, and consequently more likely to follow the example of the Trinobantes, who inhabited Hertfordshire, Essex, and Middlesex, than the Cangi, who lived at a great distance. The Segontiaci are placed by some in Berkshire, by others in Hampshire (7). The city of Seguntium, mentioned by Antoninus, stood on the coast of North Wales, over-against the island of Anglesey, as appears from the itinerary; but we cannot think the inhabitants of that city to be the Seguntiaci mentioned in this place, it being altogether improbable, that they should have submitted by their ambassadors to Cæsar, while he was still at so great a distance from their country. The Anaclites and Bibroci are placed by most of our antiquaries in Berkshire, the former about Henley, and the latter about Bray. The Cossi are supposed to have inhabited some part of Hertfordshire, perhaps the hundred of Cnishow.

a SUCH is the account Cæsar himself gives us of his two famous expeditions into Britain; but other authors have spoken more doubtfully of his victories here. Dion Cassius writes, that the Britons utterly routed the Roman infantry; but were afterwards put in disorder by the cavalry. Horace and Tibullus, in several places of their works, speak of the Britons as a nation not yet conquered*. Tacitus tells us, that Cæsar rather shewed the Romans the way to Britain, than put them in possession of it¹; and Lucan more plainly, that he turned his back to the Britons, and fled. Be that as it will, upon his return to Rome, he offered to Venus, as Pliny tells us, a breast-plate enriched with British pearls, as a trophy of his conquests in this island.

b AFTER the departure of Julius Cæsar, the Romans were diverted, for the space of twenty years, by their domestic broils, and civil wars, from attempting any thing against Britain. During this time, the tribute was not paid, nor perhaps demanded; so that the Britons continued no less free from the Roman yoke, than they had been before the arrival of Cæsar. But Augustus, having at length put an end to the civil wars, and firmly established himself in the possession of the empire, resolved to force the Britons, that is, those who inhabited the most southern part of the island, to perform the agreement they had made with his uncle Julius. With this view he advanced as far as Gaul; but was, by a revolt in Pannonia, diverted from putting his design in execution. About seven years after, he entered Gaul with the same resolution; but the unsettled state of that province made him readily hearken to the proposals of the ambassadors sent by the Britons to sue for peace; which was granted them, no doubt, upon their promising to stand to their agreement with his predecessor Julius. But they neglected, it seems, to perform their promise; for the year ensuing Augustus resumed the resolution of passing over into Britain; but was anew prevented, by the revolt of the Cantabrians in Spain. However, some of the British princes took care to cultivate his friendship with presents; which were laid up in the capitol^m. Cunobeline, who is said to have succeeded Tenutiarius, the successor of Cassibelan, maintained a correspondence with Rome, and even caused coins to be stamped, after the manner of the Romans, some of which are still to be seen, and among the rest one with the word Tasc on the reverse, signifying, according to our antiquaries, tribute; whence they conclude, that this money was designed for the payment of the tribute; for though brass and iron rings of a certain weight served, as Cæsar informs us, for their current coin, yet the Romans exacted the tribute in gold or silver; and of the latter metal is the coin we are here speaking of (G). Thus Britain, by degrees, became well known to the Romans, even in Augustus's time. That prince however, satisfied with the small tribute that was yearly sent him from Britain, forbore any further attempts upon the island, either thinking the friendship or enmity of the Britons of no moment to the Romans, as Strabo insinuatesⁿ, or being, out of a state maxim, resolved to set bounds to the empire, lest it should grow too great and unwieldy^o.

c Tiberius, who succeeded Augustus, being more inclined to contract than enlarge the bounds of the empire, followed the example of Augustus, and never entertained the least thought of conquering Britain; but, satisfied with the respect the British princes shewed him in sending back some of Germanicus's soldiers, who had been shipwrecked on their coast^p, and with their paying the usual customs for such commodities as they brought into Gaul, suffered them to enjoy their liberties, and live according to their own laws. These customs the Roman officers collected in a precarious manner, fearing to provoke the Britons, as Strabo tells us^q. Caligula, the successor of Tiberius, having passed the Alps with a design to plunder Gaul, as he had already done Italy, received there under his protection Admihus, called by our writers Guiderius, the son of Cunobeline, who had been banished by his father. Hereupon he wrote boasting letters to Rome, ordering the messengers to drive their chariots into the forum, and a to the very curia, and strictly injoining them not to deliver their letters but in the temple of Mars, and in a full senate, as if the whole island had submitted to him. Soon after, no doubt at the instigation of Adminius, he marched his forces to the sea-side; but being informed there, that the Britons were ready to receive him, his courage cooled, and, instead of pursuing his design, he ordered his soldiers to fill their helmets and laps with cockle-shells, which he called the spoils of the conquered ocean. Having, by such marks of folly and madness, exposed himself to the derision both of the Gauls and Britons, he wrote to the senate, desiring them to decree him a triumph. But they being averse to comply with his demand, he resolved to cause them all to be murdered; but was murdered himself, before he could put his barbarous design in execution.

Claudius.

What induced him to make war on the Britons.

THE Britons may be said to have continued hitherto free from the Roman yoke; but in the reign of Claudius, the successor of Caligula, great part of the island was brought under subjection to Rome, and the rest by degrees under the succeeding emperors. Dion Cassius gives us a distinct account of the invasion by Claudius, the occasion of which he thus relates: Cunobeline being dead, his two sons, Togodumnus and Caractacus, reigned; but whether jointly or separately, whether with equal or subordinate power, we are no where told. In their reign, one Bericus, (who he was, is not known) being driven out of the island for attempting to raise a sedition, fled, with those of his party, to Claudius; and being highly provoked against his countrymen, persuaded the emperor to invade Britain. On the other hand, the Britons, resenting the emperor's receiving the fugitives, and his refusing to deliver them up when demanded, forbade all commerce with the Romans. A war being therefore resolved on, Claudius ordered Plautius, then prætor in Gaul, to transport those legions he had with him into Britain, and begin the expedition. The soldiers, unwilling to make war, as they said, out of the compass of the world, refused to follow their general, or obey his commands; but being at length brought back to a sense of their duty, in the manner we have related elsewhere, they embarked cheerfully, and put to sea from three ports, in order to land in three different places. They were driven back by contrary winds, which greatly disheartened them; but resuming their courage d upon the appearing of a meteor shooting from the east, and directing, as they imagined, their course, they put to sea again, and landed in Britain without opposition, the inhabitants, who had been informed of the mutiny in the Roman army, and did not expect so sudden an alteration, having delayed to draw together, in order to oppose them. Hearing therefore they were landed, they kept in small bodies behind their marshes, and in their woods, in order to spin out the time till winter; which they imagined Plautius, after the example of Julius Cæsar, would pass in Gaul. But the Roman general, having, with great difficulty, first found out Caractacus, and afterwards Togodumnus, and defeated them both, reduced part of the Dobuni, who were then subject to the Catiuchlani; and leaving a garrison to keep them in awe, he e

He landed without opposition, the inhabitants, who had been informed of the mutiny in the Roman army, and did not expect so sudden an alteration, having delayed to draw together, in order to oppose them. Hearing therefore they were landed, they kept in small bodies behind their marshes, and in their woods, in order to spin out the time till winter; which they imagined Plautius, after the example of Julius Cæsar, would pass in Gaul. But the Roman general, having, with great difficulty, first found out Caractacus, and afterwards Togodumnus, and defeated them both, reduced part of the Dobuni, who were then subject to the Catiuchlani; and leaving a garrison to keep them in awe, he e marched to a river, where the Britons lay carelessly encamped, imagining the Romans could not pass it without a bridge. But the German soldiers, accustomed to swim the strongest currents in their armour, having passed the river, and, pursuant to their orders, fallen only upon the horses that drew the chariots, in which the main strength of the Britons consisted, Vespasian, and his brother Sabinus, sent over with a body of troops to support them, easily put the enemy to flight, their chariots being rendered unserviceable, and cut great numbers of them in pieces. The Britons however, not yet disheartened, engaged the Romans the next day so vigorously, that the victory, for a considerable time, inclined to neither side; but at length the Romans, encouraged by the example of Caius Silius Geta, charged the Britons so briskly, that they f were forced, after a most obstinate resistance, to betake themselves to flight. The conduct of Geta in this action was so remarkable, that triumphal honours were decreed him, though he had never been consul. This battle is supposed to have been fought on the banks of the Severn. From hence the Britons retired to the mouth of the Thames, and, being acquainted with the flats and shallows, drew the Romans, who followed them, into great danger. But the Germans having crossed the river by swimming, and the others on a bridge somewhat higher, the Britons were surrounded on all sides, and great numbers of them put to the sword. Many of the Romans,

- a pursuing the fugitives with too much eagerness, fell into the marshes, and were lost. In one of these battles, Togodumnus was killed, whose death was so far from disheartening the Britons, that they betrayed greater eagerness than ever to oppose the Romans, and revenge it. Hereupon Plautius, not thinking it advisable to penetrate farther into the country, put garrisons into the places he had taken, and wrote to the emperor, who had ordered him to do so, if any thing extraordinary should happen, acquainting him with the progress he had already made, and the dangers he apprehended from a further pursuit of his conquests. Claudius, who aspired at the honour of a triumph, not being satisfied with the triumphal ornaments decreed him by the senate, no sooner received this letter, than he set out from Rome; and embarking at Ostia, sailed to Marseilles, whence he pursued his journey by land to Gessoriacum, now Bologne, where he again embarked, and, landing safe in Britain, joined his lieutenant Plautius, who lay encamped on the banks of the Thames. Upon his arrival, the whole army passed the river, and falling upon the Britons, gave them a total overthrow. After this victory, he advanced to Camalodunum, the royal seat of Cunobeline, which he took, and, without any considerable opposition, reduced some of the neighbouring states. For these exploits, he was several times by his soldiers saluted imperator, contrary to the received custom of the Romans, which allowed no general to assume that title more than once in the same war. Part of Britain being thus subdued, Claudius disarmed the inhabitants, and appointed Plautius to govern them, ordering him at the same time to subdue those, who remained yet unconquered. To such as had submitted, he generously forgave the confiscation of their estates; which obliged them to such a degree, that they erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. The emperor, after having staid in Britain but sixteen days, set out from thence on his return to Rome, having sent thither his two sons-in-law, Pompeius and Silanus, before him with the news of his victories. Upon his arrival in the city, he was honoured with a triumph, and the surname of Britannicus; which was given both to him and his son: the officers, who had attended him in this expedition, were distinguished with triumphal ornaments (H): annual sports were decreed by the senate; and two triumphal arches, one to be erected at Rome, and the other at Gessoriacum, whence he had passed over into Britain. On the top of the imperial palace was fixed a naval crown, implying the conquest of the British ocean. In short, the same honours were decreed to Claudius, who had conquered but a very small part of the island, as had been decreed to other conquerors, after they had reduced whole kingdoms * (I).

He defeats the Britons, and takes Camalodunum.

He returns to Rome, where he is honoured with a triumph, and the surname of Britannicus.

- Plautius*, appointed by Claudius governor of Britain, pursued his conquests, after the emperor's departure, with such success, that, upon his return to Rome, he was honoured with an ovation, and met, without the gates, by the emperor himself, who, at his solemn entry, gave him the right-hand. In this war, Vespasian likewise, afterwards emperor, and his son Titus, distinguished themselves in a very eminent manner. The former fought thirty battles with the Britons, subdued two powerful nations, and reduced above twenty towns, with the isle of Wight; for which exploits he received the triumphal ornaments, two sacerdotal dignities, and the consulship. As for Titus, he no less signalized his piety, than his courage and valour; for seeing his father in a battle surrounded on all sides, and in imminent danger of his life, he broke a through the enemy's ranks, and having rescued him, put the Britons to flight, and pursued them with great slaughter^a. Some years after, that is, in the ninth year of Claudius's reign, as we gather from Tacitus^a, P. Ostorius Scapula, being sent into Britain, fell unexpectedly upon the Britons, who had broken into the Roman conquests; and having put great numbers of them to the sword, and dispersed the rest, to restrain them from making inroads for the future into the territories of the Romans, or their allies, he built several forts on the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, reduced that part of the island, which lies south of these rivers, to a Roman province, and, for a further security, made Camalodunum a military colony. This the Iceni could not brook, and therefore, being joined by the neighbouring nations, they raised a considerable army, and encamped in an advantageous post, in order to prevent the Romans from penetrating farther into the island. However, Ostorius, advancing against them, after a most obstinate conflict, put them to flight, and pursued them with great slaughter. After this victory, he led his army into the country of the Cangi, probably the present counties of Shropshire and Cheshire; but being informed, as he approached the Irish sea, that the Brigantes were in arms, he marched with all speed against them; and having caused the chief authors of the disturbance to be put to death, and pardoned the rest, he soon restored that country to its former tranquillity. After this, Ostorius made war upon the Silures, the inhabitants of South Wales, headed by Caradacus, a commander of great renown, whom nevertheless he defeated in a pitched battle, the particulars whereof we have related at length in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader^b. Caradacus, upon his defeat, fled for protection to Cratismandua, queen of the Brigantes, who, dreading the Roman arms, delivered him in bonds to the conqueror, by whom he was sent to Rome, with his wife, daughter, and brothers, and received there by the emperor in a kind of triumph. Claudius, moved with the speech which the captive prince made when brought before his tribunal, and admiring the constancy with which he bore his misfortunes, granted to him, to his wife, to his daughter, and brothers, both their lives and liberty. The Silures, notwithstanding the loss of their general, pursued the war with great vigour, and gained very considerable advantages over the Romans, related by us elsewhere^c; which so affected Ostorius, that he died with grief. He was succeeded by A. Didius, who restrained the Silures making frequent and wide incursions into the Roman territories within more narrow bounds; but was not able to restore Cratismandua, queen of the Brigantes, and an ally of Rome, to her kingdom^d. He defeated the Brigantes in a pitched battle; but afterwards, as he was stricken in years, he contented himself with acting only defensively, and restraining the enemy by his lieutenants. Veranius, who succeeded him in the reign of Nero, died in less than a year after his arrival in Britain, without performing any thing worthy of notice. After him, Suetonius Paulinus governed Britain, who reduced the island of Anglesey, and defeated with great slaughter the Britons, who, under the conduct of queen Boudicea, had taken arms, and put incredible numbers of the Romans, and their allies, to the sword, as we have related at length in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader^e. Suetonius Paulinus was succeeded in the government of Britain by Petronius Turpilianus, and he by Treballius Maximus. During their government, nothing remarkable happened; for, as they were both men of an indolent temper, and no ambition, they took care not to provoke the Britons by any acts of hostility, giving to this cowardly inaction the specious name of peace. In the mean time Nero dying, the Roman army in Britain was commanded, during the short reigns of Galba and Otho, only by tribunes, among whom Calpurnius bore the chief sway, who, by carefully avoiding to give the Britons any just cause of complaint, kept all things quiet in the island. Vitellius, upon his accession to the empire, appointed Vestius Bolanus governor of Britain, who ruled with great gentleness, without either provoking the Britons, or being by them provoked. In the reign of Vespasian, who succeeded Vitellius, Petilius Cerealis was sent into Britain, to take upon him the command of the army there. Petilius, upon his arrival, attacked the Brigantes, the most numerous and powerful of all the British nations; and having defeated them in several encounters, some of which proved very bloody, he reduced

- a great part of their country, and continued to ravage the rest^f. He was succeeded by Julius Frontinus, who not only maintained the conquests made by his predecessor, but fought himself with great success against the warlike nation of the Silures, whom he intirely reduced. Julius Frontinus being recalled, the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola was sent to command in his room. But of the exploits of that renowned commander, we have spoken at length in our Roman history^g; and therefore, to avoid tedious repetitions, shall only add here, that having, in seven campaigns, reduced the whole island, he abandoned the more northern parts, and by raising forts, and planting garrisons, on the isthmus between the friths of Glota and Bodotria, now of Dunbriton and Edinburgh, he removed the Caledonians, as it were, into a separate island. Thus Agricola gave the finishing blow to the liberty of Britain, and reduced that part of the island, which lies south of the friths of Glota and Bodotria, to a Roman province. The loss of their liberty was, in some measure, counterbalanced by the politeness, that was introduced among them by the conquerors; for, by degrees, they assumed the customs and manners of the Romans, and, forgetting their savage ways, applied themselves to the study of the liberal arts and sciences, which were no less esteemed and cultivated in Britain, than in any other province of the empire. But to return to Agricola: Domitian, who had succeeded his brother Titus in the empire, envying his general the great reputation he had gained by his conquests, recalled him, on pretence of preferring him to the government of Syria.
- c After his departure, we have but short and broken accounts of what passed in this island, till the reign of the emperor Adrian. We do not even know who was Agricola's successor in the government of Britain. We only read in Suetonius^h, that Salustius Lucullus was legate of Britain in the reign of Domitian; and that he was put to death by that prince, for suffering his name to be given to a sort of spears, which he had invented. In the reigns of the emperors Nerva, who succeeded Domitian, and Trajan, who succeed Nerva, some commotions happened in the island; but all we know of them is, that they were soon appeased, and the country restored to its former tranquillity, by the Roman troops quartered there; which, according to Josephus, amounted to four legionsⁱ. In the reign of Adrian, the successor of Trajan,
- d the Caledonians, having demolished some of the forts built by Agricola between the above-mentioned friths, made an irruption into the Roman province. Against them was dispatched by Adrian, in the first year of his reign, Julius Severus, a commander of great renown; but he being suddenly recalled, and employed against the Jews, then in rebellion, Priscus Licinius was sent over in his room (K), and followed soon after by the emperor in person; whose arrival struck the Caledonians with such terror, that, abandoning the countries they had seized, they retired to the more northern parts of the island. Adrian, not thinking it worth his while to make war upon them, in order to keep them quiet, relinquished to them all the country between the Tine and the two friths; but at the same time, to restrain them from making incursions
- e into the Roman province, he caused a wall to be built, extending from the Eden in Cumberland to the Tine in Northumberland, eighty miles in length^k. Having thus settled affairs in Britain, and reformed many abuses there, he returned to Rome, where he was honoured with the title of Restorer of Britain; which was stamped on his coins (L).

Under them is this inscription, Extr. Britannica. Other coins of the same prince bear this inscription, Restitutor Britanniae.

The army in Britain mutinies on account of Perennis, who is delivered up to them.

A new mutiny in the army quelled by Pertinax.

To Adrian succeeded Antoninus Pius, in whose reign the Brigantes revolted; and the Caledonians, having, in several places, broken down Adrian's rampart, began anew to ravage the Roman territories. Against them was sent Lollius Urbicus, Licinius Priscus, whom Adrian had appointed governor of Britain, being, in all likelihood, dead; for Antoninus, as Julius Capitolinus informs us¹, removed none of the governors whom Adrian had preferred. Lollius obliged the Brigantes to submit anew to the Roman yoke; and having driven back the northern barbarians, he confined them within narrower bounds than before, by a new wall, extending, as Camden and Brietius conjecture, from Bremenium, now Brampton in Cumberland, to the river Esk. For these achievements, Antoninus received the surname of Britannicus, though he had never seen Britain himself^m (M). In the reign of Marcus Aurelius, the successor^b of Antoninus Pius, new commotions were raised in Britain; which obliged the emperor to send thither Calpurnius Agricola, who, it seems, appeased them; for Fronto, the famous orator, as quoted by Eumenius, in a panegyric on the emperor Marcus Aurelius, says, among other things, that though, sitting in his palace at Rome, he had committed the management of the war to one of his generals, yet, like a pilot sitting at the stern, and guiding the helm, he deserved the honour of the whole expeditionⁿ. To Marcus Aurelius succeeded Commodus, in whose reign the Caledonians, having passed the wall, which parted them from the Romans, and cut in pieces the Roman general, and most of his army, committed every-where dreadful devastations without restraint, till Ulpus Marcellus was sent against them, who, as he was a commander of great experience, and a strict observer of the military discipline, drove back the Caledonians with great slaughter, and restored the island to its former tranquillity. The reputation he gained in this expedition was so great, that the emperor, thinking his own glory eclipsed by that of his general, resolved to put him to death; but, in the end, only removed him from his government. For the great advantages gained by Ulpus in Britain, Commodus assumed the title of imperator the sixth time^c. That brave commander had no sooner left Britain, than the army there began to mutiny, complaining chiefly of Perennis, the emperor's favourite, who, governing with an absolute sway, sent only persons of the equestrian order to command the British army, whom the soldiers therefore refused to obey. The mutiny was carried so^d far, that the army sent deputies to Rome, fifteen hundred, says Dion Cassius, of their own body, to complain of Perennis. These the emperor met without the city; and being by them informed, that Perennis aspired at the empire, and had, with that view, cashiered the bravest officers, and put his own creatures in their room, he delivered the traitor to the fury of the prætorian bands, which he then commanded, and must have no less disobliterated than he had done the British army; for he was by them, after a thousand outrages, torn in pieces, with his wife, his sister, and his two sons^e. The downfall and death of this favourite are related by Herodian in a quite different manner, as we have observed in our Roman history^f. In the mean time Helvius Pertinax, afterwards emperor, was sent into Britain, to bring back the mutinous army there to a sense of their duty. Upon his arrival, the soldiery, not able to brook the tyrannical government of Commodus, offered him the sovereignty; but he, by rejecting their offer with indignation, and proceeding with too much severity against the mutineers, provoked them to such a degree, that one of the legions openly revolting, much blood was shed, and Pertinax himself left for dead among the slain. However, in spite of all obstacles, he brought the army at last to submit, and restored tranquillity to the province; but, as his severity had drawn upon him the ill-will

(M) Lollius Urbicus was sent into Britain, according to Alford, in the third year of Antoninus's reign, of the christian æra 142. and the same year he reduced the rebellious Brigantes, and built the wall, which we have mentioned in the text. This Alford proves from two of Antoninus's medals, coined, by a decree of the senate, in that prince's third consulship, that is, as Alford shews, in the third year of his reign. On these medals he is styled Pater pa-

trie; and on the reverse is represented Britain, on one sitting on a globe, and on the other holding a spear, and resting on a shield. As Antoninus is not, on either of these medals, styled Britannicus, but on such only as were coined five years after, Alford conjectures from thence, that some signal victory was gained, about that time, over the revolted Brigons or Caledonians, which procured him the title of Britannicus (9).

- a and hatred of the soldiery, he was, some time after, recalled at his own request, Clodius Albinus being appointed governor of Britain in his room^c. Albinus, having, in a speech to the soldiery, upon a false report of the emperor's death, declared for the power of the senate against that of the emperor, was commanded by Commodus to resign the government of Britain to Junius Severus. But Commodus being soon after murdered, Pertinax, his successor, sent Albinus again into Britain, where he continued during the short reigns of Pertinax and Didius Julianus. As he had, by his generosity and largesses, gained the affections of the British army, he was, upon the death of Julianus, by them proclaimed emperor. To maintain his title against Severus, who had received the same honour from the army in Pannonia,
- b he passed over into Gaul with his British troops; but being met by his rival in the neighbourhood of Lyons, his army was defeated, and he himself slain, as we have related at length in our Roman history^d. Severus, now master of the whole Roman empire, divided Britain into two governments, not thinking it perhaps advisable to trust one man with so great a command. The hither, or southern part of the island was given to Heracitus, and the northern to Virius Lupus (N), who was so harassed by the continual inroads of the Caledonians, that he was in the end obliged to purchase a peace with money; which they maintained till the fifteenth year of Severus's reign, when breaking anew into the Roman province, they committed everywhere dreadful devastations. Virius Lupus, not thinking himself in a condition to withstand them, retired as they advanced, and in the mean time acquainted the emperor with the state of affairs, and the dangers that threatened the province, unless powerful and timely supplies were sent to make head against the barbarians. Hereupon Severus, resolved to put an end to the daily incursions of the enemy, by the intire conquest of the north, set out for Britain, at the head of a numerous army, accompanied by his two sons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians no sooner heard of his arrival, than they sent ambassadors to him, offering to conclude a peace upon honourable terms. These the emperor detained, till he was ready to take the field, and then dismissed them, without granting them their request. As soon as the season was fit for action, he marched into their country, and putting all to fire
- d and sword, advanced to the most distant and northern coasts of the island. Though no battle was fought in this expedition, yet what by the enemy's continual ambuscades, what by the hardships and toils the soldiers underwent in cutting down woods, building bridges, draining marshes, &c. fifty thousand of them are said to have perished. The Caledonians however were, in the end, obliged to purchase a peace, by yielding to the Romans part of their country, and delivering up their arms. Having thus concluded a peace with the Caledonians, he returned to York, leaving to his son Caracalla the command of the army, and the finishing of the wall, which he had begun, according to the opinion, which to us seems most probable, on the isthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde. Of this wall we have spoken above, and more
- e at length in our Roman history^e. For this expedition, Severus was honoured by the senate with the title of Britannicus Maximus, and his two sons with that of Britannicus^f. The emperor being taken ill at York, the Caledonians were no sooner informed of his indisposition, than they took up arms with one accord; which provoked Severus to such a degree, that he ordered his son Caracalla to enter their country anew with the whole army, and put all he met to the sword, without distinction of sex or age. But the emperor dying before his orders could be put in execution, his two sons, having concluded a shameful peace with the Caledonians, returned to Rome^g.

From an antient inscription found at Ilkly in Yorkshire, by Ptolemy called Olinaca, it appears, that Virius Lupus restored that place. The inscription is as follows:

all we know of them, while these princes ruled, is, that Britain still continued to be a Roman province; that, in the reign of Gordian III. it was governed by Nonnius Pbeippus (O); that, under Valerian and Gallienus, the Roman troops quartered in the north, to restrain the Caledonians, were commanded by one Desidienus Ælianus (P); that Britain, revolting from Gallienus, declared for Posthumus, who had usurped the sovereignty in Gaul; that of the thirty usurpers, or, as they are styled, tyrants, besides Posthumus, the following were acknowledged in Britain, viz. Lollianus, Victorinus, and Tetricus, of whom the last being overcome by the emperor Aurelian, Britain submitted to the conqueror, who sent hither Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, to establish his authority in the island ⁷. Aurelian was succeeded by Tacitus, and he, after a short reign of about six months, by Probus, in whose time Bonobus, descended of a Spanish family, but born in Britain, usurped the sovereignty, and was acknowledged here, as well as in Gaul and Spain; but being, after several battles, reduced by Probus to great straits, he chose rather to strangle himself, than fall into the hands of the conqueror, as we have related at length elsewhere ⁸. Zosimus ⁹ and Zonaras ¹⁰ tell us, that a governor, sent hither by Probus, assumed the imperial purple; but was soon after killed by Victorinus, upon whose recommendation he had been preferred to the government of this island ¹¹. Probus was, according to Vopiscus ¹², the first that allowed the Britons, Spaniards, and Gauls, to plant vines. The same emperor having, in an engagement on the banks of the Rhine with the Burgundians and Vandals, taken their king Igilus prisoner, with many others of these two nations, he transplanted them into Britain ¹³. In the beginning of Dioclesian's reign, Carausius, a native of Gaul, passing over into Britain, took upon him the title of emperor, and was acknowledged by all the troops quartered here; nay, by a treaty concluded between him and Maximian, whom Dioclesian had taken for his partner in the empire, Britain was given up to Carausius, who governed it with the title of emperor for the space of six or seven years; but was in the end killed by Allectus, as was Allectus, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in Britain, in a pitched battle with Asclepiodotus, one of Constantius's officers. Upon his death, Britain was re-united to the empire, after it had been held about seven years by Carausius, and three by Allectus. Of these transactions the reader will find a particular and distinct account in our Roman history ¹⁴. The two emperors Dioclesian and Maximian having resigned the empire to Galerius and Constantius, the latter, to whose share fell the western provinces, soon after his accession to the empire, passed over into Britain, to make war, says Eumenius ¹⁵, on the Caledonians and Picts, whom he overcame; but, not long after, died at York ¹⁶, where he had the satisfaction to see his son Constantine before he expired, and to appoint him his successor; so that Constantine began his reign in Britain, and, some time after, returned to this island, as we read in Eusebius ¹⁷, probably to put a stop to the daily incursions of the Caledonians. Of the new form of government, both civil and military, which he introduced here, we have

(O) This we learn, notwithstanding the silence of the Roman historians, from an ancient inscription found at a place, by the Romans called Castra Exploratorum, and by us Old Carlisle. It is a votive inscription for the health of the emperor, of his wife, and the whole imperial family, set up by the Roman horse quartered in Britain, under the command of Æmilius Crispinus, a native of Tuidrum in Africa. The words of the inscription are as follows:

In two other inscriptions found at Lanchester in the county of Durham, mention is made of Macilius Fuscus, and Cneius Lucilianus, both proprietors of Britain in the reign of the same emperor Gordian III.

- a spoken above. He likewise altered the division of Britain, which, by Severus, had been divided into two provinces only; but was by him divided into three, viz. Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Maxima Cæsariensis, which last was afterwards subdivided into two parts, viz. Maxima Cæsariensis, and Flavia Cæsariensis. The removal of the imperial seat from Rome to Constantinople, which happened in the reign of Constantine, gave the northern nations an opportunity of making frequent irruptions into the Roman province, the emperor having carried with him, first into Gaul, and afterwards into the east, not only most of the Roman troops quartered in Britain, but likewise the flower of the British youth; whence he is censured by Zosimus, for neglecting the boundary of the empire on this side*. Constantine divided
- b the empire among his three sons, Constantine, Constans, and Constantius, of whom the latter, being in a short time possessed of the whole, sent into Britain the famous notary The famous in- former Paulus, surnamed Ca- tana, in Bri- tain. and informer Paulus, surnamed Catana, to bring from thence the tribunes, and other officers, who had sided with Magnentius. But of the enormous oppressions, extor- tions, and cruelties, practised on this occasion by that merciless man, we have spoken at length elsewhere¹. Constantius, about the latter end of his reign, committed the government of the western provinces to Julian, afterwards called the Apostate, who, being informed, while he was in his winter-quarters at Paris, that the Picts and Scots, about this time first distinguished in history by that name (Q), had broken into the Roman province, and committed every-where dreadful ravages, dispatched his lieu- tenant Lupicinus, with some troops, against them. Lupicinus, embarking at Bologne
- c in the depth of winter, reached London in a few days; but he had scarce landed his troops, when he was recalled^m, the northern nations having perhaps appeased Julian by their submission. During the short reigns of Julian and Jovian, we find nothing in history concerning the affairs of Britain. But, under Valentinian I. the Picts, Scots, Attacots, Saxons, and other northern nations, invaded the Roman province at one and the same time; and having killed Nectaridus, count of the maritime tract, and Fullofaxdes, who is distinguished with the title of dux or duke, and probably commanded the land-forces, ravaged the country far and wide, and reduced the inhabitants to a most deplorable condition. News of this invasion being brought to Valentinian,
- d while he was on his journey from Amiens to Treves, he immediately dispatched into Britain Severus, his comes domesticorum; but soon after recalled him, and sent Jovinus in his room; who having acquainted the emperor with the miserable condition to which the island was reduced, and the still greater evils with which it was threatened, Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name, was thereupon chosen for this pro- vince, and trusted with the whole management of so troublesome a war. Theodosius, upon his arrival in Britain, divided his forces into several parties; which, advancing against the enemy, who were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, recovered the booty and prisoners they had taken, and obliged them to abandon the province. The barbarians being thus repulsed, Theodosius entered
- e Londonium, or London, in a kind of triumph, and restored that, as well as several other cities, which had suffered greatly by the late invasions, to their former splendor. As the barbarians had retired beyond the friths of Glota and Bodotria, he built several castles on the isthmus between the two seas, in order to restrain them from break- ing anew into the province. By this means, all the country between Adrian's wall and the two friths, which had been, for some time, held by the Picts, was reco- vered. Of this tract Theodosius made a fifth province, to which the emperor gave The Roman province ra- vaged by the Scots and Picts. the name of Valentia, perhaps from his brother Valens. Theodosius, before he left the

(Q) Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote towards the latter end of the fourth century, is the first historian that mentions the Scots. But St. Jerom, in his epistle against Cresciphon the Pelagian, has given us a much more antient passage, which he translated out of Porphyry the Greek philosopher, who wrote an age before Ammianus. The passage is as follows: Neither Britain, a province fertile in tyrants, nor the Scottish nations, nor the barbarous nations round about to the very ocean, did ever acknowledge Moses and the prophets. Scaliger, in his notes upon Propertius, and his animadversions on Ensebius, corrects the com- mon editions of Seneca's satire upon Claudius, by reading, instead of the words Scota Brigantes, Scoto Brigantes; but that correction is not countenanced by any manuscript copies; and besides, it is certain, that Claudius never made war upon the Scots, but kept in the southern parts of Britain. As for Dempster's reading Scoticas primas, instead of Scythicas, in the verses of the poet Florus to the emperor Adrian, that correction is generally looked upon as altoge- ther groundless (10).

island, crushed, in its very beginning, the revolt of one Valentine, or Valentinian,^a who, being banished into Britain, had prevailed upon some of the inhabitants to proclaim him emperor; but Theodosius, having got the usurper into his power, delivered him up to the civil magistratesⁿ. And now Britain being restored to its former tranquillity, Theodosius returned to the emperor, by whom he was received with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem. In the joint reign of the succeeding princes Valentinian II. and Gratian, Maximus, who commanded in Britain, hearing, that Gratian had taken Theodosius the younger for his colleague in the empire, and highly affronted at the preference given to a person, in his opinion, so much beneath him in merit, resolved to assume the imperial purple, and put himself upon an equality with his rival. Accordingly, having gained over to his party the Roman legions quartered in Britain, he carried them, with the flower of the British youth, into Gaul. As these never returned to their native country, being either cut off with their leader, or settling elsewhere, the nation, thus bereft of its strength, became afterwards an easy prey to the Picts and Scots. Over these two nations Maximus is said to have gained great advantages before his usurpation, nay, and to have driven the latter quite out of the island; but this is not agreeable to what we read in the more antient writers, as we have observed elsewhere^c. In the reign of Theodosius, the Scots and Picts were, it seems, kept in awe by Chrysantius, the son of Marcian, bishop of Constantinople, who, being appointed governor of Britain, acquitted himself in that office with great reputation^p. Theodosius was succeeded by his two sons Arcadius and Honorius, the former ruling in the east, and the latter in the west. As Honorius was very young, the famous Stilicho, who had been appointed by Theodosius regent of the western empire during the minority of his son, is supposed to have sent over a legion into Britain, to defend it against the Scots, the Picts, and the Saxons^q. Be that as it will, it is certain, that he secured Britain against the incursions of its antient enemies; for Claudian, in enumerating the great things performed by Stilicho before his first consulship, tells us, that he succoured Britain attacked by the neighbouring nations, namely by the Scots; that he put it in a condition not to fear their arrows, nor the efforts of the Picts; and that he secured the British coasts against the descents of the Saxons^r. He adds elsewhere, that the Saxons being overcome, the sea was quiet; that the Picts having lost their strength, Britain was delivered from her fears^s. About this time a proper officer was appointed to guard the coast against the attempts of the Saxons, with the title of comes limitis Saxonici (R). But, not long after, the empire being over-run by the Alans, the Vandals, and the Suevians, most of the Roman troops quartered in Britain were recalled, and the island left almost quite open to the attacks of the Scots and Picts. Hereupon the natives, expecting no assistance from Honorius, resolved to set up an emperor of their own; and accordingly invested with that dignity one Mark, whom, though an officer of great credit among them, after a few days, they murdered, and placed Gratian, a native of Britain, in his room^t. Gratian, after a short reign of four months, underwent the same fate, and was succeeded by Constantine, a common soldier, who was^u chosen merely for the sake of his name, common to him with Constantine the Great. The new prince obliged the Scots and Picts to quit the Roman province, and retire beyond the two friths; which success inspiring him with a mighty opinion of his own merit and fortune, he formed a design of making himself master of the whole empire. With this view he passed over into Gaul, taking with him the few Roman forces that

(R) The learned Usher ascribes to Stilicho the establishing of a legion in Britain, to defend it against the Picts, the Scots, and the Saxons (11). This Claudian seems to insinuate, where he introduces Britain thus speaking in praise of that great general and minister:

Me quoque vicinis parentem gentibus, inquit,
Munivit Stilicho, totam cum Scotus Iernem
Movit, & infesto spumantis remige Tethys.

As Stilicho is supposed to have appointed troops to guard the coasts of Britain, and prevent the Saxons from making descents, so he may be likewise said to have appointed a proper officer to command them, with the title of the comes of the Saxon shore.

- a had been left here, and such of the Britons as were able to bear arms. Of the success that attended him at first in Gaul and Spain, and of his unhappy end, we have spoken at length in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader ^a. The unhappy Britons, thus left to themselves after the departure of the Romans, and the flower of their youth, were more harassed than ever by the Scots, the Picts, and other northern nations, who, meeting with little or no opposition, broke into their country, and putting all to fire and sword, soon reduced them to a most miserable condition. In this state they continued from the year 407. when the usurper Constantine passed over into Gaul, to 410. when, after having often implored in vain the emperor's assistance, they withdrew their obedience to Rome, says Zosimus ^x, and, being resolved to
- b defend themselves with their own strength, would no longer obey the laws of the empire. The emperor Honorius seemed to approve their conduct; for, by his letters, he permitted, and even advised, them to provide for their own safety ^y; which was an implicit resigning the sovereignty of the island, and releasing the inhabitants from their allegiance to the empire. This renunciation was made, according to Bede, a little after the taking of Rome by Alaric, in the year of the city 1164 ^z. or rather 1163. for it is certain, that Rome was taken in 410. The Britons, now again a free people, seem to have at first fought with success against their antient and irreconcilable enemies the Scots and the Picts; for Zosimus writes, that they delivered their cities from the insults of a haughty enemy ¹. But being in the end overpowered,
- c they had recourse to the emperor, imploring his protection, and promising an intire and perpetual obedience to Rome, provided they were delivered from the tyranny and oppression of their merciless enemies. Honorius, touched with compassion, sent a legion to their relief; which, landing unexpectedly in Britain, cut in pieces great numbers of the Scots and Picts; and having obliged them to retire beyond the friths of Edinburgh and Dunbriton, they advised the natives to build a wall on the isthmus from sea to sea, and then returned to the continent, where their assistance was wanted to repulse the barbarians, breaking from all quarters into the empire. The Britons, without loss of time, applied themselves to the building of the wall; but as it was done only with turf, the barbarians broke it down in several places, and pouring in
- d upon the territories of the Britons like a torrent, committed more dreadful ravages than ever, destroying every thing with fire and sword ^b. This happened, according to the learned Usher ^c, in 422. but, according to Alford ^d, in 421 (S). The unhappy Britons, after many miseries and calamities, sent deputies anew to the emperor; who, appearing before him with their garments rent, and dust on their heads, prevailed upon him to send new forces to their relief. These, hastening into Britain, fell upon the barbarians, not in the least apprised of their arrival, and made a dreadful havock of them, while they were roving up and down the island in quest of booty ^e. This slaughter of the northern nations is placed by Usher in 426 ^f, wherein he disagrees with Bede, who supposes it to have happened before the year 423. in which Honorius
- e died ^g. The Scots and Picts being thus driven beyond the above-mentioned friths, the Romans, who had no ambitious view in assisting the distressed Britons, but were come over merely out of compassion and good nature, told them plainly, that they were to expect no further assistance from the emperor; that the troops he had now sent were ordered back to the continent, to make head against the barbarians, who extended their ravages to all parts of the empire; and that they were therefore obliged to take their last farewell of Britain, and intirely abandon the island. After this declaration, Gallio of Ravenna, commander of the Roman troops, exhorted the Britons to defend themselves for the future, by fighting manfully for their country, their wives, their children, and, what ought to be dearer than life itself, their liberty, denotes, as he rightly observes, three emperors reigning at the same time. These were Honorius, Theodosius, and Constantius. Now, as Constantius was made emperor and died in the same year 421. the victory ascribed to the three emperors must necessarily have been gained in that year (12).

against an enemy no stronger than themselves, provided they would but lay aside their fears, and exert their antient courage and resolution. Not satisfied with encouraging them, that they might be the better able to withstand the attacks of the enemy, he advised them to build a wall, not of turf, but of stone, offering them the assistance of his soldiers, and his own direction in the work. Hereupon the Britons, jointly with the Romans, fell to work, and carried on their new wall with such diligence, that, tho' eight foot in breadth, and twelve in height, it was soon finished. This wall stood, says Bede^b, in the same place where Severus had built his, that is, according to the most probable opinion, as we have observed above, on the isthmus between the two friths of Glota and Bodotria. They likewise built towers at convenient distances on the east coast against the Saxons, and other barbarians, who, coming from Germany, made frequent descents on that side. The Roman commander, having thus secured the nation, employed the rest of the time he continued in the island, in instructing the natives in the art of war; which when he had done, leaving among them patterns of the weapons he had taught them to make, after many encouraging exhortations, he, with his Romans, took his last farewell of Britain, and telling the Britons, that they must expect their return no more, he crossed over to the continentⁱ. From this last departure of the Romans we may date the total desertion of Britain by them, and the final period of the Roman empire in this island. As to the year, in which Britain was thus finally abandoned, there is a great disagreement among chronologers, some placing the retreat of the Romans in 426. some in 435. or 437. According to Alford, Gallio returned to Gaul in 422. the twenty-eighth of Honorius's reign^k. Bede, in his history, speaks of the departure of the Romans as happening in 431^l. but, in his chronicle, he seems to suppose it to have happened even before the year 423. and hence Alford places it in 422. The Britons fought, as we have seen, for many years against the Romans, in defence of their liberty; and it was not without a great deal of bloodshed that they submitted to the yoke. But being in the end pleased with their servitude, and become, as it were, one nation with their conquerors, who had continued among them for the space of four hundred years and upwards, they were no less unwilling to part with them, than they had been at first to receive them. This appears from the last message they sent to Aetius; but since it happened after the Romans had intirely abandoned the island, we shall refer the further relation of it to the following section.

SECT. III.

The Scots and Picts break into the British territories.

THE Romans having abandoned Britain, with an intention to return no more, as we have related in the foregoing section, the Scots and Picts no sooner heard of their departure, than landing in swarms from their leather vessels on the lands of the Britons, they committed greater ravages than ever, destroying all with fire and sword. These two nations, differing somewhat in manners, but equally greedy of spoil and booty, seeing the cowardly Britons fly like sheep before them, resolved to attack the wall, which had been lately repaired, not doubting but they should become masters of it without great loss, since it was defended by such a faint-hearted enemy. At their approach, the Britons, instead of preparing for a vigorous defence, stood trembling on the battlements, till the enemy, more bold and active, pulling some of them down with long iron hooks, and driving the rest, with showers of darts and arrows, from their stations, made themselves masters of the wall. The Britons betook themselves to flight, which however could not save them; for the Scots and Picts, pursuing them close, made a dreadful havock of the fugitives, and took possession of the frontier towns, which they found deserted by the inhabitants. As the enemy met with no opposition, they over-ran the whole country, putting all to fire and sword without controul. This general havock and devastation bred a dreadful famine,

- a famine, which occasioned new mischiefs, and a kind of civil war, among the Britons themselves, obliged, for their support, to plunder each other, and take from their friends the little the common enemy had left them. The whole country being thus ruined, the famine became general, and raged to such a degree, that the Britons, who remained, were obliged to betake themselves to the woods, and there live upon what they could get by hunting^a. In this deplorable condition they continued some years. The Britons had already kings of their own; for Gildas, in his usual melancholy strain, finds fault with his countrymen for raising to the throne such only as were remarkable for their cruelty^b. Perhaps they judged them best qualified to redress the disorders, and put a stop to the robberies, that prevailed all over the island.
- b The same author adds, that those, who had raised them to the throne, caused them soon after to be murdered, not because they had found them guilty of any crime, but that they might chuse worse men in their room. If any of their princes proved more mild and humane than the rest, he was abhorred by all as a coward, and persecuted as a public enemy^c. The unhappy Britons, thus at variance among themselves, and at the same time pressed with famine, and pursued by a merciless enemy, had recourse once more to the Romans for assistance, writing to Actius, who was then consul the third time, and governed the western empire almost with an absolute sway. To move him to compassion, they directed the letter thus: The groans of the Britons to the consul Actius. And in the letter; The barbarians, said they, drive us to the sea, and the sea forces us back to the barbarians, between which we have only the choice of two deaths, either to be swallowed up by the waves, or to be cruelly massacred by the enemy. What answer they received, is uncertain; all we know is, that they could not prevail upon Actius, who was then in Gaul, to lend them the least assistance, the emperor Valentinian III. being then, as Usher thinks, under apprehension of a war with Attila^d, who had not yet broken into the western empire. The Britons, now despairing of any relief from the Romans, and, on the other hand, reduced to the utmost extremity by the famine, which increased daily, knew not what measures to take to free themselves from their unfortunate circumstances. Great numbers of them fled over to Armorica, where those Britons, who attended Maximus into Gaul, are supposed to have settled^e; others submitted to the Scots and Picts, purchasing a miserable sustenance with everlasting slavery. Some however, more resolute, placing their confidence in God, says Gildas, since they found themselves abandoned by men, betook themselves to their arms; and sallying out in parties from their woods and caves, fell upon the enemy, while they were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to retire. The Picts withdrew, in all likelihood, to the country about the wall, either abandoned by the Britons, or inhabited by such of them as had submitted to their new masters. The Scots, as Usher conjectures^f, returned to Ireland, whence they originally came; but Gildas and Bede only tell us, that they returned home^g. And now the Britons, having some respite, began anew to cultivate their lands; which, after having for some time lain fallow, produced all sorts of provisions in such plenty, as in no age had been remembered. This plenty was attended with luxury, wantonness, and all manner of vices incident to human nature; but what above all contributed to the immorality and irreligion, that prevailed all over the land, was, according to Gildas, the hatred of truth, and love of lyes, evil being miscalled good, and good evil, and every thing transacted directly contrary to the common welfare, and public safety. The clergy, who should have reclaimed the laity with their example, proved the ring-leaders to every vice, being, for the most part, addicted to drunkenness, envy, contention, &c. and incapable of discerning between good and evil^h. In the mean time the Britons were alarmed anew with a report, that the Scots and Picts were returning with a greater force than ever, being determined utterly to extirpate the natives, and plant themselves in their room from one end of the island to the other. This report occasioned a general consternation, which however was not sufficient to reclaim them from their wicked ways, says Gildas; and therefore they were visited with a dreadful plague, which raging with uncommon fury, swept away most of those, whom the sword and famine had spared; insomuch that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead. But this calamity likewise proving ineffectual, the contagion no sooner ceased, than the enemy, returning with incredible fury, and putting all to a fire and sword, soon reduced the unhappy Britons to the utmost extremity. Vortigern was then the chief, if not the only king of Britain, a proud, covetous, and debauched tyrant, quite regardless of the public welfare, and no less incapable of promoting it in the field, than in the cabinet. However, being awaked by the clamours of the people, and finding it was absolutely necessary for his own preservation to repulse the enemy, he summoned a council, to deliberate with the chief men of the nation about the proper means to deliver the country from the calamities it then groaned under, and prevent the like misfortunes for the future. In this council, they all agreed, being, in a manner, infatuated, on the most pernicious expedient, that could be imagined, and what, in the end, proved the utter destruction of the nation, which was, to invite the Saxons into the island, a people at that time famous for their piracies and cruelty, and dreaded, even by the Britons, as death itself (T). The expedient being approved of, ambassadors were dispatched in all haste into Germany, to represent to the Saxons the request of the Britons, and offer them advantageous terms, provided they would come over to their assistance (U). The Saxons were highly pleased with the proposal, the more as they were foretold by their soothsayers, that they should plunder the country, to which they were called, for the space of an hundred and fifty years, and quietly possess it twice that time^b. Having therefore fitted out three long ships, called in their language chiules, they put to sea, under the conduct of Hengist and Horfa, the sons of Witigisil, great-grandson to the celebrated Woden, from whom all the royal families of the Saxons pretended to derive their pedigree^c. These, arriving at Ebbsfleet in the isle of Thanet, were received there both by the prince and people with the greatest demonstrations of joy. The isle itself was allotted them for their habitation, and a league was immediately concluded with them, in virtue of which the Saxons were to defend the Britons against all foreign enemies; and the Britons, on the other hand, to allow the Saxons, besides their place of abode, pay and maintenance. Historians have not told us, what the number was of these Saxon auxiliaries; but they could not be above fifteen hundred, since they all came over in three ships; and we cannot well suppose any of those ships to have carried above five hundred men. But, before we proceed farther in this history, it will be necessary to give some account of the origin, manners, government, and religion of the people, who, being called in by the Britons to their assistance, made themselves masters of the island, and hold it to this day. The Saxons were, according to the most probable opinion, a colony of the Cimbrians, that is, of the inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, now Jutland; who, finding their country overstocked with people, sent out, much about the same time, three numerous bands

(T) The first Saxon troops are said, by most historians, to have landed in the year 449. though, by some, this event is placed a few years sooner; by others, a few years later. Tyro Propper supposes the Saxons to have been masters of the island in 444. and consequently to have landed many years before. But that writer was therein grossly mistaken, as is manifest from Gildas, Bede, and all the historians, who speak of this event. Bede places the arrival of the Saxons and Angles in the reign of Marcian, before the death of Valentinian III. that is, between the year 450. and 455. and seems to suppose the resolution of the Britons to call them in to have been taken before the reign of Marcian; so that, according to Bede, their arrival may be well placed in 450. and in that year it is accordingly, by the learned Usher, supposed to have happened (13).

(U) Witichind, a Saxon historian, who lived in the ninth century, in his history de gestis Saxonum, introduces the British ambassadors making the following speech before an assembly of the Saxons: "Illustrious Saxons, the fame of your victories having reached our ears, the distressed Britons, harassed by the continual inroads of a neighbouring enemy, send us to implore your assistance. We have a "fertile and spacious country, which we are commanded to submit to you. We have hitherto lived under the protection of the Roman empire; but our ancient masters having abandoned us, we know no nation more powerful than you, and better able to protect us. We therefore recur to your valour. Forsake us not in our distress, and we shall readily submit to what terms you yourselves shall think fit to prescribe to us." It the Britons made such a frank surrender, and promised such an absolute subjection, as is intimated in this speech, it is strange, that neither Bede nor Ethelwerd, both Saxons, should take any notice of it; nay, the latter writer tells us, that the Britons promised to live in perpetual friendship and amity with the Saxons; and friendship and amity are inconsistent with absolute subjection. Besides, when the Saxons, designing to make themselves masters of the island, wanted a pretence to quarrel with the natives, they did not urge the promise of the British ambassadors, which they would certainly have done, had any such promise been made, but alleged, for a pretence, their short diet, and bad pay, as Gildas tells us in express terms; which plainly shews, that they came over only as mercenary soldiers.

a to seek for new settlements. To one of these bands was afterwards given the name of Suevians, to another that of Franks, and to the third the name of Saxons. The Suevians took their rout towards Italy, the Franks advanced to Belgic Gaul, and the Saxons possessed themselves of the whole country between the Rhine and the Elb; nay, by degrees extending their conquests along the coast of the German ocean, when the Britons sent to implore their assistance, they were masters not only of the present Westphalia, Saxony, East and West Friseland, but likewise of Holland and Zealand. The first place they settled in, upon their leaving the Chersonesus, was the present duchy of Holstein; which is thence called the antient seat of the Saxons. Between this country and the Chersonesus, or Jutland, dwelt a people, known, even in Tacitus's time, by the name of *Angles*¹. According to this account, which we have copied from Bede^m, the Angles inhabited that small province in the kingdom of Denmark, and duchy of Sleswick, which is called at this day Angel, and of which the city of Flensburg is the metropolis. Lindebergius, in his epistles, styles this country Little-England; and Ethelwerd, who wrote about the year 950. speaking of the antient habitation of the Angles; Old Anglia, says he, lies between the Saxons and Gots. The metropolis of this country is by the Saxons called Sleswick; but by the Danes, Haithby. Britain took the name of those, by whom it was conquered, and is therefore now called Anglia. The same writer adds, that Hengist and Horfa came from the country of the Angles into Britainⁿ. When the Saxons came first out of the Chersonesus, going in quest of new settlements, the Angles joined them, and, in process of time, became one nation with them. Hence they are, by most authors, comprised under the general name of Saxons, tho' some distinguish them by the compound name of Anglo-Saxons^o. Some time after the Saxons, Franks and Suevians had left the Chersonesus, the Goths, having driven out the Cimbrians that were remaining, made themselves masters of that peninsula, which was thenceforth called Gotbland or Jutland, from its new inhabitants the Goths or Jutes. These, in the old printed copies of Bede, are styled Vita; but the learned Usher assures us, that all the manuscript copies of that author, which he consulted, read Juta, and not Vita p. Fabius Ethelwerd, whom we have mentioned above, a writer of the Saxon blood royal, and the fourth in descent from king Adolph or Ethelwolf, calls the country Giota, and the people Giota. Great numbers of these Giota or Juta, mixing with the Saxons and Angles, came over with them into Britain, to share in their conquests. This is the most probable account of these people, after their settling in Jutland and Germany, that we have been able to gather from the several authors, who have studied this subject. Of their origin, which Cluverius and Verfegan derive from the Germans, but Grotius and Sherringham, with more probability, from the antient Getæ or Goths; of their various migrations before they settled in the Cimbrian Chersonesus, and their conquests under their several kings, especially under the celebrated Woden, we shall speak at length in the histories of Sweden and Denmark. As the Saxons were, by their piracies c on the coasts of Gaul and Britain, better known at the time of their settling in this island, the conquest of Britain is, by the antient writers, ascribed to them, and not to the Angles or Jutes; nay, Britain was, for some time, from them called Saxony; but, in the end, the name of Anglia, from the Angles, prevailed. The Jutes were less known, at least under that name, than the other two nations or tribes. Bede however tells us, that the province of Kent, the isle of Wight, and the country lying over-against it, now Hampshire, were peopled by the Jutes. As to the name of Saxons, it has occasioned a great disagreement among authors. Becanus and Camden Etymology of the name Saxons. suppose them to have been first called Sacasons, that is, the sons or descendants of the Saca, to whom, according to these writers, they owed their origin. But they are f by no antient writer styled Sacasons, as Sherringham well observes, but Sacen or Saxons. Besides none of the antients speak of colonies sent by the Saca out of Asia, where they dwelt, in the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea; but Strabo, on the contrary, tells us, that the whole nation of the Saca were to a man destroyed by the Persians q. Isidore derives their name from the Latin word saxum, a stone, because they were a strong and hardy nation. But they were so called many ages before the Romans had any knowledge of them, or they of the Romans. The opinion of Lipsius, which Verfegan has followed, seems to us the most probable, viz. that the name of Saxons was given them by their neighbours, from their wearing a short sword, called in their tongue saex; and hence the arms of Saxony, as Pontanus observes¹, are to this day two daggers placed across. As to the name of Angles, Saxo Grammaticus derives it from Angulus, son to Humbilus king of the Danes. But how the Angles came to borrow their name from a son of the king of Denmark, he has not thought fit to acquaint us. Widskind, a Saxon writer, will have the Angles to be so called from a certain island in the corner or angle of the sea, which they subdued. But this, as well as all other etymologies deriving their name from the Latin tongue, seems to us altogether improbable, and foreign to the purpose, when we consider, that the names of other German nations are not Latin, but German, or Gothic. Goropius therefore derives the name of Angles from the Saxon word angel or engel, signifying a fishing-book, the Angles, who lived on the sea-coast, being, like the other Saxons, greatly addicted to piracy, and, on that account, styled Angles by the neighbouring nations, as if, like hooks, they caught all that was in the sea. Other derivations are brought by Aventinus, and other etymologists. But as we have perhaps already dwelt too long upon conjectures, we shall now give a succinct account of the manners, government, and religion of the antient Saxons, our forefathers. The Saxons were, as is agreed on all hands, and appears from their conquests, one of the most warlike nations inhabiting Germany. They were not known to the Romans, by the name of Saxons, till the fourth century, Ammianus Marcellinus, and the poet Claudian, being the first Roman writers, who make mention of them. The former, speaking of them, says, c they were formidable above all other enemies. And Zosimus, The Saxons are inured to the toils of war, and, for their courage and strength, reckoned the most warlike of all the German nations². As they were a barbarous and uncivilized people, they treated their enemies with great cruelty, especially the prisoners they took in war, sacrificing them to their gods. As to their government, the countries subject to them were, according to Verslegan, divided into twelve provinces, each of which was governed by a chief or head, accountable to the general assembly of the nation: By this assembly a general was chosen in time of war, who commanded with almost a sovereign power; but his authority ceased, as soon as the war was ended. Their religion was the same with that of the other northern nations. Their chief gods, the Sun, the Moon, the celebrated Woden, his son Thor, his wife Frigga or Fraa, Tuisto, Theutates, Hejus, Tharamis, &c. The three last are mentioned by Lucan (W), as is Tuisto by *Tacitus*³. Woden was the god of war; Thor presided over the air, and was thought to have storms, winds, showers, and fair weather, at his disposal; Frigga was the goddess of pleasure. The two first days of the week were consecrated to the Sun and Moon; the third, according to some, to Tuisto or Tuisco, according to others, to Thyja or Dysa, the goddess of justice, and wife to *Thor*⁴; the fourth to Woden; the fifth to Thor; the sixth to Fregga or Fraa; and the seventh, as Verslegan supposes, to Crodo, named also Sacter; but the latter name, as Sheringham observes, is to be found in no writer before *Verslegan*⁵. The Saxons had, besides these, several other deities, to whom they paid great veneration, namely, the goddess Eostre, to whom they sacrificed in the month of April, which was thence by them styled Eostur monath, or the month of Eostre; and thence the word Easter, which the Saxons retained even after their conversion to the christian religion, giving it to the solemn festival, which we celebrate in commemoration of our Saviour's resurrection⁶. Nocra was the same among the Saxons, as Neptune among the Romans. Mara was a frightful spectre, that terrified and oppressed people in their sleep; whence the word *nightmare*⁷. Tansana, mentioned by *Tacitus*⁸, was worshipped by the Saxons as the god of lots⁹. The Elvæ or Elfs, named also Fairies, were honoured by them with a kind of sacrifice called *Alf-blót*¹⁰. The Dysæ were inferior goddesses, the messengers of the great Woden, whose province it was to convey the souls of such as died in battle to his abode, called Valball, that is, the ball of slaughter, where they were to drink a with him, and their other gods, cerevisia, a kind of malt liquor, in the skulls of their slaughtered enemies (X). On the contrary, those who died a natural death, were, by the same Dyæ, conveyed to Hela, the goddess of hell, where they were tormented with hunger, thirst, and all kinds of evils. The Angles worshipped, as we read in Tacitus, the goddess Hertbus, that is, the earth, as the mother of all things^d. As to the worship the Saxons paid to their gods, and the sacrifices they offered to them, we refer our readers to Wormius, Verstegan, Isaacius Pontanus, and other German and Danish writers, it being now time to resume the thread of our history.

THE Saxons being arrived in Britain, under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa, as we have related above, and put in possession of the isle of Thanet, king Vortigern did not suffer them to continue long there without employment, but led them, soon after their arrival, against the Scots and Picts, who had made an irruption, and were advanced as far as Stanford in the province now called Lincolnshire. There a battle was fought, in which the Scots and Picts were utterly routed, and forced to save themselves by a precipitous flight, leaving the Saxons in possession of the spoil and booty they had taken^e. Vortigern, highly pleased with the conduct of the two Saxon brothers, rewarded them with ample possessions in Lincolnshire^f. We are told, that Hengist desired here only as much land as an ox-hide could encompass, and that, upon Vortigern's granting him it, he cut the hide into small thongs, and inclosed with them a space large enough to hold a castle, which to this day is from thence called Tbong-caster, that is, the castle of tbongs^g. Be that as it will, Hengist, taken with the fruitfulness and wealth of the island, and at the same time observing the inhabitants to be enervated with luxury, and addicted to ease and idleness, began to entertain hopes of procuring a settlement in Britain. Having therefore first obtained Vortigern's consent, he sent home to acquaint his countrymen with the fruitfulness of the country, and the effeminacy of the inhabitants, inviting them to share with him in his good success, of which he had not the least occasion to doubt. The Saxons, glad of the opportunity, readily complied with the invitation; and arriving in seventeen large ships, made up, with those they found in the island, a considerable army. With this supply came over, if Nennius is to be credited, Rowena, the daughter of Hengist, with whose charms the king was so taken, that, divorcing his lawful wife, he married her, after having obtained the consent of her father, who pretended to be averse to the match, by investing him with the sovereignty of Kent^h. Thus Nennius, and those who have copied from him. But no mention is made of Rowena in the Saxon annals, which rather seem to insinuate, that the Saxons made themselves masters of Kent by force of arms; for we are told there, that Hengist defeated the Britons in two pitched battles, and obliged them to abandon Kent, and retire to London. But this did not happen till the arrival of the third body of Saxon troops; for Hengist, by laying before the king, and exaggerating the dangers that threatened him, not only from the Scots and Picts, but from his discontented subjects, obtained leave to send for a new reinforcement of Saxons, who, coming over in forty ships, under the conduct of Otha and Ebusa, the son and nephew, or, as others will have it, the brother and nephew of Hengist, arrived at the Orcades; and having ravaged there, and all along the northern coast, the countries of the Scots and Picts, they made themselves

Cicero writes, that the Cimbrians envied those who fell in battle; but pitied the condition of such as died a natural death (16). Hence they went joyful to battle; but bemoaned their misfortune, when seized with any distemper, looking upon that kind of death as mean and inglorious (17). Lucan takes notice of this, as he styles it, philosophy of the northern nations, and calls it a happy error:

masters of several places beyond the firths, and, in the end, obtained leave of the king to settle in Northumberland, under the specious pretence of securing the northern parts, as Hengist did the southern. Hengist, encroaching still on the king's favour, sent by degrees for more men and ships, till the countries from whence they came were almost left without inhabitants. And now their numbers being greatly increased, they began to quarrel with the natives, demanding larger allowances of corn and other provisions, and threatening, if their demands were not complied with, to break the league, and lay waste the whole country. The Britons, refusing them what they demanded, desired them to return home, since their numbers exceeded what they were able to maintain. This answer, however just and reasonable, provoked the Saxons to such a degree, that, having secretly concluded a peace with the Scots and Picts, they turned their arms against those whom they were come to defend, and over-running, without opposition, the whole island, destroyed all with fire and sword from the eastern to the western sea. The public, as well as the private buildings, were laid level with the ground; the cities pillaged and burnt; the priests slain at the altars; the bishops cruelly massacred, without the least respect to their dignity; and the people, without distinction of sex, age or condition, butchered in such multitudes, that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead. Some of the unhappy Britons, who escaped the general slaughter, took refuge among the inaccessible rocks and mountains; but great numbers of them either perished with hunger, or were forced, by the extremity of famine, to abandon their asylum, and, delivering themselves up to their merciless enemies, preserve their lives at the expence of their liberty. Some, crossing the sea, took shelter among foreign nations, settling either in Holland, where the ruins of Brittenburgh, an old castle, built, as is supposed, by them on this occasion, are still to be seen, or among their countrymen in Armorica (Y). But those who remained at home, suffered inexpressible calamities, living among the woods, rocks and mountains in perpetual apprehensions, and want of necessaries¹. Nennius tells us, that Vortigern was so far from being reclaimed by these calamities, that, on the contrary, adding to his other crimes that of incest, he married his own daughter, and had by her a son named Faustus, who led a solitary and religious life near the river Reenus in Glamorganshire. The same writer adds, and after him Matthew of Westminster, that the Britons, highly provoked at the king's wickedness, and the partiality he shewed to the Saxons, deposed him, and raised to the throne his son Vortimer, who, as he was a brave and valiant youth, undertook the defence of his distressed country; and falling upon the Saxons with what troops he could assemble, drove them into the isle of Tbawet, and there kept them closely besieged, till being reinforced with fresh supplies from Saxony, they opened themselves a way through the British forces. But Vortimer, not yet disheartened, fought with them four battles: the first on the banks of the Derwent in Kent, where he obtained a signal victory, and cut in pieces great numbers of the enemy; the second at a place called in the Saxon tongue Episford, and in the British, Sasbengabail, now Aylesford in Kent. In this battle fell Horsa, and likewise Catigern, the brother of Vortigern. Some writers will have the Britons to have won the day², and others the *Saxons*³; nay, Eusebius seems to ascribe to this victory the founding of the kingdom of *Kent*⁴. Horsa is supposed to have been buried at a place, called from him to this day Horsted; and Catigern near Aylesford, where a monument is to be seen somewhat like Stonehenge, called by the country people Kith's Coty-house, that is, *Catigern's house*⁵. The place where the third battle was fought is not mentioned; but we are told, that Vortimer engaged the Saxons the fourth time at a place called Lapistituli, which Camden and Usher take to be Stonar in the isle of Tbawet; but *Sommer*⁶ and *Stillingfleet*⁷, instead of Lapis tituli, read Lapis populi, that is, Folkstone, where, according to them, the battle was fought. In this battle the Saxons were routed with great slaughter, and forced back to their ships, on which they embarked, being no longer able to withstand the valour of Vortimer, and, abandoning the island, returned home, where they continued till the death of Vortimer, that is, for the space of five years, without

(Y) Most of our historians suppose the Britons to have been settled in Armorica long before the arrival of the Saxons; but this supposition, as we shall

- a making any attempt upon Britain. Thus Nennius, and the historians who have copied from him. But of these battles no mention is made either by Gildas or Bede. The former writer only tells us, that the Saxons retired, which most of our historians understand of their returning home, though Gildas perhaps meant no more, than that, after having laid waste the island, they withdrew to the territories, that had been granted them by Vortigern, that is, to Kent and Northumberland: and truly it seems to us altogether incredible, that, had the Britons gained so many signal victories, Gildas would have passed them all over in silence. Our historians tell us, that Vortimer died about this time, after a short reign of six years; and add, that, upon his death-bed, he desired his servants to bury him near the place where the Saxons used to land, being persuaded, that the secret virtue of his bones would deter them from making any attempts there for the future; but they, neglecting his commands, buried him at Lincoln^a, or, as others will have it^c, at London. Some will have him to have been poisoned by his mother-in-law Rowena^b; others write, that he died a natural death^c. Be that as it will, Hengist was no sooner informed of his death, than he returned with a numerous body of Saxons to Britain; and, landing in spite of all opposition, fought several battles with the Britons, under the conduct of Vortigern, who, upon the death of his son Vortimer, was restored to the throne. In one of these battles, fought at a place called Crecanford, the Britons were overthrown, with the loss of four thousand men; which obliged them to abandon Kent, and retire to London^d. From this victory, most authors date the beginning of the kingdom of Kent under Hengist, who took his son Esk for his colleague. But Vortigern still maintaining the war against the Saxons, Hengist had recourse to treachery; and pretending a great desire to conclude a peace, and renew the former amity between him and the British king, sent ambassadors to require an interview with him. To this proposal Vortigern, after advising with his nobles, readily consented, and it was agreed, that they should meet at an entertainment without arms. But the treacherous Saxon having secretly ordered those who attended him to take their daggers, and keep them in readiness concealed under their garments, when they met, pursuant to the agreement, and the Britons, suspecting no treachery, began to be heated with wine, the Saxons, starting up at a signal given, and drawing their daggers, dispatched each of them his next man, to the number of three hundred, the flower of the nobility. Vortigern alone was spared; but being taken prisoner, and put in fetters, he was forced, for his ransom, to surrender to the Saxons those provinces, that were afterwards called Essex, Suffex, and Middlesex. By this means the Saxons got such footing in the island, that they could never afterwards be driven out. Thus Nennius^e and William of Malmesbury^f. But of these transactions no mention is made either by Gildas or Bede. Vortigern, being set at liberty, retired, as we are told, to a vast wilderness near the fall of the Wye in Radnorshire, where he was, some time after, consumed by lightning, with the city Kaer Vortigern, which he had built there for his refuge^g. Upon the retreat of Vortigern, Aurelius Ambrosius, or, as Gildas calls him, Ambrosius Aurelianus, took upon him the command of the British forces. He was a wise and modest man, says Gildas, and perhaps the only Roman that remained in the island, having, in the calamitous times of Britain, lost his parents, who had worn the purple. Thus Gildas^h, without explaining himself farther. He adds, that the offspring of Aurelius continued still in the island in his time; but had greatly degenerated from the good qualities of their ancestorsⁱ. Bede writes, that his parents had borne the royal name and ensigns; but had been slain^b. Neither Gildas nor Bede name his parents; which has given room to many conjectures, some maintaining him to have been the son of Constantine, who was chosen emperor by the Romans in Britain about the year 407^c. Of him, and his son Constans, who was declared Cæsar in 408. we have spoken at length in our Roman history^d. Others think he was descended from some of the British kings, who reigned in the island after the departure of the Romans; for it is manifest from Gildas, that the Britons had several kings at the same time. Matthew of Westminster tells us, that Ambrosius had fled, with his brother Uterpendragus, whom others call Uther, into Armorica, to avoid falling into the hands of Vortigern, who, it seems, had usurped his right^e; nay, some writers tell us, that the fear of Ambrosius induced Vortigern to call in the Saxons. a Matthew of Westminster adds, that the Britons, no longer able to bear Vortigern, sent for Ambrosius and his brother; who, complying with their invitation, landed with a considerable body of men in the island; upon which Vortigern retired to the mountains of that part of Britain, which is now called Wales; and Ambrosius was declared king. But the great disagreement we find among the writers after Gildas and Bede, convinces us, that we cannot depend upon any thing they have related. All we can gather from the best authors is, that the Britons, under the conduct of Ambrosius, took courage, and falling upon the Saxons when most of their forces were returned home, routed them with great slaughter ^f. It was perhaps in this battle that Horfa was slain; for of the other battles mentioned above, no notice is taken either by b Gildas or Bede. From this time, the war was carried on, says Bede ^e, sometimes favourable to the Britons, and sometimes to the Saxons, till the latter made themselves masters of the whole island. Those who have written several ages after Bede, give us a more particular account of the transactions of those dark times; but we will not take upon us to vouch the truth of what they relate. According to them, Ambrosius, after the above-mentioned victory, assembled the nobility at York; and having ordered the churches to be rebuilt or repaired throughout the kingdom, which had been destroyed by the Saxons, he marched from York to London, from London to Winchester, and from thence to Salisbury (Z), endeavouring every-where to restore the declining state of the church and kingdom ^a. In the mean time Pascentius, Vortigern's c third son, aspiring to the crown, raised a rebellion in the north; but was overcome and put to flight by Ambrosius, who nevertheless bestowed upon him Bualth in Brecknockshire, and Kaer-Guortigern in Radnorshire. After this, the Britons enjoyed some respite; but were, in the eighth year of Ambrosius's reign ⁱ, worsted in a pitched battle by Hengist and his son Esk, who took a great booty ^k. No mention is made of any other battle fought, till four years after, when other Saxons coming over, under the conduct of Ella and his three sons, Cymen, Wlencing, and Cissa, the Britons fell upon them as they were landing at a place called Cymenshore, that is, Cymen's shore. The Saxons, says Huntington, who were tall, strong and vigorous, gave the Britons a warm reception; and having put them to flight as they advanced in strag- d gling parties, they pursued them to the forest of Andredesleige, supposed to be the weald of Kent, and the woody parts of Sussex ^l. After this victory, the Saxons possessed themselves of all the sea-coast of Sussex, and continued to extend their dominions more and more till the ninth year after the arrival of Ella, when all the kings and princes of Britain, says Huntington, having united their forces, engaged Ella and his sons at a place called Mercedesburne. The victory, according to Henry of Hunting- ton, remained doubtful, and both armies retired with great loss ^m; but others will have the Saxons to have won the day. Ella, being greatly weakened by the loss he had sustained, sent for fresh supplies, says the above-mentioned writer, out of his own country. In the mean time Hengist, having raised and garrisoned several forts in Kent, marched with great expedition into the north, and, having joined there the Scots and Picts, took and fortified several towns. But Ambrosius, drawing together his forces, marched in quest of the enemy, and, coming up with them, gave them a total overthrow ⁿ. The following year 488. died Hengist king of Kent, and was succeeded by his son Esk, called also Oisc and Ofric, who reigned twenty-four years, without attempting to enlarge his dominions ^o. Some writers tell us, that Hengist was taken prisoner in the above-mentioned battle by Eldol duke of Claudiocestria, and beheaded by him, pursuant to the sentence which had been pronounced against him in a great council, at the instigation of Eldadus, brother to Eldol, and bishop of Claudiocestria, who declared, that, if the rest spared him, he would, with his own f

(7.) Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us, that, on this occasion, Ambrosius erected the famous monument known by the name of Stonehenge, in honour of the British nobles treacherously slain there, as he supposes, by Hengist. It is surprising, that any of our historians should have followed him, and yet Matthew of Westminster copies the main of his account; and Walter of Coventry sets it down as a thing not to be questioned, adding two circumstances to render it the more probable, viz. that Ambrosius was crowned, and, not long after, buried there. Polydore Virgil supposes it to be the monument of Ambrosius; and John of Tinnmouth calls it Mons Ambrosii.

a hands, cut him in pieces^p. But this account is generally looked upon as an arrant fable (A).

In the mean time Ella, having received fresh supplies from Germany, laid siege to Andred-chester, supposed by Camden to be Newenden in Kent; by Somner to be Pemsey under the conduct of Ella, besiege Andred-cchester; or Hastings. On the other hand, the Britons, having raised a great army, advanced to the relief of the place, and, with frequent attacks, harassed the Saxons to such a degree, that they were obliged to abandon the siege. Hereupon the Britons withdrew to the woods, not caring to venture a battle; but the Saxons were no sooner returned to the siege, than the Britons, sallying out upon them anew, forced them to quit it. Thus the Saxons lost great numbers of their men, and made but a small progress in the siege. But Ella having at last divided his army into two bodies, one of which pursued without intermission the siege, while the other observed the enemy's motions, the citizens, quite spent with hunger and fatigue, could no longer withstand the efforts of the aggressors. The town was therefore taken, and by the merciless conquerors levelled with the ground, after they had put to the sword all the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age. Such is the account Henry of Huntington gives us of this siege^q. Thus in the year 491. three years after the death of Hengist, and thirty-four after the beginning of the kingdom of Kent, began the second kingdom in the island, called the kingdom of the South Saxons, which comprised at first only Suffex, but was extended by Ella before his death, for he reigned twenty-four years, to all the provinces lying south of the Humber^r. News being carried into Germany of the good success that attended the Saxons in Britain, new adventurers flocked over daily to share with them their good fortune. Among the rest came Cerdick, the tenth in descent from Woden, with his son Cenrick, and as many men as he could transport in five ships. These landing at a place, which, from their leader, was called Cerdick's-shore, now, according to Brompton, Yarmouth in Norfolk, were vigorously attacked by the Britons, whom, after a short engagement, they put to flight. Several other battles were fought; but fortune proving ever favourable to the Saxons, the natives were forced to retire, and leave them in possession of the sea-coasts. About six years after, Porta, another Saxon, with his two sons Bleda and Magla, arrived at Portsmouth, so called, as some imagine, from him; and having defeated with great slaughter the Britons, who attempted to oppose his landing, and killed a young British prince, who commanded them, he possessed himself of the neighbouring country. But the progress made by Cerdick most of all alarmed the Britons, and therefore, seven years after the arrival of Port, and sixty after the first coming of the Saxons, Nazaleod, whom Henry of Huntington styles the greatest of the British kings, assembled the whole strength of Britain to put a stop to his conquests. On the other hand, Cerdick, aware of the danger that threatened him, had recourse to Esik king of Kent, to Ella king of the South Saxons, and to Porta and his sons, who all sent him powerful supplies. With these he advanced against the Britons, leading the right wing himself, and his son Cenrick the left. As the two armies drew near each other, Nazaleod, perceiving the enemy's right wing to be by far the stronger of the two, charged it with the flower of his army, and obliged Cerdick, after an obstinate resistance, to save himself by flight; but, as he was pursuing the fugitives with more heat than caution, Cenrick, falling upon his rear, renewed the battle with such vigour, that the British army was utterly defeated, and Nazaleod himself slain, with five thousand of his men^s. Who this Nazaleod was, is much controverted: some think it may be the British name of Ambrosius, who, as Gildas, informs us, fought, about this time, several battles with the Saxons; others will have it to be the name of his brother Uther Pendragon. But the story of Uther Pendragon is now deemed a fable by all the British antiquaries. Matthew of Westminster speaks of Nazaleod, whom he calls Nathanlioth, not as a king, but only the general of Uther Pendragon, by whom he was sent against the Saxons, who slew him, and fifteen upon what grounds we know not, that Hengist retired to Holland, and there built, on the banks of the Rhine, the city of Leyden (18).

thousand of his men. But the Saxon annals, Esbeberd; Florence of Worcester, and Henry of Huntington, agree in distinguishing him with the title of king; nay, the latter writer styles him the greatest of the British kings. Usher conjectures Uiber and Nazaleod to be one and the same person, the surname of Uiber, signifying in the British tongue terrible, having been given him on account of the great things achieved by him *. But as this is the darkest period of the whole British history, our best antiquaries can allege nothing but mere conjectures to clear it. It is even uncertain who succeeded Nazaleod. The Welsh annals leave an inter-regnum of about six years, and place the beginning of Arthur's reign in 514. or 515. The learned Usher conjectures him to have been the son of Nazaleod, called also Uiber. Some have doubted whether there ever was such a person (B); but the generality of our historians

(B) The history of king Arthur has been so figured, and interwoven with so many absurd, ridiculous and romantic stories, that some have doubted, whether there ever was such a person as Arthur in the world. Among these, Milton alleges the following objections against Arthur: 1. That he is not so much as mentioned by Gildas, or any antient British historian, except Nennius, who lived three hundred years after him, and is allowed by all to have been a very credulous and trifling writer, and to have vented a great many fables. 2. Though William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntington have both related his exploits, and his many victories over the Saxons, yet the latter took all he wrote concerning him from Nennius; and the former either from the same fabulous author, or from some monkish legends in the abbey of Glassebury; for both these writers flourished several centuries after Arthur, and consequently knew no more of him, than we do at this day. 3. In the pretended history of Geoffrey of Monmouth, such contradictions occur concerning this prince's victories, not only in Britain, but in France, Scotland, Ireland, Norway, Italy, and other countries, as are sufficient to make us look upon him as a hero altogether fabulous and romantic. But these objections, however plausible in appearance, are not of weight enough to convince us, that whatever has been written of king Arthur is quite fabulous; for, in the first place, his not being mentioned by Gildas does not at all seem strange to us, since that author's design was not to write an exact history of his country, but only to give us a short account of the causes of its ruin by the Scots, Picts, and Saxons, of which the chief was, according to him, the great wickedness of the Britons, and the general corruption of manners, that prevailed among them. On this he chiefly dwells, and from this subject no exploits of the princes, who then reigned, were capable of diverting him. Besides, he only mentions those princes, whose notorious wickedness seemed to draw down upon the unhappy Britons divine vengeance, expatiating upon the vices to which they were addicted, without taking the least notice of their good qualities, or of the exploits, that were performed by them, or by others, tho' it is evident even from him, that the Saxons met with a vigorous opposition, and were often defeated by the British kings or commanders. As for Nennius, who lived about three hundred years after Arthur's time, allowing what is objected against him to be true, yet we cannot persuade ourselves, that the whole story of Arthur, and the battles he fought, were a mere invention of his. We are rather inclined to believe, that he copied, at least part of what he wrote, from other more antient authors, or perhaps from the general tradition of his countrymen at that time. It is true, the Saxon annals make no mention of this king, perhaps because they could not do it, without transmitting to posterity

the many overthrows he gave the Saxon nation. But Rudolphus de Diceto, one of our best and most antient English historians, speaking of king Cerdick, mentions his fighting several battles with king Arthur. As for William of Malmesbury, and Henry of Huntington, though neither of them perhaps knew any thing of Arthur, but what they learnt from Nennius, or the antient registers of Glassebury, yet, in our opinion, they deserve some credit, since we cannot persuade ourselves, that those registers consisted merely of fables. William of Malmesbury himself owns, that the Britons had vented a great many fables concerning this prince; but adds, that he was a hero more worthy to be celebrated in true history, than in romance. The many stories, feigned and related of his exploits by the Britons or Welsh, encouraged Geoffrey of Monmouth to write many incredible fables of his conquests; but it does not thence follow, that whatever has been related of him must be fabulous, for a genuine history may be corrupted, and yet the substance of it remain true. If we therefore distinguish truth from falsehood, and reject what favours too much of romance, we shall meet with nothing in the life of this hero unbecoming the character of a great prince. He was buried at Glassebury in Somersetshire, and his coffin was dug up in the reign of Henry II. with this inscription on it in Gothic characters, Hic jacet sepulchrum inclitum rex Arturians in insula Avalonia. We are told, that the following account of this discovery was hung up in the monastery of Glassebury, and was to be seen there till the dissolution of the said monastery: *On this island, which is called the island of Avalonia, near in this burying-place of saints at Glassebury, rest the renowned king Arthur, the flower of the British kings, and Guenhumara his queen, who, departing this life, were honourably interred near the old church, between two stone pyramids, where they lay many years, till the time of Henry de Soili, who was abbot of the place after the burning of the said church. This abbot, being importuned by many persons, ordered some to dig between the pyramids for the bodies of the above-mentioned king and queen. Having dug very deep, they at length discovered a great wooden coffin close shut, which they opened, and found in it the king's body, with a leaden cross, on which was the following inscription, Here lies buried the renowned king Arthur in the island Avalonia. Then they opened the queen's grave, and found her lying with her hair dishevelled, as if she had been but just buried; which however fell to ashes as soon as touched. The abbot and convent, with great joy, took thence their remains, and placed them in the greater church in a tomb, which was cut in a rock, and divided into two parts, the king's body being by itself at the head of the tomb, and the queen's in the eastern part of it. On the tomb were engraven several epigrams (19). The abbot, by whom these bodies were discovered, was not, as Leland supposes, Henricus Blasenfu, nephew to Henry I. but*

- a not only agree, that there was such a prince, but that he made a powerful resistance against the Saxons. Some will have him to have been king of all Britain; while others confine his kingdom to Cornwall. Nennius, who lived about three hundred years after him, tells us, that he overthrew the Saxons in no fewer than twelve battles. The first of these was fought near the mouth of a certain river, called Glein, or Gleni, placed by some in Devonshire; by others in Lincolnshire: the second, third, fourth and fifth, near the river Duglas, in the country of Linvis, or Linnis. This river some suppose to be the Dug or Duc in Lincolnshire; others the Dugles near Wigan in Lancashire. The sixth battle was fought on the banks of a river called Bassas, supposed by some to run by the town of Boston in Lincolnshire; the seventh in the wood of
- b Cbelidon, called in the British language Cattoit Celidon. Matthew of Westminster gives us a very particular account of this battle; but, in our opinion, so fabulous, that it does not deserve a place in history. The eighth battle was near the castle of Suinnion; the ninth near the city of Lergis or Leogis, called in the British tongue Kaerleon; the tenth in the neighbourhood of the river Ribrot or Arderic; the eleventh on the hill Brenion, supposed to be somewhere in Somersetshire; and the twelfth on the hill of Badon. Gale thinks these battles were fought in the space of forty years, under Vortigern, Ambrosius, and others, though they have been all ascribed to Arthur. Cerdick, having sustained great losses in the many battles that were fought with the Britons, sent over to Germany for new supplies; which arriving in three ships, under
- c the conduct of Sinf and Wugar, his two nephews, landed at Cerdickshore, where they were attacked by the Britons, whom they put to flight. Henry of Huntington, who describes this battle at length, tells us, that the British forces were drawn up on the side of a hill, and likewise in a valley, which at first frightened the new-comers; but recovering themselves from their consternation, they fell with great resolution upon the Britons, and put them to flight. In this year 514. died Esk the son of Hengist, and second king of Kent, and was succeeded by his son Otta, who reigned twenty-two years; but performed nothing worthy of notice. The same year died, as we are told by Henry of Huntington, Ella, the first king of the South Saxons, having reigned twenty-four years. Cissa, his youngest son, succeeded him, the other two, who
- d came over with him, being, in all likelihood, dead before him. Cissa is supposed to have built Chichester, called in the Saxon language the city of Cissa. About this time Cerdick, after he had been twenty-four years in the island, and made himself master of a very large territory, took upon him the title of king, and founded the third kingdom in the nation, called the kingdom of the West Saxons, comprehending the counties of Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, to which was afterwards added Cornwall. In subduing these countries, Cerdick, though reinforced with continual supplies from Germany, spent twenty-four years; which shews, that the Britons did not tamely part with their territories, but, being overpowered with numbers, were forced, after a long and vigorous resistance, to
- e quit them. The same year that Cerdick assumed the regal title, he fought a battle with the Britons at a place called Cerdick's-ford, supposed to be Charsford in Hampshire.

He is said to have overthrown the Saxons in twelve battles.

Henricus Soliacensis, or Henry de Soily, or Sully, who was made abbot after the burning of the church of Glasfenbury in 1184. was afterwards raised to the bishoprick of Worcester, and died in 1195. The epitaphs, which he caused to be engraved on the monuments of king Arthur and his queen, were as follows:

Hic jacet Arthurus, flos regum, gloria regni, Quem mores, probitas, commendans laude perenni.

Quæ meruit caelos virtutum prole secunda.

We are told, that, in the king's body, were plainly seen the marks of ten wounds, whereof one only seemed mortal. What Giraldus Cambrensis writes of his stature, and the dimensions of his body, is unquestionably fabulous. The leaden cross was preserved in the treasury of the church of Glasfenbury till the dissolution of that monastery, and there seen and carefully viewed by Leland (20). His tomb was discovered in the reign of Henry II. about the year 1189. that is, six hundred years after his death. So great was the love and esteem of the Britons for this hero, that, for several ages, he was thought by many to be still alive: nay, this notion, as our historians assure us, was not intirely routed out, till his tomb was discovered. It was this perhaps that gave occasion to the many fables, that have been invented concerning Arthur's travels, and his numberless victories in foreign countries. To conclude, had this renowned hero of the British nation been less celebrated by romantic writers, no one perhaps would have questioned the truth of what has been related concerning his noble deeds by more grave historians.

The account Henry of Huntington gives us of this battle is very advantageous to the a Saxons; but upon what grounds he gives it, we know not, since the Saxon annals only tell us, that from this time forward, the royal offspring, meaning the offspring of Cerdick, reigned over the West Saxons; which seems indeed to imply, that Cerdick won the day, and, by this victory, secured the crown to his posterity. No mention is made of Cerdick till seven years after this battle, when we find him again engaged with the Britons at a place called Cerdick's-lea, or Cerdick's-league, supposed to be Cberdley in Buckinghamshire^b; but whether the Saxons conquered, or the Britons, we are no-where told. All we know from the annals is, that, after this battle, Cerdick reduced the isle of Wight; a convincing proof, that the battle had proved favourable to him. He is said to have granted the isle of Wight to Stuf and Witgar, his two nephews, b who put to the sword an incredible number of the inhabitants at a place, called from the latter Witgaraburg, and now, by contraction, Caresbroke. Of these battles Henry of Huntington gives us very particular accounts; but as we are convinced he did not copy them from any authentic or credible authors, we forbear descending with him to particulars. But that we may not rely altogether on the Saxon annals, nor those authors, who have written long after the things they relate had happened, Gildas, a writer of unquestionable authority, who lived in those times, tells us, that a great battle was fought on Badon-hill, supposed to be Banfdown near Bath, in which the Saxons were utterly routed by the Britons^c. This battle is said by Nennius, and after him by most of our historians, to be the last of the twelve fought by king Arthur. There are not however wanting some, who maintain, that this battle was fought in the reign of Ambrosius; but, at the same time, they ascribe the victory to the valour and conduct of Arthur, who commanded the Britons as general to Ambrosius. In this battle the Saxons received such an overthrow, that, for many years, they forbore molesting the Britons. It was fought, according to the best British manuscripts, in the year 520. though some place it in 493. and others even before the year 491. Be that as it will, the Britons, it seems, still enjoyed the peace and tranquillity, which so signal a victory produced, when Gildas wrote his account of the destruction of Britain, that is, forty-four years after the battle was fought. This seems the most natural sense of the obscure words of Gildas^d, though Bede understood him as if he had meant, that the battle was fought forty-four years after the first coming of the Saxons^e; whence, in his chronicle, he places it in the reign of the emperor Zeno, who died in 491^f. But, notwithstanding the peace which the Britons enjoyed, the Saxons, who were continually flocking over, and making new encroachments, founded, according to the Saxon annals, in the year 527. a fourth kingdom, called the kingdom of the East Saxons, comprising Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire. This kingdom was begun by Erchenwin, descended from one Saxnat. To Erchenwin succeeded, according to Henry of Huntington, his son Sleda, whom William of Malmesbury makes the first of the East Saxon kings, and the tenth from Woden. About fifteen years after the founding of the East Saxon kingdom, that is, near the year 542. the great king Arthur is supposed to have died, and to have been succeeded by his kinsman Constantine; but the most antient British chronicles leave an interregnum of near eleven years, without so much as mentioning Constantine. In the year 547. Ida, the tenth by descent from Woden, founded the fifth kingdom in this island, called the kingdom of Northumberland, as it comprised that part of the British provinces, that lies north of the Humber. Otha and Ebusa had, at the request of Hengist, as we have related above, been allowed by Vortigern to settle in those parts, under pretence of making war on the Scots and Picts, and securing the northern provinces against their incursions. This they effected; but having at the same time driven out the antient inhabitants, they seized on those countries for themselves, and held them as inferior governors and vassals to the kings of Kent. This moderation, says our historian e, descended to their posterity; so that, for the space of an hundred years, the princes of Northumberland continued subject to the kings of Kent. But this year 547. the principality was changed into a kingdom, Ida, a person no less famous f for his virtues than for his birth, assuming the title of king of Northumberland. This proved a powerful kingdom; for it comprehended all Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Northumberland, with part of Scotland, as far as Edinburgh frith. Ida was not, according to Matthew of Westminster, son to any of those

a princes, who governed Northumberland before it became a kingdom, but an adventurer came lately out of Germany, and raised to the throne, in regard of his extraordinary merit. He reigned about twelve years with great applause, and built a town, which he called, as Bede seems to insinuate^a, Bebanburgh, now Bamborough in Northumberland, from his wife Bebba. Upon his death, the kingdom of the Northumbrians was divided into two, whereof the one, lying south of the Tine, was called Deira, and the other, extending from that river to Edinburgh frith, Bernicia.

In the year 561. Ethelbert began to reign in Kent. As he was young and ambitious when he ascended the throne, he was the first who raised civil wars and disturbances amongst the Saxons themselves, claiming, as king of the most ancient Saxon kingdom, a kind of right over the rest. This claim he attempted to support by dint of arms; but being twice defeated, he, who at first was formidable, became in a short time, in a manner, contemptible; for Keaulin, king of the West Saxons, and his son Cutba, having pursued him into his own dominions, slew at Wibbandun, Oslac and Cnebba, two of his chief commanders. By means of these civil contests among the Saxons, but chiefly by the late victory gained on Badon-hill, the Britons lived, at least for the space of forty-four years, unmolested by their common enemy. But the peace they enjoyed proved more destructive to them than any war; for though those who had felt the calamities that had befallen their nation, acknowledged themselves, by their christian and regular lives, indebted to Heaven for their deliverance, yet the next generation, unacquainted with past evils, and only sensible of their present ease, abandoned themselves to all manner of vice and debauchery to such a degree, that the principles of truth and justice being totally subverted, scarce any footsteps of them remained either in the clergy or laity, in the people or their princes; so that they became odious, as Gildas informs us, to all the neighbouring nations. But how far injustice, irreligion, and immorality, prevailed amongst all ranks of men, will better appear from that writer's own words. And to begin with the kings, who then reigned in Britain, he thus reproves them in the epistle, which he wrote while living in Armorica out of their reach. Britain, says he, has kings, but tyrants; judges, but such as prey upon the innocent; the kings have wives, but abandon themselves to harlots; they swear oft, but perjure themselves; they wage war, but an unjust and civil war; they punish thieves, yet have the greatest near them, even at their own tables; they sit in the seat of judgment, but seldom observe the rules of right judgment; they proudly overlook the modest and harmless, but countenance the audacious, though guilty of most abominable crimes; they fill their prisons, but with men whom they have committed rather out of malice, than for any crime. He then proceeds to each king in particular, beginning with Constantine then reigning in Cornwall and Devonshire, whom he calls the tyrannical whelp of an impure Damonian lioness, and charges with the murder of two innocent youths of the blood royal, whom he assassinated in their mother's arms at the very altar, and under the cope of the holy abbot. He likewise inveighs against this prince, as one that was polluted with many adulteries, and had put away his lawful wife. In the next place, he reproaches Aurelius Conanus with adulteries, with parricide, and greater cruelties than the former was guilty of. He adds, that this prince, hating the peace of his country, had, for the sake of booty and prey, fomented civil wars. Where Aurelius Conanus reigned, is not expressed; but his condition was not, it seems, very prosperous: for Gildas wishes, that, being now left alone, like a tree withering in the midst of a barren forest, he may call to mind the pride and arrogance of his father and elder brothers, who came all to untimely deaths. In the third place, he applies himself to Vortipore, whom he calls the wicked son of a good father, and the tyrant of Demetia or South Wales. He upbraids him, though stricken in years, with adulteries, with falsehood, and cruelty in governing. In his latter days he put away his wife, and, if we mistake not the meaning of Gildas, was guilty of incest with his daughter. In the next place, our author comes to Cuneglasus, supposed by some antiquaries to have reigned in North Wales: him he reproves for raising civil wars, for divorcing his wife, and marrying her cousin, who had vowed perpetual chastity; he was a great enemy to the clergy, high-minded, and trusting to his riches. Gildas concludes with a sharp reproof of Maelgocunus, the greatest, and likewise the most wicked, of all the British princes. He had driven out or slain many other kings or tyrants, and is called by our author the island dragon. He was tall in stature, a great warrior, and profuse in his gifts. While he was yet young, he overthrew his uncle in battle, and drove him from the throne; then, touched with remorse, he betook himself to a monastic life, which he soon forsook, as he did afterwards his wife, taking the wife of his brother's son in her room, who, to prevent her marriage being deemed null or unlawful, found means to dispatch her own husband, and Maglocunus's former wife. This is the substance of Gildas's reproof to the British kings, from which, all we can gather is, that there were, at this time, at least five kings in Britain, and all guilty of most enormous crimes; but by what means they came to the crown, what great actions they performed during their reigns, who succeeded each of them in their respective territories, &c. we are not told by any authentic writer. From the kings our author passes to the clergy, whom he sharply reproves as pastors in name, but in reality wolves, intent, on all occasions, not to feed the flock, but to pamper themselves; not called to the ministry, but seizing it as a trade; teaching the people, not by sound doctrine, but by evil example; haters of truth, broachers of lies; looking on the poor with an eye of contempt, but fawning on the rich, however wicked; great promoters of other peoples alms, but themselves ever contributing least; seldom officiating at the altar, and scarce ever with pure hearts; slightly touching the reigning vices of the age, but highly aggravating their own injuries, as done to Christ himself; seeking preferments in the church, more than Heaven; ignorant of the doctrines contained in the holy scriptures, but cunning and practised in worldly matters; bearing their heads high, but having their thoughts and affections abject and low. He likewise taxes them as gluttons, drunkards, and, above all, as guilty of the enormous sin of simony; and then addresses the laity thus: What can you expect, unhappy people, from these beasts all belly? Shall they reclaim you, who weary themselves in committing iniquity? Shall you see with their eyes, which are open only to gain? Leave them rather, lest you fall both blindfold into perdition. But are all thus? Perhaps not all, or not so grossly; but what did it avail Eli to be himself blameless, while he connived at the wickedness of his sons? &c. Our author, at the end of his history, gives a further account of the sad state of affairs, and general corruption of manners, in those times; and complains, that the cities and towns were not inhabited as formerly, but lay in a state of ruin and desolation; for foreign wars being ceased, civil wars broke out, which brought all things to a most deplorable condition. Such was the state of the government and religion among the Britons during the peace, which was produced by the victory on Badon-hill, and lasted till the time Gildas wrote, that is, for the space of about forty-four years.

Saxon kingdom. The East Angles

Nor long after, that is, about the year 575. began, as is supposed, for the year is not set down in the Saxon annals, or any other history, the kingdom of the East Angles, comprising the countries we now call Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and the isle of Ely. It was founded by Uffa, the eighth from Woden, though there were, it seems, before him, several petty princes, who had settled in Norfolk and Suffolk; but Uffa, more powerful than they, drove them all out, and reigned alone with such reputation, that, from him, the succeeding kings were called Uffinga's. William of Malmesbury, disagreeing with all other writers, supposes this kingdom to have begun before that of the West Saxons. And now the Saxons, who had been, ever since the battle on Badon-hill, either inactive, or engaged in civil wars and quarrels among themselves, began afresh to harass the Britons, and, in a few years, drove them out of all the countries they held in that part of the island, which is now known by the name of England; for Cuthwulf, the brother of Ceaulin, king of the West Saxons, having defeated the Britons at Bedanford, now Bedford, the head of the adjacent province, says Henry of Huntington, he took from them four towns, viz. Liganburgh, now Loughborough in Leicestershire, or, as others will have it, Leighton in Bedfordshire; Eglesburg, now Alesbury in Buckinghamshire, with Bennington and Ignesham, now Benjon and Evesham in Oxfordshire. Cuthwulf died the same year he obtained this victory. For the space of six years after, we hear of no action, as if Ceaulin had had no commander to place in his brother's room. But, after that time, he renewed the war, and having, with his son Cuthwin, engaged the Britons at a place in Gloucestershire, called Deorbam, he slew three of their kings, Comail, Condidan, and Farinmailc, and took three of their chief cities, viz. Glewancester, or Gloucester,

- ^a Cornsester, and Bathancester, now Bath. Who these kings were, we are no-where told; but some conjecture the first to be Cuniglasus, and the second Aurelius Conanus, both mentioned by Gildas. We read of no other battle between the Saxons and Britons, though, in all likelihood, several skirmishes happened, till seven years after the battle of Deorham, when Coakin, and his son Cutba, fought against the Britons at a place called Fretbanleag. In this battle Cutba was slain, and the Saxons obliged, according to Henry of Huntington, to retire; but fresh succours seasonably arriving, they returned to the charge, routed the Britons, and took several towns^k. About this time, that is, about the year 585. according to Henry of Huntington, and Mai-ibrew of Westminster, was founded, by Crida, the seventh kingdom in this island, ^{The seventh Saxon king- dom. Mercia. Year after Christ 585.} called the kingdom of Mercia. Whence it took that name, is uncertain, some deriv- ing it from the river Merse, which, running between Chefbire and Lancashire, was the north-west boundary of the Mercian kingdom^l. Others will have it to have been so called from the Saxon word meark, signifying a limit; because most of the other kingdoms bordered upon it^m. Be that as it will, this kingdom, though the last erected, was one of the largest of the English Saxon kingdoms, and one of the last, that was conquered by the West Saxons. It comprehended seventeen counties, viz. Gloucestershire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Huntingtonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Chefbire, and part of Hertfordshire. The Britons were now confined within very narrow bounds. How- ever, before they abandoned all on this side the mountains, they once more engaged the Saxons at a place called Woden's Beant near the ditch in Wiltshire, which, by the neighbouring people, is called Wansdike, and in the Saxon tongue Woden's dæc, or the dyke of Woden, and, running through the middle of the country, divides it from east to west. This battle proved very bloody; but who were the generals on either side, we are no-where told. Henry of Huntington only writes, that the Britons having drawn up their army after the Roman manner, the Saxons charged them with their usual boldness. Hereupon a sharp engagement ensued, adds that writer, in which God gave the victory to the Britons; for the Saxons were routed, and almost their ^{The Britons gain a com- plete victory over the Saxons.} whole army cut offⁿ. In this battle the Britons were assisted, according to William of Malmesbury, by the Angles, jealous of the overgrown power of Ceakin, king of the West Saxons, whose military genius, and great exploits, had struck terror into the Angles, as well as the Britons. But, after the loss of this battle, he was driven out of his dominions, and forced to take refuge in some other kingdom; but whether in this island, or elsewhere, is not recorded in history. From this victory the Britons reaped but little advantage; for being daily more confined, and harassed on one side by the Scots and Picts, and on the other by the Saxons, they were, in the end, obliged ^{But are, in the end, obliged to retire into Wales, and other parts.} to abandon their ancient seats, and take shelter among the craggy and mountainous places in the west of the island, whither their cruel enemies could not easily pursue them. There they long continued a warlike nation, defending their liberty, and, though separated from the Saxons by a deep ditch, the work of Uffa king of the Mercians, making frequent incursions into the Saxon, or, as we may now style them, the English territories, where they put all to fire and sword. They had been attended with far better success, had they not been continually quarrelling among themselves; which was chiefly owing to the ambitious and restless humours of the petty princes, or rather tyrants, by whom they were governed. Some of the unhappy Britons took refuge, as we have said just now, in that part of the island, which the Latins called Cambria, and the English, after the German custom, Wales; for the Germans, as the learned antiquary Humphrey Libuyd well observes, calling the strangers that lived ^{Wales divided into six petty kingdoms.} near them on one side Gauls or Walls, gave afterwards the same appellation to all strangers; and hence, according to that writer, the Wallons in the Low Countries; and the Wallachians on the Danube, received their denominations. The Britons, upon their retiring into Cambria or Wales, divided that country, as we read in the same author, into six regions, Guynedd, Powys, Debenharth, Reynur, Esfylac or Syllac, and Morganwg or Morgan. Each of these regions or districts was governed by its own king till the year 843. when Roderic the Great became sole monarch of Cambria or Wales, which, at his death, he divided among his three sons, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. Some of the Britons were driven into Cornwall;

others, according to the learned antiquary, whom we have quoted above, settled in a the most southern parts of Scotland, and in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, and continued there till the year 871. when they were driven out by the Scots and English, and forced to take shelter among their countrymen in that part of Cambria or Wales, which by the Latin writers is styled Venedotia, and by us North Wales. The Britons at first possessed all the countries beyond the Dee and the Severn, which two rivers, in antient times, divided Cambria or Wales from England, the towns, which stand on the eastern banks of these two rivers, having been most of them built to restrain the Cambrians or Welsh from breaking into England. But the English, having passed the Severn, by degrees seized on the country lying between that river and the Wye; so that all Hertfordshire, and that tract, which was antiently called the Danish-wood, b with Gloucestershire, and such parts of Worcestershire and Shropshire, as lie beyond the Severn, are still inhabited by the English; nay, in former times, some parts of Flintshire and Denbighshire were subject to the kings of Mercia; for Uffa, the most powerful king of that country, caused a deep ditch, with a high wall, to be carried on as a barrier between his dominions and the territories of the Cambrians, from the mouth of the Dee, a little above Flint castle, over steep mountains, cross deep valleys, fens and rivers, to the mouth of the Wye. This ditch, called by the Welsh to this day Claude Uffa, or the ditch of Uffa, is still to be seen in several parts; and all the towns, situated on the east side of it, have names ending in ton or bam, an evident proof, that they were inhabited by Saxons; nay, the inhabitants of them are by the c Welsh still called Guyr y Mers, that is, the men of Mercia. Thus far of the places, into which the distressed Britons were driven within the island. But Gildas tells us, that some of them, committing themselves to the mercy of the waves, sought for shelter beyond the sea; and it is the general opinion, that they fled to their countrymen in Armorica. That some Britons had settled in Armorica, now Bretagne, before this time, is past dispute, though there is a great disagreement among authors as to the precise time of their first settling there. The first mention we find of the Britons in Armorica is in the year 461. when Manfuetus, bishop of the Britons, subscribed, among the other prelates of Gaul and Armorica, to the articles established in the first council of Tours. It is manifest from Sidonius Apollinaris, that, in 469. they were d already settled on the banks of the Loire. About the year 470. the Britons in Armorica had a king of their own; named Riobam, who, at the request of the emperor Antemius, marched at the head of twelve thousand men against Earic, king of the Visigoths, but was defeated by that prince in the province of Berri. Sidonius Apollinaris highly commends the moderation of Riobam; but speaks of his men in such terms, as shew, that they were not at all mended by the calamities they had suffered at home. Sidonius, after he was made bishop, had often occasion to complain of them to their prince. An anonymous writer, who was a native of Armorica, and wrote the life of St. Wingalof, not long after the Saxons had made themselves masters of Britain, tells us, that the Britons, embarking on floats, arrived in Armorica, being e driven out of their native soil by the Saxons, a fierce and barbarous nation. He adds, that the Britons, being worn out with misfortunes and fatigues, continued quiet for a while, without engaging in any wars. The Britons are said to have passed over to, and settled in, Armorica at three different times, viz. in the reign of Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, during the usurpation of Maximus, and when the Saxons made themselves masters of the island. No antient historian makes any mention of their settling in that country, either in the reign of Constantius or of Maximus; which gives us room to question the truth of what the moderns have written on that head. All we know for certain is, that the Britons were settled in that part of Gaul, which, from them, was called Britany, before the Saxons and Angles made f themselves masters of the whole country now called England. William of Malmesbury writes, that the Britons, who went over with the tyrant Maximus, were, for their faithful services, rewarded with lands in Gaul on the shore of the ocean; but others maintain, that, before the Saxon invasion, no Britons had settled in Gaul; which opinion seems to us by far the most probable, since, by the antient and most credible historians, frequent mention is made of the Britons in Gaul after, and none before, the coming of the Saxons. a degrees, got the better of the natives, treated them much in the same manner, as ^{They make themselves masters of it.} their countrymen, whom they had left behind in the island, were treated by the Saxons; for, not to allege other testimonies, Regalis, bishop of Vannes, speaking of the unhappy condition of the Armoricans; We live, says he, in captivity under the Britons, and bear a most grievous and heavy yoke. The Armoricans, thus overpowered by the Britons, were blended with them under the common appellation of Britons, their country being called Britannia Armorica, and Britannia Cismarina, in the same manner as the Gauls, in other parts of Gaul, were blended under the common name of Franks, and their country called Francia. The Armorican Britons defended themselves with great bravery against the Franks, first under petty kings, and afterwards

b under counts and dukes, as we shall relate in a more proper place. But to return to our distressed Britons at home: Those who had taken refuge among the mountains beyond the Severn, attempted, from time to time, to recover the countries they had lost; but their efforts proved ineffectual, as did the endeavours of the Anglo-Saxons to extend their conquests beyond the mountains. Such of the Britons as submitted to, and lived among the Saxons, were treated by them as slaves, and employed in the most servile offices.

Thus, omitting such accounts as are generally deemed fabulous, we have related the most remarkable events, that happened in Britain, from the arrival of the Saxons, to the retreat of the Britons into Cambria or Wales. The venerable Bede takes no

c notice of what was transacted here from the battle on Badon-hill to the conversion of the Saxons in the time of pope Gregory the Great; which does not a little incline us to question the truth of what we read in the writers, who came after him. These had not better records or memoirs than that venerable author, but less discernment, and more credulity; which perhaps may have prompted them to relate, and even believe, such things, as did not appear to that judicious author so well attested, as to deserve a place in his history. With these however we have been forced to take up, for want of better guides, when abandoned by Gildas and Bede; but as we do not ourselves give intire credit to what they relate, we are far from exacting it of our readers. The unfortunate Britons being, in the manner we have related, driven

d into Cambria, the Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, remained masters of the whole country now called England, where they had already founded seven kingdoms, known by the name of the heptarchy. But of these kingdoms we shall speak at length in a more proper place, the method, which we have proposed to ourselves, obliging us to leave them at present, and hasten to the history of other more antient nations.

The antient state of the several northern nations, to their breaking into the Roman empire, and their several expeditions, and mutual expulsions, till the settling of the Hunns in Hungary, the Vandals, Visigoths and Sueves in Spain, the Vandals in Africa, the Franks in Gaul, the Ostrogoths in Italy.

seats of the

THE Hunns, a fierce and savage nation, inhabited that part of Asiatic Sarmatia,^a which bordered on the Palus Mæotis, and the Tanais, the antient boundary between Europe and Asia.^a Their country, as described by Procopius^b, lay north of mount Caucasus, which, extending from the Euxine to the Caspian sea, parts Asiatic Sarmatia from Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, lying on the isthmus between the two above-mentioned seas. In this mountain, or rather ridge of mountains, were two narrow passes leading out of Asiatic Sarmatia into Iberia, one of which was antiently called Porta Caucasica, but in Procopius's time Tzur, and the other Porta Caspia, which however we must distinguish from the famous Porta Caspia, or the narrow passes in mount Caspus, which, at a great distance to the south of mount Caucasus, divided Media from Parthia. The two passes in mount Caucasus let the neighbouring Hunns, says Procopius,^b into the territories of the Romans and Parthians; whence it is manifest, that, according to Procopius, the antient seats of the Hunns lay north of mount Caucasus, and at a small distance from it. In those seats, called by Procopius the Eulybian region, dwelt the Hunns, divided into several tribes, but all comprised under the general name of Ugri, changed afterwards into that of Hunni or Unni. In the authors, who wrote after the year of the christian æra 376. when the Hunns first broke into Europe, mention is made of the Uturgurian, Cuturgurian, Onugurian, Vultinzurian, Burugunian, Sabirian or Gabrian, and Nephtalite or Ephthalite Hunns.^c Procopius tells us, that one of their kings had two sons, Uturgur and Cuturgur, who, upon their father's death, divided his territories between them; and that such of the Hunns, as were subject to Uturgur, were called Uturgurian Hunns; and those, who fell to the lot of Cuturgur, Coturgurian. Of the other denominations no notice is taken by the historians. On the south side of the Palus Mæotis, where it discharges itself into the Euxine sea by a narrow chanel, called the Bosporus Cimmerius, dwelt the Uturgurian Hunns; and north of them, towards the Tanais, the Coturgurian.^c The Ephthalite, as Procopius terms them, or Nephtalite Hunns, as they are styled by Agathias, inhabited a rich country, bordering to the north on Persia, and at a great distance from the Sarmatian or Scythian Hunns, with whom they had no intercourse, nor the least resemblance either in their persons or manners. They were a powerful nation, and often served against the Romans in the Persian armies; but, in the reign of the emperor Zeno, being provoked by Perozes king of Persia laying claim to part of their country, they defeated the Persians in two pitched battles, slew their king, over-ran all

- a Persia, and held it in subjection for the space of two years, obliging Cabades, the son and successor of Perozes, to pay them a yearly tribute. These Hunns, commonly called by the writers of those times the White Hunns, did not wander, like the others, from place to place, but, contented with their own country, which supplied them with all necessaries, they lived under a regular government, subject to one prince, and seldom made inroads, unless provoked, either into the Persian or Roman territories. They lived according to their own laws, and dealt uprightly with one another, as well as with the neighbouring people. Each of their great men used to chuse twenty or more companions, to enjoy with him his wealth, and partake of all his diversions; but, upon his decease, they were all buried with him in the same
- b grave^f. This custom favours of barbarity; but, in every other respect, the Nephthalite were a far more civilized nation, than the Scythian Hunns, who, breaking into the empire, filled most of the provinces of Europe with blood and slaughter. The latter were, according to Ammianus Marcellinus^g, a savage people, exceeding in cruelty the most barbarous nations. They begin to practise their cruelty, says Jornandes, upon their own children the very first day they come into the world, cutting and mangling the cheeks of their males, to prevent the growth of hair, which they must have looked upon, contrary to the sentiments of other nations, as unbecoming and unmanly. They had perhaps in this practice another view, which Jornandes seems to insinuate elsewhere, viz. to strike terror into the enemy with their
- c countenances thus deformed, and covered with scars^h. They had no other food but roots and raw meat, being quite unacquainted with the use of fire, and no houses at all, not even huts, but lived constantly exposed to the air in the woods, and on the mountains, where, from their infancy, they were inured to hunger, thirst, and all manner of hardships; nay, they had such an aversion to houses, which they called the sepulchres of the living, that, when they went into other countries, they could hardly be prevailed upon to come within the walls of any house, not thinking themselves safe when shut up and covered. They used even to eat and sleep on horseback, scarce ever dismounting; which, in all likelihood, induced Zosimus to write, that the Hunns could not walkⁱ. They covered their nakedness with goats skins, or the
- d skins of a sort of mice sewed together. Day and night was indifferent to them as to buying, selling, eating, and drinking. They had no law, nor any kind of religion; but complied with their inclinations, whatever they prompted them to, without the least restraint, or distinction between good and evil^k. St. Ambrose writes, that they were greatly addicted to gaming; which occasioned frequent murders among them^l. But this vice, as well as that of lewdness, with which he charges them, seems quite foreign to the manners of a warlike nation, inured to all sorts of hardships. In war they began the battle with great fury, and a hideous noise; but, if they met with a vigorous opposition, their fury began to abate after the first onset, and, when once put in disorder, they never rallied, but fled in the utmost confusion. They
- e were quite unacquainted with the art of besieging towns; and authors observe, that they never attacked the enemy's camp. They were a faithless nation, and thought themselves no longer bound by the most solemn treaties, than they found their advantage in observing them. Hence we often find them, upon the least prospect of obtaining more advantageous conditions, breaking into the Roman empire, in defiance of the most solemn oaths and engagements. Several corps of Hunns, after their coming into Europe, served in the Roman armies against the Goths, and other barbarous nations; nay, they were ready, for hire, to fight against one another, being blind to every other regard and consideration^m. Of this the emperor Justinian was apprised, and, by promising a large sum to the Uturgurian Hunns, prevailed upon
- f them to fall upon the Cuturgurians, and drive them quite out of the empireⁿ. The
- Their form of government.
- form of government that prevailed among them, was not, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, properly speaking, monarchical; for that author, speaking of the Scythian Hunns, tells us, that they had never learnt to submit to the authority of a king, but that they were headed and conducted by some of their chief men^o. These, by some historians, are honoured with the title of kings, but by others styled only generals or leaders. Jornandes calls them constantly kings; and truly in war they seem to have been invested with the supreme command. The same author writes¹, that Balamir, whom elsewhere he calls *Balamber*², was king of the Hunns, when they first passed the Palus Mæotis, and subdued the Goths, that is, about the year 376. The name of Uldin, king or general of the Hunns, is famous in the history of the reign of *Arcadius*³. Olimpiodorus mentions one Caraton, whom he calls the first king of the *Hunns*⁴. Several of the ancestors of the famous Attila had, according to Priscus the rhetorician⁵, been honoured with the command of the Hunns. Mundiu-chus, or, as others call him, Mundzuchus, father to that prince, maintained, to use the expression of Jornandes, the antient splendor of his family⁶. He had three brothers, Ostar, Roas, who were both kings or leaders of the Hunns, but not of the whole nation, and Oebarfus, who outlived the other two, but served under *Attila*⁷. Ostar and Uptar, who made war upon the Burgundians in 436. as we shall relate anon, seem to have been one and the same person; but we must not confound, as some have done, Roas, whom Priscus calls *Roua*⁸, and Tiro Prosper, *Rugula*⁹, with Rengas, general of the Hunns, who was killed with a flash of lightning in 426. while he was making war upon *Theodosius II*¹⁰. Roas was the immediate predecessor of Attila. As to the origin of the Hunns, Procopius seems to insinuate, that they were descended from the Albanians, and that they removed from Albania, lying on the Caspian sea, into Asiatic Sarmatia, where they settled. Jornandes, an irreconcilable enemy to the Hunns, who had driven his countrymen the Goths from their antient habitations, gives us the following account of their original, an account intirely owing to the hatred he bore them. Fiimer, the son of Gandaric the Great, and the fifth king of the Goths after their going out of the peninsula Scanzia or Scandinavia, having entered the Scythian territories, discovered among his people a great number of witches, called in the language of his country aliorumnae. These he drove into the wilderness far from his army, where the unclean spirits, who haunted those wild and solitary places, being taken with their charms, kept them company, and from their conversation sprung the nation of the *Hunns*¹¹. We are almost ashamed to allow a place in our history to such a ridiculous fable, though very gravely related by *Jornandes*¹², and with no less gravity confuted by a modern writer¹³. As for the name of Hunns, some authors will have them to have been so called from one of their leaders named Hunnor; but of thus Hunnor no mention is made by any antient writer. They are frequently styled Ugri by Procopius, and other writers; and the word Ugre, in the Sclavonic language, signifies aquatic, that is, living in or near the water, a name well adapted to a nation living in wet or marshy places, and such were the antient seats of the Hunns bordering on the Palus Mæotis and the *Tanais*¹⁴. Ptolemy, in his Sarmatia Europæa, mentions a people, whom he calls Cbuni, dwelling in his time on the banks of the Borysthenes. These the Hunns subdued, and settled in their country; whence, from their name Cbuni, some derive that of Hunni. But, to dwell no longer on conjectures, we shall now give a succinct account of the several migrations and expeditions of the Hunns, from their first coming into Europe, to their settling in Pannonia, called afterwards from them Hungary, following therein Anmianus Marcellinus, the most antient author that speaks of them, at least among such as have reached our times, and other credible writers, who lived in or near those times.

THE Hunns, as we have observed above, dwelt on the east side of the Palus Mæotis, now the sea of Zabache, quite unacquainted with the people and countries lying on the opposite side, till a hind, pursued by some hunters, or, as we read in other authors, an ox stung by a gad-fly, having passed the marsh, some Hunns followed their guide to the opposite side, where they discovered a country far more agreeable than their own. Hereupon, returning to their own country, they acquainted their countrymen with what they had seen, and at the same time informed them, that what they had till then looked upon as a deep sea, was only a marsh, and might be passed without the least danger¹⁵. Encouraged with this account, and desiring to settle in a more kind soil, they passed the marsh; and entering the country of the

- a Alans, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, and were thence called Tanaïtes, they laid it waste far and near, made a dreadful havock of the inhabitants, and obliged such of them as were left alive, and able to bear arms, to join them. Thus reinforced, they fell upon the Goths, by Ammianus called Greuthongi, and by Jornandes, Ostrogoths, and spread every-where such terror among them, that Ermenric their king, though a warlike prince, and conqueror of many nations, laid violent hands on himself, to avoid seeing the calamities, that threatened his people, and to him seemed unavoidable^f. Jornandes tells us, that Ermenric, whom he calls Ermanaric, having punished with death a woman named Saniolk, of the nation of the Rexolani, for the murder of her husband, her two brothers, Sarus and Ammius, conspiring against him, gave him a dangerous wound in the side, which, with the concern he was under in seeing his country over-run by the Hunns, occasioned his death, in the hundred and tenth year of his age^g. He was succeeded by Vithimir, who, having hired a body of Hunns, with them and his own troops, made, for some time, a vigorous resistance; but was in the end, after many losses, slain in battle. He left behind him a son named Vitheric or Videric, whom, as he was under age, he committed to the care of Alatheus and Safrax; but these, though men of known valour and experience in war, foreseeing all their efforts would prove unsuccessful against the numerous and formidable forces of the enemy, thought it advisable to abandon the country they then held, and retire, with all their people, to the plains between the Borysthenes and the Danube; which country is now known by the name of Podolia. Atbanaric, king or chief of the Thervingi or Visigoths, being informed of what had happened to the Ostrogoths, resolved to stand upon his guard, and prepared for a vigorous defence on the banks of the Danastus, now the Nieper, which parted the Greuthingi from the Thervingi. But the Hunns falling upon him before he had the least notice of their approach, he was put to flight after having lost great numbers of his men, and obliged to take shelter among the neighbouring mountains. As the enemy, overloaded with booty, pursued him but slowly, he built a wall with incredible expedition for his own defence, extending from the Gerasus or the Pruth to the Danube, in the country now known by the name of Moldavia^h. All the Gothic nations being alarmed at this sudden and unexpected irruption of the Hunns, such of them as had the good luck to escape the dreadful havock, which those barbarians made of their people, resolved to abandon their country to an enemy, whom they were no longer able to withstand, and to save themselves within the Roman dominions, separated by the Danube from the countries over-run by the Hunns. Accordingly they retired from their ancient seats, and, approaching the banks of the Danube, dispatched ambassadors to the emperor Valens, begging, in a most submissive manner, to be admitted into Thrace. The Romans were struck with terror and amazement, in hearing, that such multitudes of barbarians were hovering about the banks of the Danube, driven out of their seats by greater barbarians than themselves. Valens however complied with their request, allowing them to pass the Danube, and enter Thrace in such numbers, that Ammianus compares them to the sparks, which, at that very time, issued out of mount Ætna, and to the sands of the Libyan shoreⁱ. Those were, for the most part, Thervingi or Visigoths, the subjects of king Atbanaric. As for the Greuthongi or Ostrogoths, they being likewise driven out of their country by the Hunns, flocked in swarms to the banks of the Danube, and, encouraged by the reception their countrymen had met with from Valens, begged to be admitted within the Roman dominions; but the emperor not thinking it advisable to comply with their request, after they had continued some time on the banks of the Danube, they passed it in spite of the Romans. Atbanaric, king of the Thervingi, not thinking it safe to take refuge in the territories of the Romans, on account of his having assisted the usurper Procopius, retired, with part of his people, to a place defended by inaccessible rocks, named Caucalanda, having driven from thence the Sarmatians and the Taisali, whose country lay west of the Gerasus or the Pruth^k. Thus the Hunns, in this year 376. not only settled in Europe, but made themselves masters of that vast country, which extends from the Tanais to the Danube, and was, before their arrival, possessed by the Alans, the Goths, and several other barbarous nations, whom they either drove out, or forced to submit to their victorious arms.

The Scythian Hunns invade Thrace, but are defeated by St. Icho. Year of Christ 391. They ravage the eastern provinces. Year of Christ 395.

Of the Hunns, who settled in Europe, we find no further mention made in history a till the year 388. when great numbers of them are said to have lifted themselves in the Roman armies, Theodosius I. who was then emperor, encouraging them with large sums to serve under his banner, both on account of their warlike temper, and to divert them from raising disturbances on the frontiers of the empire¹. But the Nephthalite Hunns, who had continued in Asia, and were neighbours to the Persians, as we have observed above, breaking into the Roman dominions, over-ran Mesopotamia in 383. and even laid siege to Edeffa; but were repulsed by the Roman garrison, and obliged by a body of troops, consisting chiefly of Goths, sent to the relief of the place, to abandon the enterprize, and retire^m. The European Hunns first passed the Danube in 391. and being joined by the Goths and other barbarians, committed dreadful b savages in Mesia and Thrace. But Stilicho marching against them, gave them a total overthrow, and pursuing them close, shut them up in a narrow valley, where they must have perished with hunger, or surrendered at discretion, had not Theodosius chosen to conclude a peace with them, following therein, says the poet Claudian, the pernicious counsel of the traitor *Rufinus*ⁿ. About four years after, that is, in 395. the Hunns, breaking unexpectedly into the eastern provinces, penetrated as far as Antioch, destroying all with fire and sword, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties^o. St. Jerom, speaking of this irruption of the Hunns, All the east, says he, trembled, when the dismal news was brought, that swarms of Hunns, coming from the far-distant Mæolis, and dwelling between the frozen Tanais and the country of the c savage Massagetes, flew up and down, and filled all places with blood and slaughter. While the Roman armies, continues that writer, were employed in civil wars, that is, against the usurper Eugenius, the cruel enemy roved, without controul, where they pleased, preventing, by their speed, the report of their coming. They had no regard either to religion or dignity; no age they spared, nor were they softened by the tears of the crying infant; but put those to death, who had scarce begun to live, and who, not apprised of their danger, smiled, when in the enemy's hands, at those very weapons, that were immediately to destroy them. He adds, that the general terror and consternation spread as far as Palestine, upon a report, that they proposed to advance to Jerusalem, and plunder the holy city^p. The same author speaks of this irruption of the Hunns in several other places^q (A), and likewise St. Chrysostom^r, d Philostorgius^s, Socrates^t, and Sozomen^u. St. Chrysostom tells us in one of his homilies^v, that several christians, on that occasion, suffered martyrdom; and that others were brought to Antioch, to be sold there or ransomed. Philostorgius places this irruption of the Hunns after the death of Rufinus, and even after that of the eunuch Eutropius, who succeeded him in his power and employments. But he was therein certainly mistaken, since not only Claudian^x, but Socrates^y, Sozomen^z, and Zosimus^a, tell us in express terms, that Rufinus privately stirred up, by his emissaries, the Hunns to break into the empire, and likewise the Goths, under the conduct of the famous

(A) Socrates, Sozomen, Zosimus, and the poet Claudian, agree in this, that the Hunns invaded the eastern provinces at the instigation of Rufinus. On the other hand, it is manifest from the same authors, as well as from the code, and the Alexandrian chronicle, that Rufinus was put to death in the month of November 395. In the code are several laws enacted the following year, and addressed to Caesarius, who succeeded Rufinus in the office of praefectus praetorio. Socrates writes, that Rufinus was put to death on the twenty-seventh of November 395⁽¹⁾; which is confirmed both by the Alexandrian chronicle, placing his death after the last offices paid to the body of Theodosius on the ninth of the same month⁽²⁾, and by the code, where the laws are addressed to Rufinus till the eleventh of October, and, from the thirtieth of November, to his successor Caesarius ⁽³⁾. However, St. Jerom, in his third epistle⁽⁴⁾, which we cannot suppose to have been written before the year 397. says, that this irruption had happened the year before, Ecce tibi anno praeterito, &c. But St. Jerom was either mistaken, or speaks in that epistle only of the ravages and devastations, which began in 395. but were continued, as appears from Claudian ⁽⁵⁾, in 396.

- a Alaric. What he aimed at in thus encouraging the barbarians to invade the empire, we have related elsewhere ^b, from the authors we have just now quoted. The Hunns, having over-run and plundered several provinces, returned home of their own accord, loaded with booty, and carrying with them an incredible number of captives. They met with no opposition, the armies, that had been sent into the west, to suppress the usurper Eugenius, not being yet returned; and this is what St. Jerom meant, or ought to have meant, in saying, that the Hunns broke into the empire, while the Roman armies were engaged in a civil war, the disturbances raised in the west by Eugenius, being happily appeased, and the author of them dispatched, before the irruption of those barbarians.
- b AFTER this irruption, the Hunns seem to have continued quiet for the space of nine years, that is, till the year 404. when passing in great multitudes the Danube, they entered Thrace; and having over-run that province, they penetrated into East Illyricum, committing every-where dreadful ravages, and destroying with fire and sword what they could not carry with them ^c. A modern writer quotes a letter written this year by Honorius, emperor of the west, to his brother Arcadius, who reigned in the east, to express his concern for the ravages committed by the Hunns in Thrace, and for the ruin and loss of Illyricum. These calamities Honorius ascribes to the wrath of Heaven, justly provoked at the iniquitous proceedings of the court against the holy bishop Chrysostom ^d. By the loss of Illyricum is only meant in the above-mentioned letter the ruin of that province; for the Hunns, upon advice, that the imperial troops were assembling with a design to cut off their retreat, repassed the Danube with all the haste the immense booty they carried with them allowed ^e. The following year 405. we find great numbers of Hunns serving in Stilicho's army against Radagaisus, who had invaded Italy, as we have related at length elsewhere ^f. These Hunns were led by Uldin, one of their chiefs or kings, and to him was chiefly owing the signal victory gained by Stilicho in Hetruria; for having, with his Hunns, surrounded one of the three bodies, into which Radagaisus had divided his army, he cut them all in pieces, to the number of an hundred thousand men ^g. Orosius ascribes this victory not to the Hunns, but to a panic, which spreading all on a sudden throughout the camp, obliged Radagaisus to withdraw from before Florence, which he had invested, to the neighbouring mountains of Fiesoli, where most of his men perished with famine, and the rest submitted to the Romans. Thus the victory, says the same writer, was owing to the Lord of hosts, and not to his enemies the Hunns ^h. But to them it is ascribed by St. Austin, Zosimus, and Prosper, whose authority is of far greater weight with us, than that of Orosius. Uldin was well known to the Romans before this time, from the vigorous opposition he had made in the year 400. against the famous Gainas, commander of the Goths in the Roman service, of whom we have spoken at length in our Roman history ⁱ. Gainas was commander in chief, not only of his countrymen the Goths, but of all the troops of Arcadius. However, turning his arms against the prince who had thus raised him, he formed a design of surprising and plundering the city of Constantinople; but, failing in that attempt, he ravaged all Thrace in an hostile manner. Hereupon Fravitus, another Goth in the Roman service, and greatly attached to the Roman interest, falling upon him, cut great numbers of his men in pieces. With the rest Gainas marched through Thrace to the banks of the Danube, which he passed, being desirous to end his days in the ancient country of the Goths. But Uldin, king of the Hunns, who had driven out the Goths, and had been now in the quiet possession of those countries for the space of twenty-four years, alarmed at the arrival of so renowned a commander, with an army of his own nation, met him on the frontiers, and, after several conflicts, defeated and killed him in a pitched battle ^k. His body being found on the field of battle, Uldin caused his head to be cut off, and sent it to Arcadius ^l, who received it at Constantinople on the third of January of the ensuing year 401 ^m.

No prince had hitherto deserved better of the empire than Uldin. But two years after the signal victory obtained chiefly by his means over Radagaisus, he became, on what provocation we know not, an irreconcilable enemy to the Romans; and passing the Danube, entered Thrace at the head of a numerous army, consisting of Hunns and a Squiri, or Scyri, a northern nation, subject, in all likelihood, to the Hunns. As this irruption happened during the minority of Theodosius II. Anthemius, who had taken upon him the administration, did all that lay in his power to appease Uldin; but he confiding too much in his own strength, and insisting upon conditions, that could not be honourably granted, Anthemius ordered a body of Roman troops to march against him, at whose approach several of his officers, offended at his haughty and imperious behaviour, laid hold of that opportunity to abandon him, and side with the Romans. This alarmed Uldin, who thereupon retired with great precipitation, and repassed the Danube, after having lost, on his hasty march, many of his men. As for the Squiri, the emperor's troops coming up with them before they reached the Danube, they were all to a man either killed or taken. The prisoners were sold, and dispersed all over Asia, to prevent their ever returning to their own country. By this overthrow, and one they had received in 381. from Theodosius the Great, grandfather to the reigning emperor Theodosius the younger, that nation, once very numerous, was almost utterly extirpated. From this time the Hunns seem to have continued quiet till the year 425. when the emperor Honorius dying, and John his chief secretary assuming the purple, they were prevailed upon by the celebrated Aetius, who had sided with the usurper, to espouse his cause. As Aetius had been formerly given to them, on what occasion we know not, as an hostage, and was, by that means, become acquainted with their chiefs, the usurper sent him, as the most proper person, with large sums, to engage them in his cause. Accordingly, a few months after his departure, he returned at the head of sixty thousand Hunns. Upon his entering Italy, he was met by Aspar, one of the generals of Theodosius, who, upon the death of his uncle Honorius, had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor of the west. Hereupon a bloody battle ensued, without any considerable advantage on either side. But in the mean time Aetius, being informed of the death of the usurper, who had been taken and beheaded in Ravenna three days before the battle, submitted to Theodosius, and persuaded the Hunns, not without distributing considerable sums among them, to return home. However, Thrace was this very year pillaged and laid waste by some of that nation, whom Theodoret styles Scythian Nomades, that is, Scythian wanderers. They were led by one Rougas or Roilas, who, in a boasting manner, threatened to over-run the whole empire, and to lay siege to Constantinople itself, which, he bragged, he would take at the first assault, and, having plundered it, lay it in ashes. But Theodosius, not in the least frightened at the menaces of the barbarian, committed the event, according to his custom, says Socrates, to Providence, and soon obtained what he desired; for Rougas was killed with lightning, a plague broke out in his army, and swept off the greatest part of his men, and fire from heaven consumed most of those whom the plague had spared. This complication of misfortunes, as we may call it, struck the barbarians with such terror, that they retired of their own accord, dreading, not the arms of the Romans, says Socrates, but the power of Heaven, which had evidently espoused the cause of Theodosius. Socrates adds, that St. Proculus, who preached then at Constantinople, and was afterwards raised to the see of that city, made a sermon to the people on the dispersion of the Hunns, applying to them what we read in the prophet Ezekiel concerning Gog and Magog (B). Six years after this irruption, that is, in 432. we find the Hunns in possession of Pannonia; for Aetius, being that year disgraced by Valentinian III. or rather by his

(B) Valesius is of opinion, that Rougas, leader of the Hunns in this irruption, and Rouas, the immediate predecessor of Attila, and his uncle, according to Jornandes (6), on the father's side, are one and the same person (7). But this opinion is no ways agreeable to what we read in Socrates, Theodoret, and Priscus the rhetorician; for the two former writers tell us, that Rougas lost his life in this incursion, in the manner we have related (8). On the other hand, it is manifest from Priscus (9), that there was no war between the Romans and Hunns when Rouas died. Besides, it is certain, that Rouas did not die in 425. the year in which the Hunns, under the conduct of Rougas, broke into Thrace; for Priscus tells us (10), that Plintha and Dionysius, who were sent with the character of ambassadors to Rouas, had been consuls; and Dionysius was not consul till the year 429.

- a mother Placidia, who governed during the minority of her son, is said to have retired to the court of Roas, king of the Hunns in Pannonia^a. Priscus tells us, that they settled in Pannonia in virtue of a treaty concluded with Aetius; but when, or on what occasion, this treaty was made, we are no-where informed. They were not in possession of that country in 427. for in that year Theodosius is said to have transplanted the Goths from Pannonia, which they had held ever since the year 377. when they first entered it, into Thrace, and to have reunited that province to the empire^b. On the other hand, they were masters of Pannonia, or at least held part of that province, in 432. for in that year Aetius, as we have hinted above, not thinking himself safe in the Roman dominions, is said to have taken refuge among the Hunns in Pannonia^c. In 437. Valentinian III. yielded, as we read in Cassiodorus^d, East Illyricum, which comprised Pannonia, to Theodosius II. which must be understood of the towns and fortified places, for these the Romans seem to have kept; and hence it is, that we find Attila, several years after the Hunns had been in possession of Pannonia, obliged to lay siege to Sirmium, the metropolis of that province^e. As the Hunns were chiefly indebted to Aetius for the lands they held in Pannonia, Roas their king not only received that able commander with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and friendship upon his being disgraced at the court of Placidia, and obliged to quit the Roman territories, but sent him back at the head of a powerful army of Hunns; which so terrified Placidia, that she restored Aetius to all his employments, and raised him to the rank of a patrician^f. In the year 435. a strong body of Hunns, marching through Germany into Gaul, joined Aetius against the Burgundians, who, having been allowed, in 413. to settle in that part of Gaul, which bordered on the Rhine, had revolted from the Romans, and ravaged Belgic Gaul. Aetius, having gained a complete victory over them, obliged Gondicarius their king to sue for peace; which he granted, but neither Gondicarius nor his people long enjoyed; for, in the beginning of the following year, he was cut off, with twenty thousand of his men, by the Hunns^g, at the instigation of Aetius, provoked, as some authors write^h, at their revolting anew; while others charge Aetius on this occasion with breach of faith, and the blackest treachery. Socrates writes, that the unhappy Burgundians, harassed with continual inroads by the Hunns, and no longer in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy, only three thousand of them being left alive, had recourse to Heaven; and repairing to a city in Gaul, there declared their desire of embracing the christian religion. The bishop of the place enjoined them a seven days fast, during which time he instructed them in the mysteries of our holy religion, and, having afterwards administered to them the sacrament of baptism, he sent them home full of courage and confidence. In this condition they marched against the Hunns; and finding them destitute of a leader, Uptar their king dying the night before, gorged with immoderate eating and drinking, they fell upon them, cut ten thousand of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous flight. Thenceforth the Burgundians, adds Socrates, continued steadfast in the christian religionⁱ. Notwithstanding this overthrow, the Hunns, either this year 436. or the following, as Idatius will have it^j, marched with a considerable body to the assistance of the Romans against the Goths, who had been allowed to settle in Aquitain, but, not satisfied with the countries allotted them, had made themselves masters of several neighbouring cities belonging to the Romans, and even laid siege to Narbonne. Against them the Romans called the Hunns to their assistance; who, being led by count Litorius, fell upon the Goths, busied in the siege, put them to flight, and entered the city, each horseman carrying with him two bushels of corn; which proved a very seasonable supply, the inhabitants being reduced to the utmost extremity^k. Idatius ascribes the raising of the siege to Aetius^l, probably because Litorius acted by his orders, he being commander in chief of all the armies of the western empire. The Hunns, who thus signalized themselves against the Goths, had, the year before, been employed by the Romans against the rebellious Armorici, whom they reduced. From Armorica they marched against the Goths of Aquitain; but, on their march, they plundered the province of Auvergne, though belonging to the Romans, whom they served as auxiliaries ^a. Literius, after having gained great advantages over the Goths, laid siege to Toulouse, their capital; but was in the end overcome in a pitched battle by Theodoric their king, and taken prisoner, most of his Hunns being cut in pieces, as we have related at length elsewhere ¹. It was probably during this war between the Romans and Goths in Caul, which lasted four years, that Gauferic, king of the Hunns, besieged the city of Bazas belonging to the Goths; but was obliged, by a miraculous apparition, to drop the enterprize, and retire, as the reader will find related at length by Gregory of Tours ². About this time two chiefs of the Hunns, Basic and Curfic, having numerous bodies of their nation under their command, which they had, for some time, employed against the Persians, came to Rome, and entered into the service of Valentinian III. emperor of the west ³.

Rougas, king of the Hunns, of whom we have spoken above, had been succeeded, in 425. by Rouas or Roas, who concluded a peace with Theodosius II. whereof one of the conditions was, that the emperor should pay him a yearly pension of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold ^m. But Rouas, resolving, a few years after the conclusion of this peace, to subdue the Boischi, and other nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, whom Theodosius had taken under his protection, dispatched one Elias to the court of Constantinople, threatening to make war upon Theodosius, if he lent them the least assistance. Hereupon Plintba and Dionysius, two generals of no small renown, were appointed to treat with the king of the Hunns, and divert him, if possible, from the resolution he had taken ⁿ. In the mean time Rouas died, ^b and was succeeded by his two nephews Bleda and Attila ^o. Bleda alone is named by Tyro Prosper ^p, and the first by count Marcellinus ^q; whence authors conclude, that he was the elder brother. Jornandes thinks, that to his share fell the provinces bordering on the western empire, and to Attila's the more eastern ^r. But we cannot help thinking Jornandes therein mistaken, since not to Bleda, but to Attila, the princess Honorina applied, as we shall relate anon, stirring him up to make war upon her brother Valentinian emperor of the west. News of the death of Rouas reaching Constantinople before the departure of the ambassadors, they were ordered to treat with the two princes his successors, and impowered to conclude with them a lasting peace; but in the room of Dionysius was sent the quaestor Epigenes, a man of great experience in negotiations. This change was made at the request of Plintba, who could not agree with Dionysius ^s. The ambassadors had an interview with the two princes in the neighbourhood of Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Massia, at a place where the Margus falls into that river, and, according to Sanfon, stands the present city of Galombea in Servia. The ambassadors were obliged to confer with them on horseback, the Hunns refusing to dismount ^t. The peace formerly concluded with Rouas was confirmed, but upon such conditions as evidently betrayed the deplorable situation of the empire, and an unaccountable pusillanimity in the Romans; for they agreed to deliver up to Attila and Bleda such Hunns as had taken, or should take for the future, refuge in the Roman dominions, and likewise to send back all the Roman captives, who had made their escape, or to pay eight pieces of gold for each of them. It was likewise stipulated, that instead of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold, the Romans should pay annually seven hundred; and that they should not lend the least assistance to any barbarous nation, when attacked by, or at war with, the Hunns ^u. In compliance with this shameful treaty, some princes of the royal blood of the Hunns, who had taken refuge among the Romans, were delivered up to Attila and Bleda, who caused them immediately to be crucified in a castle called Carfus, on the Danube, in Thrace ^v. Hence it is plain, that the Hunns had at this time some footing in Thrace. Attila and Bleda, being, in virtue of this treaty, at liberty to make what conquests they pleased, reduced several northern countries; inso-

Among the rest he subdued the Acatziri, who dwelt on the north coast of the Euxine sea, and were divided into several nations, each of them having a king of their own. a in those times, tells us, that the jealousy, which Couridachus, the eldest of the kings, conceived of the rest, gave Attila an opportunity of subduing them all. Theodosius II. in order to unite them, and induce them to renounce the friendship of Attila, and enter into an alliance with the empire, sent rich presents to each of them; but the person, whom the emperor employed on this occasion, not applying in the first place to Couridachus, that prince, thinking himself thereby highly injured, acquainted Attila with what had passed, inviting him at the same time to come and revenge the affront, that had been offered him. Attila laid hold of the opportunity; and having, without loss of time, sent a powerful army against the Acatziri, he soon reduced the other princes, but suffered Couridachus to enjoy his dominions undisturbed. Some time after, Attila invited him to his court; but Couridachus, alleging he could not bear the presence of so great a god, prudently declined complying with his invitation. The Hunn, pleased with this plea, never offered him the least violence; but gave the countries belonging to the other Acatzirian princes to his eldest son, named Ellac, appointing him king over all the nations bordering on the Euxine sea. The young prince, in going to take possession of his new kingdom, had the misfortune to break his right arm by a fall from his horse². Attila, having, with the assistance of his brother Bleda, brought under subjection all the northern nations, began, as his ambition knew no bounds, and his arms had been hitherto attended with wonderful success, to entertain thoughts of reducing, not only the Goths settled in Thrace, but the Romans themselves, and making himself master of the whole empire. With this view, having drawn together a very numerous and formidable army, without any regard to the above-mentioned treaty, he passed the Danube, and, entering Thrace, put all to fire and sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. At this time perhaps happened what we read in Priscus, viz. that, during a fair, the Hunns fell upon the Romans, killed a great many of them, and made themselves masters of a castle. The Romans complained of these hostilities; but the Hunns pretended, that the Romans had been the aggressors, the bishop of Margum having plundered, they said, their treasure; on which account they insisted upon his being delivered up to them, with all those of their nation, who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions. The bishop denied the charge; but the Hunns, who wanted only a pretence to quarrel with Theodosius, engaged at this time in two troublesome and expensive wars with the Persians and Vandals, without offering to prove it, entered the empire in an hostile manner³. Vorburgus supposes Attila to have been stirred up by Genferic king of the Vandals, powerfully attacked at this time by *Theodosius*⁴. Be that as it will, Attila and his brother Bleda took several towns and castles, which the Romans had built on the banks of the Danube, to awe the barbarians, and restrain them from entering the empire⁵. Among the other towns, they made themselves masters of Viminacium, a place of great importance on the Danube in Upper Mæsia. The Romans, alarmed at this sudden inundation of the Hunns, advised the emperor to comply with their request, and deliver up to them the bishop of Margum; which he no sooner understood, than he repaired to the enemy's camp, and found means to put them in possession of the city⁶. Attila, elated with this success, dispatched a messenger to Theodosius, requiring him to deliver up forthwith all the Hunns, who had taken refuge in the Roman territories, to pay him the arrears of his yearly pension, which had been stopt ever since he took up arms, and to send proper persons to settle what sums should be paid him for the future. He added, that there was no time to lose, since he could no longer restrain or moderate the ardor of his troops, thirsting after blood and spoil. Theodosius, though not a little terrified at these menaces, chose rather to try the chance of war, than abandon those, whom he had taken under his protection. He therefore only promised to send proper persons to Attila, with full powers to conclude a lasting peace⁷. Attila, not satisfied with this answer, pursued his ravages with more cruelty than ever, reducing several cities and strong-holds, viz. Retiarium, Singidunum, Naissus, and Sirmium, formerly the capital of all *Illyricum*⁸ (C). While Sirmium was besieged by the Hunns, Hunns, the bishop of the place delivered to one Constantius, by nation a Gaul, whom Aetius had formerly sent to Attila and Bleda, to serve them in quality of secretary, some sacred vessels, to be employed in redeeming him, if he outlived the siege, or others, if he perished in it. These vessels Constantius kept for himself, and pawned them with one Sylvanus, who sold them to the church. Some time after, Attila and Bleda having caused Constantius to be crucified, upon a suspicion that he betrayed them, Attila, pretending, that Sylvanus had stolen the vessels from Constantius, insisted upon his being delivered up to him, though Sylvanus offered to pay him the full value of them ^a. The emperor was to such a degree alarmed at the progress the two brothers made in Mæsia, Thrace, and Illyricum, that, not thinking himself safe at Constantinople, he withdrew into Asia, and continued there till the return of the troops he had sent against Genferic king of the Vandals, to whom he was forced to grant an advantageous peace ^b. As to the issue of this war, we are left in the dark. All we know is, that a peace was concluded between Attila and Theodosius; but upon what terms, we are no-where told. During this peace, Attila, no longer able to bear a partner in the kingdom, caused his brother Bleda to be assassinated, and, upon his death, obliged the whole nation of the Hunns to acknowledge him for their sovereign. He was obeyed by several other nations besides the Hunns. Jornandes names among the rest the Goths, meaning, without all doubt, those who chose to remain in their ancient seats, the Gepidæ, the Suevians, the Alans, the Heruli, the Sarmatians, the Semandrians, the Squiri, the Sattagares, the Rugians, and the Agatzirians ^c. He was sole master of all Scythia and Germany, which no one had ever held before him ^k. Priscus observes, that no prince ever subdued so many countries in so short a time, his authority being acknowledged by all the states and princes from the Rhine to the most northern borders of the Persian empire, which he had once some thoughts of invading, and might, according to Priscus, have easily reduced, and, with that addition of strength, made himself master of the whole Roman empire ^l. Priscus says, that the Romans declined giving him the title of king, and only styled him general of their armies, disguising the annual tribute they paid him with the specious name of salary; so great was their vanity, when their power was at the lowest ebb! They treated in the same manner the kings of the Goths and Burgundians, who, as they ^d were less powerful, thought themselves honoured with the title of general; but Attila rejected it with contempt, saying, That the emperors had slaves for their generals; whereas his generals were upon a level with the emperors themselves ^m. Jornandes writes, that when he entered Gaul in 451. he was attended by a troop of kings and princes, who stood trembling before him, without daring to utter a word; but always ready, at the least sign, to execute his commands with the utmost care and submission ⁿ. They referred all their differences to Attila, looked upon his decisions as oracles, and in every thing submitted to him as to the king of kings. Among these kings were two, to whom Attila paid a particular regard, viz. Valamir or Balamir, king of the Ostrogoths, who had remained among the Hunns, a man of a frank and open temper, and an enemy to all art and dissimulation; and Arderic, king of the Gepidæ, a prince of great penetration, and inviolably attached to Attila ^o. As to the person of Attila, Jornandes has left us the following portrait of him: he was black, low in stature, had a broad breast, a large head, a flat nose, and small eyes ^p. He was fond of war; but depended more upon his counsel, than his sword, employing not only force and menaces, but often craft and artifice, and sometimes low wiles, distant from it. Baudrand thinks Singidunum stood where stands the present city of Zenderin, once the capital of Serbia (11); but Sanfon places it somewhat higher on the Danube, and nearer Taurunum or Belgrade. Naissus gave birth to Constantine the Great, as was shewn elsewhere (12). It was intirely ruined by the Hunns; inasmuch that in 449. it was still destitute of inhabitants, there being only some sick people in the churches and hospitals. The neighbouring plains were even then covered with the bones of those, who had been killed in war (13). Some think Naissus stood where Nissa, a city of no small note in Serbia, stands; but Sanfon places it at some distance from the present Nissa. Sirmium, now Sirmish, stood in Lower Pannonia, and is famous in history, on account of the many laws enacted by the emperors while residing there, which have been collected by Jacobus Gothofredus in his typography of the cities mentioned in the Theodosian code. a and even lies, to obtain his end ⁹. He was constantly forming new projects, and vast designs, aspiring at nothing less than the monarchy of the universe. He was so elated with his great power and success, as not to hearken to reason, however plain and evident ^r. The pride and haughtiness of his mind appeared in all his actions and motions, in his gait, eyes, and looks; infomuch that no one could behold him, without concluding, that he was sent into the world to disturb it ^s. His presence, joined to the reputation he had acquired, struck all who beheld him with such awe and terror, that very few ventured to approach him, or speak to him ^t. However, we are told, that an ambassador sent to him by Valentinian III. appeared quite unconcerned before a man, who made the world tremble. As the ambassador had justice on his side, he was not afraid of his wild and menacing looks; but, in spite of the rage to which he abandoned himself, answered all his complaints, without betraying the least fear, leaving him at his departure calm, and capable of reason, though he had found him quite outrageous and untractable ^u. In his time was found a sword, thought to be the sword of Mars, and, on that account, held in great veneration by the antient kings of Scythia. It had been lost for some ages, and was said to have been found in the following manner: a cow-herd, observing one of his cows wounded in the foot, followed her bloody traces to the place where she had received the wound. There he discovered the edge of a sword appearing above ground, which the cow had trod upon. The sword he immediately dug up, and carried it to the king; who knowing it to be the famous sword of the god of war, received it with inexpressible joy, as portending, that he was to extend his conquests to the most distant limits of the world ^v. Priscus, from whom Jornandes copied this account, writes, that nothing gained Attila so much respect and veneration among the superstitious vulgar, as the discovery of this sword in his time ^x. The same author adds, that he was so blinded with pride, as to forget he was a man, and to suffer divine honours to be paid to him ^y. He was not however without some good qualities; for to those who referred their controversies to him he administered justice, according to the strictest rules of equity. He treated his subjects with great mildness, suffering them quietly to enjoy their estates, and levying only such sums, as they could easily pay ^z. In his dominions, says Sylvianus, no poor were seen oppressed with tributes and taxes ^a. He was ever ready to forgive those who submitted to him; and was never known to have abandoned such as he had once taken under his protection ^b. He was so far from placing his grandeur in pomp and shew, which serve only to dazzle the eyes of the senseless multitude, that, on the contrary, he affected an air of simplicity, and contempt for state and all kind of outward magnificence. dress was proper, but plain. He could not abide any gold, precious stones, or the least ornament on his sword, or the trappings of his horse, though in great request among the princes who attended him, and those of his court ^c. Priscus, who attended Maximinus, sent by the emperor Theodosius in 449. to the court of Attila with the character of ambassador, tells us, that they found him sitting in his tent on a wooden chair ^d. The same writer followed him several days journey beyond the Danube, till he reached one of his most magnificent palaces, which was all of wood, and stood in a large village, and in a country where no wood or stones were to be found ^e. Attila, soon after his arrival, invited Maximinus and Priscus to a grand entertainment, at which the guests were all served in silver and gold; but before the king was set a dish of plain meat, of which he ate but very sparingly, and on a trencher. He drank very little, and out of a wooden cup, while the rest were regaled with great variety of liquors in cups of gold, enriched with precious stones. During the banquet, something happened, which made all the company laugh; but Attila, as Priscus observed, maintained his usual gravity amidst their mirth, without the least smile, or change of countenance ^f. He had, according to the custom of his nation, many wives ^g, or, as Jornandes expresses it, troops of wives ^h, by whom he had almost a numberless issue. His favourite wife was one Crecha or Recha, who resided in his capital, and by whom he had his eldest son Ellac, with two others. Priscus, who carried her some presents, found her sitting on a bed amidst the women who attended her sitting on the ground, and working ⁱ. The same writer mentions two other wives of Attila ^k.

His children. Among his children are mentioned Ellac his eldest son, Dengizic, who perished in making war upon the Romans, and Hernac or Hernas, the youngest of them all ^l. Attila had an extraordinary esteem and affection for Ellac, whom he raised above all his brothers, made him in his life-time king of the Acatzirians, and appointed him his successor after his death; but the son did not long outlive the father, being killed in a battle soon after his accession to the crown ^m. Next to Ellac, Hernas was the father's favourite, the soothsayers having foretold, that he was to outlive all his brothers, and maintain the splendor and glory of his family. The first part of this supposed prediction proved true; but as to the other, Hernas was so far from maintaining the glory of his family, that, declining to engage in the war, which his brother Dengizic undertook against the empire, he contented himself with some lands given him by the emperor Marcian in Little Srythia ⁿ. This is all we find in the ancient writers concerning the celebrated Attila, and his numerous issue. The modern authors add many things, and among the rest, that, while Attila was in Gaul, a holy hermit told him, That he was the scourge of God, who had put the sword of justice into his hand, to punish the vices of the christians; but would snatch it from him as soon as they were reclaimed. They add, that Attila, after the famous defeat he received in Champagne, mindful of the saying of the hermit; added to his other titles that of flagellum Dei, or the scourge of God ^o. But what we read in the modern histories of Hungary concerning those early times, is, for the most part, either quite groundless, or highly improbable, or evidently fabulous.

He despises and insults the Roman emperors.

BUT to resume the thread of our history: Attila being, by the death of his brother Bleda, become sole master of so many nations, all ready to follow his banners, and execute his commands, he looked upon the Roman emperors with such contempt, that he is said to have sent, out of mere wantonness, two Goths, with the character of ambassadors, the one to Theodosius, and the other to Valentinian, with this haughty and insulting message; Attila, my master and yours, commands you to get ready a palace for his reception ^p. What answer they returned, we are no-where told. However, we do not find, that Attila openly broke the peace he had concluded with Theodosius, as we have related above, till the year 447. It is true, he often threatened him with war, but only in order to draw from him money, corn, provisions, and whatever else he stood in need of, the Romans, who trembled at the very name of Attila, complying, like so many slaves, with all his demands, that he might have no pretence to take arms against them. The ambassadors he sent to Constantinople returned always loaded with presents; insomuch that when he thought any of his subjects worthy of an extraordinary reward, he used to send them, under some pretence or other, with the character of ambassadors to Theodosius ^q. Attila continued thus trampling under foot the majesty of the empire, and insulting the weakness of Theodosius, till the year 447. when, no longer satisfied with the annual pension paid him by the emperor, and the rich presents yearly sent him, he declared war against the empire, upon what provocation we know not, probably without any; for Theodosius complied with all his demands, however unjust and arrogant. Thrace felt the calamities of this war the first; for Attila, entering it at the head of a formidable army, laid it waste, says Theophanes ^r, from the Euxine sea to the streights of Gallipoli and Sestos. They ravaged, says count Marcellinus, almost all Europe, laying every-where the towns and castles in ashes ^s. They advanced as far as the castle of Antbirc ^t, placed by Baudrand ^u between Selymbria and Constantinople. Jornandes writes, that Attila, with an army of Huns, Gepidæ, Goths, Alans, &c. commanded by their respective kings, ravaged all Illyricum, Thrace, both Dacia's, Mæsia, and Scythia ^v. They took and plundered Philippopolis in Thrace properly so called, Arcadiopolis in the province of Europe, Constantia, a city mentioned only by Theophanes, Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Mæsia, and extended their ravages to the streights of Thermopylæ, leading from Thessaly into Achaia ^w; so that they must have crossed Macedon and Thessaly. That they over-ran Macedon and Greece, is affirmed by a modern writer, who quotes Procopius ^y; but we have not been able to find that passage.

- a Seventy towns and upwards, belonging to the eastern empire, were taken and ransacked in this irruption of the Hunns and other barbarous nations subject to Attila^a. The generals Theodosius employed against them were, Aspar, Arcobindus, and Arnegisceles, whom Theopbanes names Argalijcles^b, the chronicle of Alexandria, Anargisceles^c, and Jornandes, Arnegisbles^d. What the other two did, we are no-where told; but Arnegisceles, who was magister militum in Mæsia and Thrace, engaged Attila in Lower Dacia, or rather Mæsia, on the banks of the Utiis, which falls into the Danube at a small distance from a city of the same name^e. The battle proved very bloody, Arnegisceles having, on this occasion, distinguished himself in a most eminent manner, and killed many of the enemy with his own hand; but, falling unluckily from his horse in the heat of the engagement, he was himself killed, and his army put to the rout^f. Jornandes supposes, that this battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Marcianopolis. Another battle was fought in the Cherjonesus, not far from Gallipoli, in which no better success attended the Romans than in the other^g; so that Theodosius, finding he could no longer withstand the power of the barbarians, dispatched the patrician Anatolius to Attila, and with him Vigilius, who was well acquainted with the language of the Hunns, charging them to conclude a peace upon any terms^h. A peace was accordingly agreed to on the following conditions: That the Romans should pay immediately to Attila six thousand pounds weight of gold, and every year two thousand; that they should send back to him all his deserters, and receive none for the future; that they should deliver up the Romans, who, being taken in war, had made their escape without paying their ransom, or pay for each of them twelve pounds weight of gold; and finally, that the Romans should send no ambassadors to Attila, till all the deserters and fugitives were delivered up. These conditions were highly opprobrious to the Roman name; but the despirited Romans chose rather to submit to any terms, than pursue the war with an enemy, whom they despaired of ever being able to conquer. One Scotia was sent by Attila to Constantinople, to hasten the execution of the treatyⁱ. Count Marcellinus writes, that, in 448. ambassadors came from Attila to Constantinople, to demand the money, which they had refused before^j, insinuating thereby, that Attila had rejected the conditions, which he afterwards agreed to. Pursuant to the articles of this treaty, six thousand pounds weight of gold were immediately sent to Attila, with the Hunns, who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, among whom were some princes, who had never submitted to Attila, and now chose rather to be killed by the Romans, than fall into his hands^k. The inhabitants and garrison of Asemontium, a castle of great strength in Thrace, had refused to open their gates to Attila, and repulsed him with great loss, when he attempted to storm the place; so that he was obliged to withdraw from before it. The barbarian, highly provoked at their gallant behaviour, which a generous enemy would have commended, after the conclusion of the peace, insisted upon their delivering up to him all the Roman captives, with the Hunns, who had taken refuge in the fortress, refusing to withdraw his troops, till such time as his demands were complied with. The inhabitants answered, That there were no Romans at all in the place, and only two Hunns; and this answer they confirmed with a solemn oath, not thinking perjury a crime, says our historian, when they could, by no other means, rescue many unhappy Romans from death or slavery^l. In virtue of this peace, Attila claimed the quiet possession of the countries he had conquered, that is, of the tract extending along the Danube from Pannonia to the city of Noves, placed by Sanfon in Lower Mæsia; but he afterwards relinquished this claim^m.
- Soon after the conclusion of the peace, that is, in the beginning of the year 449. Attila sent one Edecon to Constantinople, with the character of ambassador, attended by his chief secretary Orestes (D). As Edecon seemed to be greatly taken with the splendor

(D) Orestes was by birth a Roman, that is, he was born a subject of the empire. As he lived in Pannonia, perhaps his native country, when that province was yielded to the Hunns in 430. he hid himself among the troops of Attila, who, discovering him to be a man of parts, made him his secretary. His father, named Tatnia, bore likewise some considerable employment at the court of Attila. Orestes married the daughter of count Romulus, sent by Valentinian III. on an embassy to Attila in 449. and had by her a son, by Maes called Romulus Augustus, but, by all other historians, Romulus Augustulus.

splendor and magnificence of the court, and desirous to continue among the Romans, a the eunuch Cbrysaphus, the emperor's chief chamberlain, thinking him thereupon capable of committing, without remorse, the blackest crimes, proposed to him the assassinating of his prince; which he undertook to do, tempted by the promises of the eunuch. To this wicked attempt the emperor not only consented, but, in order to the more effectual execution of so scandalous an undertaking, dispatched a solemn embassy to Attila, strictly injoining those who attended the ambassadors, especially their interpreter Vigilius, a bold and enterprising man, to be assisting to Edecon in murdering Attila. Maximinus, who, in 422. had persuaded the Persians to conclude a peace with the Romans, was at the head of this embassy; but, as he was a man of an unblemished character, the emperor did not think fit to trust him with b the secret. The ambassadors no sooner arrived at the court of Attila, than Edecon, either apprehensive of the dangers attending such a desperate attempt, or deceiving the whole time the traitors with more refined treachery, discovered the whole to his prince; who immediately caused Vigilius to be seized, and sent back his secretary Orestes to Constantinople, with the purse in which the money had been brought, that was to have been paid to Edecon after the assassination, charging him to ask Theodosius and Cbrysaphus, whether they knew it; to reproach the emperor in the severest terms with such a black piece of treachery, and to insist upon his instantly delivering up to him Cbrysaphus, the author and contriver of the plot^a. But the emperor, unwilling to sacrifice the eunuch his chief favourite, instead of complying with Attila's demand, c dispatched the patrician Anatolius and Nomus to the king of the Hunns, charging them to do all that lay in their power to appease him. Anatolius, at that time comes domesticorum, that is, captain of the guards, had negotiated a peace with Attila the year before. As for Nomus, he was one of Cbrysaphus's particular friends, and generous to such a degree, that no one doubted, but, with his rich presents, he would soften Attila. It happened accordingly; for Attila not only promised to live in peace and amity with Theodosius, but relinquished his claim to the countries on the Roman side of the Danube, pardoned Cbrysaphus, set Vigilius at liberty, sent back many Roman captives without ransom, and dismissed the ambassadors loaded with presents. Thus Priscus, who was an eye-witness of what he relates, having attended Maximinus to the court of Attila. The same author writes, that Constantius, secretary to Attila, d being sent ambassador to the court of Constantinople, promised to befriend the Romans, and do all that lay in his power to divert his master from breaking anew into the empire, provided Theodosius procured him some rich heiress in marriage. Hereupon the emperor promised him the daughter of Saturninus, whom Eudoxia had caused to be put to death in 444. after he had been for some years comes domesticorum, or captain of the guards. But Zeno, commander in chief of all the emperor's forces, without any regard to the word or honour of his prince, took her by force out of the castle, where she was kept, and gave her in marriage to a friend of his, named Rufus. Of this Constantius complained to Attila, and Attila to Maximinus, who was then at his court, telling him, that Constantius must either have the daughter of Saturninus, e or another of equal wealth; and that it was a shameful thing in a prince to fail of his word, charging him at the same time to tell his master from him, that he was amazed to find he had thus gone back from his word, and forfeited his honour; that, from his not punishing Zeno, he concluded that general to have been countenanced by him in what he had done; but if he was therein mistaken, if Theodosius durst not resent such insults from his own subjects, he was ready to teach them the respect, submission and obedience they owed their sovereign. Theodosius, piqued with this reproach, caused the estate, not of Zeno, whom he was afraid to provoke, but of Saturninus, to be confiscated, thinking to cover his weakness with this piece of injustice P.

- a THE following year 450. Theodosius II. died, and was succeeded by Marcian; which Attila no sooner understood, than he dispatched ambassadors to the new emperor, demanding the annual pension paid him by the deceased prince. Marcian, not thinking himself bound by the shameful treaty, which his predecessor had concluded with the barbarians, dismissed the ambassadors with this answer, That Theodosius was no more; and as for himself, he had gold for his friends, and steel for his enemies. Attila, provoked at this answer, began to draw together his troops, in order to break into the empire. Hereupon Marcian, who had found the affairs of the empire in a most deplorable condition, to gain time, sent a solemn embassy to Attila, at the head of which was Apollonius, a general of no small renown, perhaps the same person to whom Theodoret wrote his seventy-third and three hundred and third letter ⁴. Attila refused to pay him the usual pension.
- b But the king of the Huns, understanding he had not brought with him the usual pension, would neither speak to him, nor see him. However, he commanded him, on pain of death, to convey to him the presents, which the emperor had sent him. To this message Apollonius answered, That the king needed not demand, with menaces, things which he might have when he pleased, either as presents, if he was determined to live in amity with the Romans, or as spoils, if, forgetful of the right of nations, he thought fit to use violence with an ambassador. Hereupon Attila, chusing rather to lose the presents, than declare himself a friend to the Romans, or offer the least violence to an ambassador, ordered him to quit his dominions, and return home ⁵.
- c However, not thinking it adviseable at that juncture to engage in a war with Marcian, and, on the other hand, impatient of peace, he resolved to turn his arms against the western empire, then governed by Valentinian III. a weak and unwarlike prince. Roua, uncle to Attila, had concluded a peace with Valentinian a little before his death, that is, about the year 433. as we have related above. Attila, who succeeded him, had no sooner taken possession of the crown, than he was, with repeated letters and messages, pressed by Justa Grata Honoria, Valentinian's own sister, to break the peace, and invade the western empire. Honoria had been honoured with the title of Augusta to divert her from marrying, there being, at that time, no man in the whole empire, whose rank answered her high station; for it was thought proper, that she should continue unmarried, as the sisters of Theodosius II. had done. But celibacy had been their choice; whereas Honoria had no inclination to lead a single life, but was forced to it, and closely watched by Valentinian's orders, or rather by her mother Placidia's ⁶. The young princess therefore, no longer able to bear this restraint, dispatched privately one of her eunuchs to Attila, pressing him to enter Italy at the head of a powerful army, and marry her; nay, she sent him, either at this time or afterwards, a ring, as a pledge of her fidelity ⁷. She was then about sixteen or seventeen, being born before her brother Valentinian in 417. or 418. Attila, who had then just begun to reign, not caring to engage in this enterprize, Honoria suffered herself to be debauched by one of her own domestics, named Eugenius. Placidia no sooner perceived her with child, than she caused her to be shut up in a private house, and soon after sent her to Theodosius at Constantinople ⁸. This happened in 434. three years before Valentinian married the daughter of Theodosius ⁹. Valesius writes, that Valentinian caused Eugenius to be put to death, which is highly probable, but, we may venture to say, not affirmed by any of the ancients. The same author maintains, that Honoria was not sent to Constantinople, and, what is surprising, quotes Jornandes, who says in express terms she was ¹⁰. Honoria continued pressing Attila to make war upon her brother; but he, it seems, not giving ear to her solicitations, prayers, and intreaties, lived in peace with Valentinian till the year 449. We have several proofs of a good understanding and friendly correspondence between him and Aetius, commander in chief of Valentinian's armies; for that general sent to Attila and Bleda a Gaul, by name Constantius, to serve them in quality of secretary; but he being suspected of treachery, and thereupon put to death, Aetius sent them for the same office another of the same name, but by birth an Italian ¹¹. After the year 444. Attila sent as a present to Aetius a famous mimic and buffoon, named Zercon, who was a native of Mauritania, and strangely deformed ¹². About the year 448. some misunderstanding arose between Attila and Valentinian, on account of the sacred vessels, of which we have spoken above. To convince Attila of the injustice of his claim, were sent to his court count Romulus, Promotus governor of Noricum, and Romanus, who ^a had a command in the army. Romulus was a native of Petavium in Noricum, a man of great address, and experience in negotiations, and father-in-law to Orestes, at that time Attila's chief secretary ^b. An anonymous writer, published by Valesius with the works of Ammianus Marcellinus, tells us, that Orestes attended Attila into Italy ^c. If what that author writes be true, Attila must have made an irruption into Italy, which no other historian has taken notice of, it being certain Orestes had left the service of Attila before that, which we shall speak of anon, and which is the only one known to the writers, who have reached our times (E). The ambassadors from Valentinian met, at the court of Attila, Maximinus, sent thither by Theodosius ; but, tho' they had evidently justice on their side, the only answer they could get from Attila was, that ^b he must have the vessels, or Sylvanus must be delivered up to him, otherwise he was resolved to declare war. However, he paid the ambassadors great respect, and entertained them at his table with those of Theodosius ^d. He was, without all doubt, himself well apprised of the injustice of his demand ; but, being determined to make war, wanted a pretence to begin it. He had received in 448. and entertained at his court, one Eudoxus, by profession a physician, a man of great address, but of a restless temper, who, being accused of stirring up the Bagaudæ to take arms against the empire, had made his escape, and found a sanctuary amongst the Hunns ^e. But as the emperor, dreading above all things a war with Attila, took no notice of his thus protecting a traitor and fugitive, recourse was had to a new claim, which the king of ^c the Hunns was very sure would produce a war. We have observed above, that Honorina, the emperor's sister, had maintained a private correspondence with Attila, and even sent him a ring. Attila therefore dispatched a solemn embassy to Valentinian, demanding his sister Honorina, whom he pretended to be his wife, and, with her, half the western empire, as belonging of right to her. The ambassadors brought with them the ring, which she had sent him, to convince the emperor of their marriage ^f ; and at the same time complained, in their master's name, of the ill usage she met with ; adding, that he was both able and resolved to revenge it. Valentinian answered, That his sister was already married ; and that, among the Romans, women had no right to the crown, nor to any part of the empire ^g. Of this marriage no ^d mention is made by any other writer, nor indeed of Honorina, since the year 434. when she was sent to Constantinople. She was probably, upon the death of Theodosius, sent back to her brother Valentinian, and received from him some harsh treatment ; perhaps he obliged her to marry a person she disliked. Be that as it will, Valentinian, having dismissed the ambassadors with the answer related above, thought it advisable to send a solemn embassy to Attila, in order to convince him, if possible, of the injustice of his claim. The persons chosen for this purpose were Cassiodorus, father to the writer of that name, the emperor's chief secretary, and Carpilio, the son of Aetius. Cassiodorus, who was a man of great eloquence, address, and experience in negotiations, confuted so evidently and fully all the frivolous pretences alleged by ^e Attila to justify his breaking with Valentinian, that, in the end, he seemed inclined to renew the peace, which it was no ways his interest to grant, says Cassiodorus ^h, to so rich an empire, ready to become his prey. A peace was accordingly concluded, to the great surprize of Valentinian, and the ambassadors themselves, by whom it was negotiated. It was however but a sham peace, the better to deceive the unwary Romans, and fall upon them unawares. It was likewise with this view, that he sent soon after ambassadors to Valentinian, with a very friendly, in appearance, and obliging letter, assuring him, that he had no reason to be alarmed at his warlike preparations, since they were designed against Theodoric, king of the Visigoths in Langue- ^f doc (F) ; that, as to the Romans, he should ever look upon them as his friends, pro-

(E) Some authors think, that Jornandes mentions this irruption among the other transactions of the year 434. in the following words: Cumque veniente Attila totum suum nequirit explere (16). But these words may equally import, that Honorina, of whom Jornandes speaks in that passage, could not prevail upon Attila to come and marry her; and that she could not marry him, though he was come.

(F) Genferic, king of the Vandals, having sent for the daughter of Theodoric, and married her to Hermeric his eldest son, treated her soon after with his usual cruelty, causing her nose to be cut off, upon a vided they did not espouse the cause of his enemy ⁱ. At the same time he wrote to Theodoric, putting him in mind of the cruel war the Romans had made upon him about ten years, and pressing him to renounce their alliance ^k. Thus, joining craft to force, he endeavoured to set the Goths and Romans at variance, the more easily to crush them both ^l.

DURING these negotiations, he assembled one of the most powerful and formidable armies we find mentioned in history. He had, as we have observed above, people of many different nations among his troops, and a great number of kings at his devotion. Among the kings the most powerful were, Ardaric king of the Gepidæ, and Valamir king of the Ostrogoths ^m. His army consisted of the following nations, viz.

b Hunns, Gepidæ, Ostrogoths, Rugians, Gelonians, Squiri, Burgundians, Bellonotes, Neurians, Basternæ, Turingians, Bructerians, Franks dwelling on the Neckar, Marcomans, Suevians, Quadians, Heruli, Turcilingians, and, in short, of all the northern barbarians, to the number of five, or, as others write, seven hundred thousand men ⁿ. With this formidable host he set out from Scythia in the depth of winter, and, bending his march through Germany, never halted till he reached the banks of the Rhine. There the Franks, who still dwelt in great numbers on the other side of that river, attempted to stop him; but they were, at that time, unluckily divided among themselves, the whole nation being rent into two factions or parties, by the two sons of Clodion quarrelling about the succession to their father's dominions. The elder brother had implored the assistance of the Hunns; and the younger, probably Merouée, was supported by Atius, who had, in a manner, adopted him for his son ^o. Being thus disunited, they were easily overcome; and on this occasion probably happened what we read in Fredigaire, viz. that Childeric, the son of Merouée, was taken prisoner by the Hunns, with his mother, and carried into captivity, but rescued out of their hands by the courage and fidelity of a Frank, named Wiomaud ^p. We are nowhere told what Attila did, after his victory over the Franks, in favour of Clodion's eldest son, whose cause he had espoused. The king of the Hunns, having now no enemy to oppose him (for the Romans, giving credit to his deceitful protestations, looked upon him as a friend) caused whole forests to be cut down, in order to build

d boats, with which the Rhine in a short time was covered ^q. He passed that river without opposition in the beginning, as is supposed, of the year 451 ^r, giving out, that his design was to make war upon the Visigoths; that he was determined to live in friendship with the Romans; and that he only wanted to cross Gaul, and pass the Loire at Orleans, in order to fall upon his enemies the Goths in Guyenne and Languedoc ^s. Being therefore looked upon as a friend by the credulous and unwary Romans, several cities opened their gates to him; but his men behaving in the cities, that had received them, more like enemies than friends, the other towns refused to admit them ^t. Hereupon Attila, pulling off the mask, besieged, took by storm, and plundered, many places in Gaul ^u. The cities that suffered most on this occasion, were Tongres ^w (G), a groundless suspicion, that she designed to poison him, and sending her back thus dishonoured to her father. As he did not doubt but Theodoric would resent this affront, he resolved to be before-hand with him; and therefore sent ambassadors, with rich presents, to court the friendship of Attila, and persuade him to fall upon Theodoric. Hence Attila, to deceive the Romans, gave out, that the warlike preparations, which were carrying on throughout his dominions, were designed against Theodoric (17). This storm, it seems, began to be apprehended in 449. for, in that year, St. Leo desired to be excused from assisting at the council of Ephesus, alleging the uncertain and wavering state of affairs (18).

(G) Gregory of Tours writes, that, when it was first heard in Gaul, that Attila's design was to pass through that country, the holy bishop of Tongres, named Aravacus or Arvacus, went to visit the holy places at Rome, where, with fervent prayers, and many tears, he begged Heaven to avert the calamities, that threatened his flock, and all Gaul. But St. Peter, appearing to him, told him, that the Almighty had, in his justice, immutably decreed, that the Hunns should come into Gaul, and ravage the whole country; but as for him, he should not live to see the miseries of his distressed flock. With this answer he returned to Tongres, and thence repaired to Mastricht, where he died soon after (19). The credulity of this excellent writer is the effect of his great piety, which often gets the better of his good sense and understanding.

The barbarians attacked the town of Laon; but were repulsed with great slaughter ^b. At Mentz they arrived the night preceding the solemnity of Easter, which, in 451. fell on the eighth of April; and having soon forced the gates, and entered the city sword in hand, they made a dreadful havock of the inhabitants, massacred the priests at the altars, and set fire to the place, which soon reduced all the private and public buildings to ashes ^c, sparing only the chapel of St. Stephen, if Gregory of Tours is to be credited, where some reliques of that saint were lodged ^d. Attila, thus putting all to fire and sword, arrived at length before Orleans, which he immediately invested, the inhabitants refusing to admit him into the city. In the mean time Aetius, arriving from Italy at Arles, took care to encourage, by frequent messengers, the inhabitants and garrison of Orleans to make a vigorous defence, assuring them, that, in a short time, he would march to their assistance. He had brought with him but a small number of troops, not doubting but the Visigoths would join the Romans in opposing the furious torrent, which threatened both nations alike; but finding the Visigoths resolved to wait for the enemy in their own country, he used all kinds of arguments, in order to persuade ^e them to change that resolution, sending to them for that purpose Avitus, who was raised to the imperial dignity a few years after ^e. The epitomizer of Idatius, supposed to have lived in the time of Charlemagne ^f, tells us, that, on this occasion, the holy bishop of Orleans, St. Agnan, was likewise sent by Aetius to Theodoric king of the Visigoths ^g. Be that as it will, Theodoric yielded at length to the reasons alleged by the deputies of Aetius, which the reader will find in Jornandes ^h, promising to join the Romans with all his forces against the common enemy. This change of measures in the king was highly acceptable both to the nobility and his people, who received the news of it with loud acclamations of joy, occasioned by the eager desire they had to try their strength with the Hunns ⁱ (H). In the mean time Aetius assembled what troops he could in Gaul, which were reinforced by the powerful succours brought him by Theodoric, who commanded them in person, attended by his eldest and second sons, Thorismund and Theodoric ^k. Besides the Visigoths, the following nations are mentioned among the troops, that composed the army of Aetius, viz. the Franks, under the conduct of their king Merouée, the Sarmatians, Burgundians, Saxons, Armoricans, the Lisians, dwelling on the banks of the Lis in Flanders ^l, the Reverins or Ripuarins, inhabiting the banks of the Rhine towards Cologne, the Ibrians, by Valesius called Brions and Breons, and placed by him in Vindelicia, now Suabia and Bavaria ^m, and several other nations of Celtic Gaul and Germany, whom the Romans had formerly commanded as their subjects, but were now glad to reckon among ^e their auxiliaries and allies ⁿ. Thus Aetius assembled an army not much inferior in number, according to Prosper, to that of Attila ^o.

WHILE Aetius was thus busied in assembling his troops, Attila pursued the siege of Orleans with great fury, battering the walls night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines, till at length he became master of the place. Valesius is of opinion, that the holy bishop Agnan caused the gates to be opened, lest the city should be taken by assault, and plundered ^p. And Gregory of Tours seems to insinuate, that it was not taken by storm; for he writes, that the enemy entered the place, when the

(H) The epitomizer of Idatius, who often adds to his author something of his own, tells us, that Aetius offered half Gaul to Theodoric, on condition he joined him against the Hunns; and that, having by this means engaged him to side with the Romans, he made the same offer to Attila, provided he made war upon Theodoric (20). But this seems to us altogether incredible.

- a walls were shaken with the battering-rams, and ready to fall, no breach being then made, according to that writer. On the other hand, the word irruptio, used by Apollinaris Sidonius, and signifying a violent breaking or rushing in, imports, that the town was taken by storm. Be that as it will, the Hunns were scarce entered, when Actius and Theodoric, arriving with all their forces, fell unexpectedly upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged them to retire with much precipitation out of the town. Many of them threw themselves into the Loire, and perished there; a plain proof, that they had passed that river, and invested the town on the south side; which has been denied by some modern writers. Theopha-
b epitomizer of Idatius, he evidently confounds this encounter with the great battle of Chalons. For this success, Actius is by Apollinaris Sidonius styled the deliverer of the Loire. He is supposed to have gained it on the fourteenth of June, that day being marked in an ancient martyrology of Orleans as a day of general thanksgiving, for the happy deliverance of the city out of the hands of its cruel enemies. Attila, being obliged to abandon Orleans, retired with his army towards the Rhine; and having passed Troyes, he halted in the plains of Chalons (1), chusing that place as most advantageous for his Hunns, who were all horse, to engage in; for he was well apprised, that Actius, who followed him close, would come up with him before he could repass the Rhine. LE MAIRE, antiq. d'Orléans, p. 178.

(1) This memorable battle was fought in the plains of Mauriac, say some, in the plains of Catalaunum or Chalons, say others (21); but, to reconcile them, we are only to suppose the same plain to have been known by these two different names; a very natural supposition, and founded on the authority of Jornandes, who tells us in express terms, that the Catalaunici were also called the Mauriaci fields; Convenitur in campos Catalaunicos, says he, qui & Mauriaci nominantur (22). However, Valesius distinguishes these two plains; and, to reconcile the authors, supposes two battles to have been fought, the one, not decisive, in the plains of Mauriac, that is, near Meri on the Seine, in the diocese of Troyes, and the other, which proved decisive, in the neighbourhood of Catalaunum or Chalons (23). But those who speak of the battle fought in the plains of Mauriac, suppose it to have been decisive, and to have put an end to the war, in the same manner as those do, who describe the battle of Chalons. As for the name of Mauriac, Valesius supposes Meri upon the Seine, in the diocese of Troyes, to have been antiently so called, and quotes Fredegaire in favour of this supposition (24). But Blundel takes the small village of Heiz le Maun on the river Delir, in the diocese of Chalons, to be the antient Mauriac. Papirius Masson places the Mauriac fields about three leagues from Chalons, near a place called Noire Dame de l'Épine, or Our Lady of the Thorn (25). He is therein followed by Cointius (26), and by Sanfon, in his maps of the dioceses of Chalons and Rheims. As for those, who will have this battle to have been fought beyond Orleans at Mauriac in Auvergne, or in the neighbourhood of Toulouse, in a district held at that time, as they suppose, by the Catalaunians or Catalans of Spain, though they agree perhaps therein with Olaus, a modern writer, of no authority in himself, they disagree with Gregory of Tours, and all those who write, that Actius delivered Orleans, namely, with Apollinaris Sidonius, whom we may call an unquestionable and eye-witness. That author tells us in express terms, that Attila took Orleans by storm; but was driven out by Actius, before he had time to plunder it, and obliged to return back, directing his march towards the Rhine. He did not therefore, according to that writer, penetrate so far into Gaul as Auvergne or Languedoc; and consequently the battle could not be fought at Mauriac in Auvergne, or near Toulouse in Languedoc. Jornandes writes, that Thorismond, upon the death of his father, who was killed in the Catalaunici fields, entered Toulouse vested with royal majesty; Thoris-mundo ergo, patre mortuo in campis Catalaunicis, ubi & pugnaverat, regia majestate subreptus Tolosam ingreditur (27). From these words some conclude the battle to have been fought in the neighbourhood of Toulouse. But Jornandes does not say, that Thorismond made his entry into Toulouse the same day his father was killed, or the day following; nay, he confines it to no certain time, but evidently supposes it not to have happened immediately after the battle; for he tells us, that, after the battle, Actius advised Thorismond to return home, ut ad sedes proprias remearet. The battle therefore was not fought in the territories of the Goths, but at a considerable distance from Toulouse. The young prince, following the advice of Actius, returned to Gaul; redit ad Gallias, says Jornandes, who, by Gaul, could only mean Celtic Gaul, called also Gallia Lugdunensis; so that Thorismond, in marching to the field of battle, had crossed Celtic, and entered Belgic Gaul, the latter of which belongs the diocese of Chalons. Hence Scaliger thinks those writers, who will have Attila to have been defeated near Toulouse, to be guilty of a mistake altogether childish, how able soever they may be in other respects. The plains of Chalons, where the two armies engaged, were, according to Jornandes (28), one hundred leagues in length, and seventy in breadth; but that author allows only fifteen hundred paces to each league. His allowing that extent to the plains of Chalons, gives us room to believe, that he comprised, under that name, all the champain country, whence the province was afterwards called Champagne, a name by which it was well known so early as the sixth century (29). On the same plain of Chalons was fought, in 273, a great battle between the emperor Aurelian and the usurper Tetricus.

waiting for him in those vast plains, resolved, notwithstanding the enemy's advantageous situation, to advance, and put the whole to the issue of a battle. As he arrived late at night in the plains where Attila was encamped, the Gepidæ, who served under Attila, and the Franks, who followed Aetius, meeting in the dark, engaged with such fury, that, on both sides, above fifteen thousand men were left dead upon the spot^a. We are told, that Attila, desirous to know before-hand the issue of the approaching battle, consulted his aruspices, who, after having narrowly examined the entrails of the beasts offered in sacrifice, and, according to their custom, scraped their bones, returned the following answer: That the event would not prove favourable to him; but, on the enemy's side, their chief man would fall in the engagement. This answer greatly encouraged Attila, who did not in the least doubt, but by the chief man was meant Aetius, whose death he was glad to purchase at any rate, since he looked upon that great commander as the only person in the whole empire capable of defeating his vast designs^b. He therefore resolved to give battle, but not to engage till the day was far spent, that night coming on, might prevent the Romans from pursuing the victory^c. He placed himself in the centre, with the flower of his army around him, as if his chief care had been, says Jornandes^d, to preserve himself, and not to conquer. In the wings were posted the Ostrogoths, the Gepidæ, and the other nations, that followed his banner^e. On the other hand, Aetius placed the Romans, whom he commanded himself, in the left wing, the Visigoths, under the command of Theodoric and his son Thorismund, in the right, and the Alans, with their king Saugiban (K), and probably the Franks, and other auxiliaries, with their respective leaders, in the centre. Thus were those spacious plains quite covered with infinite numbers of combatants, the flower of innumerable nations, ready, says Jornandes, to destroy each other, without any private pique or quarrel, but merely in compliance with the ambition of one man, which, in them, supplied the room of the most mortal hatred, and irreconcilable enmity. What pity, continues our historian, that, by the passion and folly of one man, should perish, in a few hours, what nature has produced in many years^f! Between the two armies was an eminence of an easy ascent, which both parties strove to seize; but Aetius and Thorismund, having possessed themselves of it the first, repulsed without much ado the Hunns, who attempted to dislodge them. This advantage, gained by the Romans in the very beginning of the engagement, raised their courage, and greatly damped the ardour of the enemy; which Attila observing, strove to re-animate his men by a speech, which the reader will find in Jornandes^g, who made it for him. The battle began about four in the afternoon, and is by all writers reckoned one of the most bloody and obstinate engagements mentioned in history. A small brook, that crossed the plain, swelled, says Jornandes^h, to a torrent, by the great quantity of blood that was shed. Aetius pressed the Hunns on his side; and Thorismund never ceased harassing them from the eminence he had seized. The Goths, leaving the Alans behind, charged the enemy with no less vigour than the Romans had done. Theodoric, notwithstanding his great age, flew from rank to rank, encouraging his men; but falling unluckily from his horse, he was, according to some, trod to death by his own men. Others write, that he was killed with a dart by a Goth, named Andagus, who fought under Attila, and was descended from the Amali, that is, from the royal family of the *Goths*ⁱ. The Goths, though no longer animated by the presence of their king, pressed the Hunns so

(K) Valesius takes Saugiban to be the same person with Sambida, chief of the Alans, on whom Aetius bestowed, about the year 440. as Tiro Prosper informs us, some lands, that lay uncultivated in the Valentinois (30). Others will have him to be the successor of Ecaric, chief of another body of Alans, whom Aetius placed on the banks of the Loire in 447. at a small distance from Armorica, in order to awe the Armoricans, and put a stop to their incursions (31). Saugiban was in Orleans when Attila entered Gaul, having obtained leave to reside there; but, as the barbarians drew near that city, he was ordered to quit it, upon a report, that he designed to deliver it up to them (32). All these Alans had entered Gaul in 406. In the battle Aetius, distrusting Saugiban, placed him in the centre, that, being surrounded by the Romans and Visigoths, he might have no opportunity, says Jornandes (33), of putting in execution the design of which he was suspected.

- a warmly, that Attila, no longer able to withstand them, retired in the end, with those who surrounded him, to his camp, which he barricaded with all the carts and waggons of his army. It being night before the battle was ended, Thorismond, coming down from his eminence to rejoin his own people, found himself entangled among the carts and waggons of the enemy, who fell upon him with great fury. On this occasion he received a wound on the head, and was thrown from his horse; but other Goths flying to his assistance, he was rescued from the danger, and brought back to his camp. As for Actius, he continued the engagement, till night coming on, the enemy withdrew to their camp, when he likewise retired, not daring to pursue them, as not knowing whether the Goths were conquerors, or conquered. The
- b new day discovered a dreadful sight, those vast plains almost quite covered with dead bodies; but Attila, who, they expected, would renew the engagement at break of day, kept close in his camp, and was resolved, as the Romans were afterwards informed, to burn himself alive, if they had forced it, rather than suffer himself to be taken prisoner. He caused a great noise to be made in his camp, and the trumpets every-where to sound, as if he were upon the point of sallying out, and falling upon the Romans; but did not however stir from his entrenchments. Hence the Romans concluded, that he was conquered, and that his loss was great. However, not thinking it advisable to attack him in his camp, as he had but a small quantity of provisions, they resolved to keep him closely blocked up^h. He declines a second engagement.
- c In the mean time the Goths, missing their king, sought him on all sides, and at last found him among the dead. His body was carried, in the sight of the Hunns, with the greatest solemnity, and all possible marks of honour, from the field of battle to the camp, where the last duties were paid him, in the midst of which his son Thorismond was proclaimed king, and, in that quality, he ended the ceremonyⁱ. Such is the account the antients give us of this famous action, in which near three hundred thousand men were killed, according to Idatius, on both sides, and two hundred and fifty-two thousand, according to the Amsterdam edition of Jornandes in 1655. including those who fell the night before the battle in the encounter between the Franks and the Gepidæ. Both armies suffered extremely, and the Romans challenged the
- d victory for no other reason, but because Attila kept in his camp the next day, and withdrew afterwards to his own country, without daring to venture a second engagement^k. Cassiodorus, and Theodoric king of Italy, own, that, in this action, Actius had the chief command; but ascribe the victory to the courage and bravery of the Goths^l. Victor Tunniensis extols the courage of the Goths, without so much as mentioning Actius; and Gregory of Tours will have the success of that day to be owing to the prayers of St. Agnan bishop of Orleans^m. As to the account of this battle given by the continuator of *Idatius*ⁿ, Valesius looks upon it as altogether fabulous. Thorismond, greatly affected with the death of his father, resolved to revenge it on the Hunns, and, at the head of his Goths, attack them in their camp; but having first
- e consulted Actius, whose known wisdom, and long experience, gave great weight to his counsels, that general advised him to return home without delay, and take possession of his father's dominions, lest his brothers, seizing on the deceased king's treasures, should raise disturbances in his absence, and give rise to a civil war. This advice Actius gave with a political view, fearing, that if the Hunns were utterly extirpated, the Goths, no longer awed by so formidable a power, might prove a no less troublesome enemy to the empire, than those barbarians. However, Thorismond, not suspecting in the least the zeal and sincerity of Actius, readily embraced his advice, and returned home^o. Thus, giving way to groundless suspicions, we often let slip the most favourable opportunities, being wholly taken up in guarding against imaginary evils. The continuator of Idatius tells us, that Actius, going in the night to the enemy's camp, assured Attila, that the Roman army had been reinforced with a very considerable number of Visigoths, in order to oblige him to retire with more haste, and even to purchase with money a safe retreat. By a like artifice he persuaded Thorismond, according to the same writer, to retire, and pay him a considerable sum. He adds, that Thorismond, finding afterwards he had been imposed upon by Actius, sent to challenge the promise he had made him, which was to yield to him half Gaul, if he drove out Attila; but Actius, in lieu of the promised dominions, only sent him a golden dish, weighing five hundred pounds, and enriched with precious stones ^v. But to such accounts we can give no credit, upon the bare testimony of a writer, whose authority is of no great weight with us. Tborismond was no sooner gone, than Aetius, by the same artifice, persuaded Merouée, king of the Franks, whose brother aspired at the crown, to withdraw his troops, and return home. Thus he got for himself the spoils that were left in the field of battle ^q.

WHEN Attila was first told, that the Visigoths were retired, he imagined it to be only a feint, in order to surprise him, and therefore kept for some time close in his camp; but being afterwards informed of the truth, he returned courage, says Jornandes ^r, and began to hope for victory. However, he made no attempt, but retired quietly to the Rhine, with a small number of troops, says Gregory of Tours ^s; and truly his army must have been greatly weakened, since he did not offer to attack Aetius even after the departure of the Goths and Franks. Valesius concludes from hence, that the army he led into Gaul, did not consist, as Jornandes seems to insinuate ^t, of five hundred thousand men ^u. Jornandes perhaps only meant, that his troops amounted to that number, and not that he marched them all into Gaul. He had, no doubt, left a considerable number of his forces in the countries he had conquered, to awe the people, and garrison his forts and strong-holds. Besides, it is certain, that this very year 451. a body of Hunns broke into Illyricum, and ravaged that province; but were in the end driven out by Ardaburius, who was thereupon appointed by Marcian emperor of the east, commander in chief of all his forces ^w. The anonymous author of the Altissiodorensian chronology tells us, that Aetius, after the engagement, returned to Italy, leaving Attila to commit what ravages he pleased in Gaul ^x. This seems highly improbable, the more as that writer supposes the city of Mentz to have been destroyed on this occasion; whereas all other authors speak of the ruin of that city as happening before the siege of Orleans. Such was the issue of Attila's expedition into Gaul, so much spoken of by the writers of those times. The ravages he committed there were, no doubt, very great; but posterity has not a little increased them, charging Attila and his Hunns with all the devastations, that were afterwards committed by the Franks, the Alemans, and other barbarous nations ^y. It was a long time before the towns he had ruined were rebuilt, or repeopled; nay, so great was the consternation of the inhabitants, that Lusus, the famous bishop of Troyes, returning to his see, after he had attended Attila to the banks of the Rhine, found the city quite abandoned, though Attila, out of regard to him, had spared it; inasmuch that he was obliged to retire to a mountain, named Latisco, about fifteen leagues from Troyes, where he endeavoured to persuade his people, who had taken refuge there, to return to their antient habitations; but, not being able to remove their fears, after he had continued two years among them, he left them, and retired to Mascon ^z. Aetius pursued Attila as far as the Rhine; but never offered to attack him, thinking it, as most authors conjecture, impolitic to weaken him too much, lest he should no longer be in a condition to awe the Franks and Goths, and divert them from raising disturbances in the empire.

Attila, rather enraged than disheartened at the disappointment he had met with, and the loss he had sustained in Gaul, resolved to make an irruption into Italy, where he hoped to find more booty, and less opposition, there being no Goths, Franks, Alans, or Burgundians there to oppose him. Pursuant to this resolution, having reinforced his army with powerful supplies sent him out of Scythia, he left Pannonia; and finding the passes of the Alps unguarded, as no hostilities were expected on that side, he entered Italy in the latter end of the year 451. as Jornandes and Idatius seem to insinuate ^a, or, what is more probable, in the beginning of the following year 452. It is impossible to express the terror and consternation, which so sudden and unexpected an irruption occasioned, even in the most distant provinces. Aetius, who had opposed the barbarians so vigorously in Gaul, betrayed, on this occasion, no less fear than the rest; nay, he was at first for retiring with the emperor out of Italy, and taking refuge in Gaul; but shame getting the better of his fear, he continued in Italy, and began to assemble the forces, that were dispersed up and down the provinces. In the mean time frequent councils were held at court, in the senate,

- a and in the assemblies of the Roman people; but the only expedient that occurred, was to send ambassadors to Attila, and try whether they could, by offering him most advantageous terms, induce him to conclude a peace, and retire. In the meantime he ravaged, without restraint or controul, the Italian provinces, and took by storm several cities^b. He met with no opposition till he came to Aquileia, the metropolis of the province called Venetia. As that city was well fortified, and defended by the flower of the Roman troops, all his efforts against it proved, for a long time, unsuccessful; inasmuch that his men began to mutiny, and declare, they would abandon the siege^c. But Attila, having one day observed some storks carrying their young ones out of the city into the fields, as he was then deliberating with himself, whether he should raise or pursue the siege, took this for a lucky omen; and turning to his men, Behold, he said, those birds abandoning a city, which they know, by a natural instinct, is near ruin. The soldiers, believing their king well skilled in auspices, were so animated with this observation, that, doubling their efforts, they made an incredible number of warlike engines, with which they continued battering the city night and day, and at length took it by storm, plundered it for several days, and laid it in ashes, not one house being left standing, nor one person alive, that fell into their hands^d. Encouraged with this success, without much-ado, they made themselves masters of the other cities of that province, viz. Trevigio, Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Brescia, and Bergamo, which they plundered with the utmost cruelty, putting all to fire and sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. It is commonly said and believed, that, on this occasion, the inhabitants of the province of Venetia, to avoid the cruelty of the Huns, retired to the islands on their coast, and there laid the foundation of a city, which, borrowing its name from the province, was called Venetia, and is known to us by the name of Venice^e (L). From the province of Venetia, Attila advanced into Liguria, where he took and plundered Milan, the metropolis of that province, and the usual seat of the emperors of the west. He laid in ashes the city of Pavia, and several other places in that neighbourhood, raging every-where with such cruelty, as can hardly be expressed or conceived^f (M). He was prompted, by his thirst of booty, to march to Rome, and plunder that metropolis of the western empire; and the Romans expected daily to see him at the gates of their city, which, it seems, they were not in a condition to defend against so powerful an enemy; for Leo the Great writes, that Heaven, by granting them peace, had saved Rome, and delivered the Roman people from slaughter and bondage^g. However, Attila, though he had publicly declared his resolution of marching to Rome, was afterwards diverted from putting it in execution by his own men, says Jornandes, mindful of the untimely end of Alaric, who died soon after he had plundered that metropolis, and dreading the same fate might overtake their leader^h. But this motive surely could be of no great weight with Attila. His army was greatly weakened for want of provisions; a contagious distemper raged amongst his troops to such a degree, that Heaven seemed to fight against him; Marcian, emperor of the east, had sent a chosen body of troops to the assistance of Valentinian, which, under the conduct of Aetius, had gained some advantages over the Huns; such of that nation as had remained at home, were at the same time greatly harassed by the forces, which Marcian had sent against them.

WHILE Attila, thus embarrassed, was in suspense whether or no he should pursue his march to Rome, ambassadors arrived from Valentinian, with proposals for an agreement. The sending of ambassadors was the only expedient, as we have hinted above,

(L) Cassiodorus speaking of the Venetians, as he styles them, about fifty years after, says, that they inhabited the islands of the Adriatic; that they had no other fence against the waves but hurdles, no other food but fish, no wealth besides their boats, and no merchandize but salt, which they exchanged for other provisions. They were employed, in the time of Cassiodorus, in carrying from Istria to Ravenna the corn and oil, which that province was obliged to furnish (34); so that they were then subject to the Goths.

(M) We are told, that Attila, seeing at Milan some pictures, representing the Roman emperors sitting on thrones of gold, and the Scythians, that is, the Goths or Huns, prostrate at their feet, caused himself to be painted sitting on a throne, and the Roman emperors carrying on their shoulders sacks filled with gold, which they emptied at his feet (35).

that occurred to the prince, and his council, to deliver Italy from the cruel ravages ^a of the barbarians. At the head of this embassy was the celebrated Leo, bishop of Rome, a person famed for his eminent piety and learning. His colleagues were Albigenus or Avienus, who had been consul in 450. and Trigecius, formerly prefect ¹. They found Attila on the banks of the Menzo, not far from Mantua, and were received by him with uncommon demonstrations of kindness and esteem. He concluded with them, soon after their arrival, a kind of treaty, which, it seems, was but a truce; for he threatened to return to Italy, and commit there greater ravages than ever, unless the princess Honorio was sent him, with the share of the imperial treasures that was due to her ^k. One of the articles of this treaty was, that an annual pension should be paid to Attila, the emperor being glad to redeem the empire at any ^b rate from the calamities it suffered ^l. The treaty was no sooner signed, than Attila commanded his men to forbear all hostilities; and soon after leaving Italy, he retired, with all his troops, beyond the Danube ^m. This peace, or rather truce, was probably concluded in the beginning of July; for Leo was still at Rome on the tenth of June, as appears from one of his letters to Theodorus of Frejus bearing that date ⁿ.

As Attila was incapable of living himself, or suffering others to live, in peace, he was no sooner returned to his own country, than he began to threaten the eastern empire with an invasion, if Marcian did not send him, without delay, the tribute, which his predecessor Theodosius the younger had agreed to pay him yearly ^o. But this was only a feint, says Jornandes, to conceal his real design, which was to return ^c into Gaul, and there make war upon the Visigoths. Pursuant to this design, having left Pannonia, and crossed Rbatia, he followed the course of the Rhone, entered the country now known by the name of Dauphiny, and there fell unexpectedly upon the Alans, who had been allowed by Aetius, as we have hinted above, to settle in the Valentinois. But Thorismond, king of the Visigoths, whose dominions were parted from those of the Alans only by the Rhone, being well apprised, that Attila, in reducing the Alans, had no other view but to open himself a way into his territories, joined his neighbours with all his forces, and, meeting Attila, gave him a total overthrow; which obliged him to return with shame and disgrace into his own country ^p. Jornandes and Sigebert are the only writers, who mention this second irruption of the ^d Hunns into Gaul; and Valesius, not without reason, questions the truth of what they write ^q. Perhaps Thorismond made war upon the Alans, who, finding themselves attacked by so powerful an enemy, called in a body of Hunns to their assistance; but were defeated, together with their allies, by the king of the Visigoths; for Gregory of Tours tells us, that Thorismond subdued the Alans ^r. As for Jornandes, we have shewn, in several places of the Roman history, that he was far from being well acquainted with the affairs of the Visigoths. We find no farther mention of Attila in the ancient historians, till the time of his death, which happened, according to Idatius, immediately after he was returned from Italy ^s. Count Marcellinus places it in 454. but Prosper, Cassiodorus, and Victor Tunniensis, in 453. or 452. Jornandes gives us the following account of his death, which he copied from Priscus: Attila, not satisfied with the many wives he had already, married a young woman of extraordinary beauty, named Ildico. On the day of the nuptials, which were celebrated with the utmost magnificence, the king, transported with joy, drank to excess, contrary to his custom; and being overcome with sleep, retired with his bride, and slept with his face upwards. In that posture he was seized with an hemorrhagia, or flux of blood, to which he was subject. As the blood had not a free course through the usual passages, it fell into his throat, and stifled him ^t. The next day, his officers, not seeing him appear, began to apprehend, that some misfortune had happened to him. Having therefore long waited for him in vain, they called him with great ^f noise, and, not hearing him stir nor answer, they at length forced the doors of his apartment, when they found him dead, without any marks of violence, and his bride sitting by him bathed in tears, and covering her face with her veil. At this sight they cut part of their hair, according to the custom of their nation, and tore their faces, to bewail so great a warrior, not with tears, like women, but, like men, with blood ^u. To this account Priscus adds a very remarkable circumstance, which he

- a will not allow us to call into question, viz. that the very night Attila died, the emperor Marcian being very uneasy and restless in reflecting on the menaces and great power of that warlike prince, his bow was shewn him broken in many pieces; which was revealing to him the death of an enemy, whom he so much dreaded, and at the same time informing him, that the vast empire he had founded in the north would be soon divided, and, as it were, broken in pieces. Count Marcellinus writes, that the tyrant of Europe underwent the fate of Holophernes, being killed, as he was, by a woman*. But Cassiodorus† and Theophanes‡ agree in their account of his death with Jornandes. Thus, he was justly punished, says *Jornandes, with a dishonourable and ignominious death, for the cruel and unnatural murder of his brother, and the streams of blood, which his unbounded ambition had prompted him to shed.
- b His body was conveyed with great solemnity from the place where he died to the fields, and there laid under a silk tent, which some horsemen, chosen out of the whole nation of the Hunns, often riding round, sung, in a doleful strain, the noble achievements of their king. This mournful ceremony was succeeded by a joyful one, a great banquet on the deceased prince's tomb, which lasted till the night was far spent, when his body was secretly interred, being inclosed in three coffins, the first of gold, the second of silver, and the third of iron. The latter was to signify, that he had subdued many nations with his sword; and the two former, that he had obliged the Roman emperors to share their treasures with him. In the same grave
- c with him were buried the arms and rich spoils, which he had taken in war from other princes, and great commanders. In the end, all those were put to death, who had been employed about his grave, lest their avarice should, some time or other, prompt them to plunder it^b. This is all we find in the antients concerning Attila the renowned king of the Hunns. We might have added many things from the chronicles of Hungary, from Callimachus, and Olabus, who have written the life of that prince, and filled whole books with his exploits; but as their accounts are not vouched by the antients, and their authority is of no weight in itself, we have not thought any thing they relate worthy of notice. With Attila ended the empire, which he had, with so much blood and treasure, founded in the north; for a civil war being kindled
- d upon his death among his numerous issue, the several nations he had subdued laid hold of that opportunity to shake off the yoke, and recover their antient liberty. Thus the Hunns ceased to be the terror of both empires, and, for several ages, performed nothing, which historians have thought worthy of mention.
- Attila* had by his last will, as we read in *Jornandes, appointed Ellac, his eldest son, to succeed him, and to rule over his other children, as well as over the many nations he had conquered. Ellac was, it seems, a man of great boldness, intrepidity, and experience in war, and consequently capable of maintaining, and even extending the conquests of his father; but as he had an incredible number of brothers, and they all jointly insisted upon an equal division of their father's dominions, a bloody
- e war was kindled, which involved in the utmost confusion, not only the northern provinces, but both Pannonia's, and the other countries on the Danube, where the Romans had allowed them to settle. But while they all strove to be sovereigns, they all lost the sovereignty for which they strove; for Ardaric, king of the Gepidæ, hearing that they proposed to divide among them by lot the nations, which their father had conquered, and not able to bear, that powerful kings, and warlike people, should be thus treated like the meanest slaves, openly declared, that he would not obey the sons of Attila, but rescue himself and his people from the yoke they so shamefully groaned under. His example was followed by several other nations, that hastened to join him. Ellac, leaving for the present his brothers, marched against
- f him at the head of all his forces. Hereupon a battle ensued on the banks of the Notad in Pannonia, in which the Hunns were utterly routed, and thirty thousand of them killed on the spot, with their king Ellac, who is said on that occasion to have performed wonders, and to have behaved like a true son of the great Attila^d. The Hunns were so disheartened with this overthrow, and the general revolt of the nations they had conquered, that, being pressed by the Gepidæ, they retired to the country, which they had taken from the Goths in 376. towards the Euxine sea and the mouths of the Danube, and the Gepidæ remained masters of all ancient Dacia, lying north of that river, which the Hunns had possessed ever since their first irruption into Europe.

The Gepidæ begged the friendship of the Romans, and a small annual pension to support them; which was readily granted, and continued to be paid even in the time of the emperor Justinian ^a. Several other nations, thus delivered from the yoke of the Hunns, begged and obtained leave of Marcian, or his successor Leo, to settle in the Roman territories. Among these mention is made of the Squiri, Salagairæ, and Alans, who, under the conduct of Candax, their king or leader, settled in Lesser Scythia and Lower Mæsia. To the Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemendrians, lands were granted in Illyricum, near a place called the Castle of Mars. To the Ostrogoths Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmish in Slavonia, to Vindobona, at present Vienna in Austria. Even Ernac, Attila's youngest son, and with him several Hunns, submitted to the Romans, who granted them lands on the most distant borders of Lesser Scythia, in Dacia, and amongst the Sarmatians in Illyricum ^b. The other sons of Attila, uniting their forces, attempted to drive the Goths out of Pannonia, and recover that province; but Valemir, king of the Goths, meeting them with only a handful of men, says Jornandes, put them to flight, and pursued them with such slaughter, that few of them escaped ^c. About eight years after, while the Goths were engaged in a war with the Salagæ, Dinzio, one of Attila's sons, and styled by Jornandes king of the Hunns, having assembled what forces he could, entered the territories of the Goths, putting all to fire and sword, and laid siege to Bajana, thought to be the present city of Posëga, the metropolis of a country bearing the same name, and lying between the Save and the Draw ^k. This the Goths no sooner understood, than, leaving the Salagæ, they marched against the Hunns, and drove them out with such slaughter, that they never after offered to molest them ^l.

THE Hunns, thus weakened by their intestine wars, and the great losses they had sustained in the two above-mentioned irruptions, continued quiet till the year 466, when passing the Danube in the depth of winter on the ice, they broke into Dacia, under the conduct of one Hormidac, and committed dreadful ravages in that province, putting all to fire and sword. But Anthemius, who was afterwards emperor, marching against them with another general, whom our author does not name, gained several advantages over them, and at last defeated them in a pitched battle, during which the other general went over to the enemy; but his men, probably the cavalry, ^d for Anthemius was general of the foot, not following him, Anthemius, without betraying the least fear or surprize, continued the engagement, and in the end gained a complete victory. However, he suffered the Hunns to retire unmolested, upon their putting to death the general who had gone over to them ^m. The Hunns were no sooner returned to their own country, than the children of Attila sent deputies to Leo, then emperor of the east, to propose a peace, and beg he would appoint a market to be held on the Danube, to which the Hunns might freely resort, and trade with the Romans. To this Leo would by no means consent; which Dengizic, one of the sons of Attila, by Jornandes ⁿ called Dinzio, and by others Dinziric ^o, resented to such a degree, that he was for continuing the war. But his brother Hernac, who, as we said above, had been allowed by the emperor Marcian to settle in Lesser Scythia, and was then engaged in other wars, declared he would by no means enter into this ^p. Dengizic however, persisting in his first resolution, drew together a considerable army, and encamped on the banks of the Danube. Arnagastus, who, at that time, guarded the banks of that river on the side of Thrace, sent immediately an officer to the Hunns, to inquire upon what provocation they had taken arms. Dengizic answered, That he had taken arms with a design to make war upon Leo, unless he granted to him and his men lands and money. To this Arnagastus replied by the emperor's orders, That Leo would readily grant both to such as were willing to submit to him, and serve him in his wars. But Dengizic, not satisfied with this answer, began hostilities, and continued the war, of which we know no particulars, till he was killed by Arnagastus, styled, on that occasion, general of Thrace ^q. His head was sent to Constantinople in 468. or 469. and carried into the city with great pomp, while the people were beholding the sports of the circus, which they left for a sight to them far more agreeable. It was borne through the chief streets of the city on the point of a spear, and left for some days exposed to public view ^r.

- a THE Huns, disheartened with the losses they sustained in this war, and the death of their leader, continued, it seems, quiet for the space of near sixty years, without molesting either the Romans, or their neighbours; for we find no mention made of them from this time to the year 526. the first of the emperor Justinian's reign, when two of their kings, Styrax and Glonas, stirred up by Cabades king of Persia, then at war with the Romans, broke into the empire at the head of two powerful armies; but Boarex, the widow of Balach king of the Sabirite Huns, a woman of a warlike genius, and manly temper, espousing the cause of the Romans against the Persians, led to the assistance of the emperor an army an hundred thousand strong; and, meeting the two kings, gave them battle, cut most of their men in pieces, and took Styrax himself Boarex, queen of the Huns, fights for the Romans. Year after Christ 526.
- b prisoner, and sent him in chains to Constantinople. It is a great pity, that neither Theopbanes, nor the author of the miscellaneous history, have named this brave Amazon, this warlike heroine, who deserved so well of the empire. The same year Gordas, king of the Huns dwelling near the Bosporus Cimmerius, came in person to Constantinople, to court the friendship of Justinian, and conclude an alliance with that prince; which he did accordingly. As he had an opportunity, during his stay at Constantinople, of seeing the ceremonies of the christian religion, he was so taken with them, that he desired to be instructed in the mysteries of our holy faith, and, in the end, with great solemnity, received the sacrament of baptism in the presence of the emperor, who was his sponsor. Upon his departure, Justinian loaded him with rich presents, committing to him the defence of the borders of the empire on that side, especially of the city of Bosporus. Gordas, returning home, ordered the idols to be broken, and their temples demolished, throughout his dominions; which enraged the superstitious populace to such a degree, that, revolting from their prince, they seized him, put him to death, and raised his brother, named Mugaris, to the throne in his room. Mugaris was no sooner proclaimed king, than he marched, with all his forces, against the city of Bosporus, and, having surprised it, put all the Romans he found there to the sword. The emperor, being acquainted with what had happened, and greatly grieved for the death of his friend and ally, dispatched one John, who had been consul, at the head of a numerous army of Scythians, to recover the place, and take vengeance of the rebels; but, at his approach, they abandoned the city, and fled with such precipitation, that the Roman general could never come up with them. We should more readily give credit to these remarkable events, were they vouched either by Procopius or Agathias; but the silence of these two writers makes us question the truth of what the others relate. But the irruption, which happened in 539. the thirteenth of the emperor Justinian's reign, is attested by Procopius. The Huns, according to that writer, passing the Danube that year in great multitudes, laid waste Thrace, Greece, Illyricum, and all the provinces from the Ionian sea to the very suburbs of Constantinople; nay, having crossed the Hellepont, they extended their ravages to Asia, where they committed unheard-of cruelties; and thence crossing again into the Chersonesus, they returned home, loaded with an immense booty. In this irruption they took thirty-two castles in Illyricum, destroyed Cassandria, and carried with them unmolested an hundred and twenty thousand captives. Being thus become anew formidable to the empire, Justinian, to keep them quiet, allowed them some lands in Thrace, and agreed to pay them an annual pension, upon their promising to serve, when wanted, in the Roman armies. These were the Cuturgurian Huns. As for the Uturgurians, who had joined them in this irruption, they retired, with their booty, to their own country bordering on the Euxine sea; but, finding that too narrow for them, they drove out the Goths, by Procopius called Detraxitæ, who had settled in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, and possessed themselves of their country. As they were at a great distance from the empire, they turned their arms against their neighbours the Sarmatians, endeavouring to enlarge their bounds on that side, without giving any further molestation to the Romans. But the Cuturgurians, notwithstanding the pension paid them yearly by the emperor, made several inroads into the neighbouring provinces, behaving like declared enemies, says Procopius, while they pretended to be friends and allies. Hereupon the emperor wrote to the Uturgurians, complaining to them of their countrymen, and offering to pay to them the pension, which he allowed the Cuturgurians, provided they put a stop to the ravages of the latter, and engaged to make war upon them as often as they broke Justinian stirs up the Uturgurian against the Cuturgurian Huns.

into the empire. The Uturgurians, encouraged with this offer, passing the Tanais, beyond which many of them dwelt, hastened with long marches into the Roman territories, and, falling unexpectedly upon the Cuturgurians while busied in plundering the provinces lying on the Danube, defeated them with great slaughter, obliged them to quit their booty, and drove them quite out of the empire *. However, a few years after, that is, in 558. the Cuturgurian Hunns, taking advantage of the frost, passed the Danube, and, after having laid waste great part of Myfia and Thrace, divided their numerous forces into two bodies, one of them taking their rout towards Greece, and the other marching for the Thracian Chersonesus. The latter, under the conduct of one of their chiefs, named Zamarga, having passed the long wall, came, without meeting with the least opposition, within an hundred and fifty furlongs of Constantinople, and laid waste the whole country round it. Belisarius, though weakened with old age to such a degree, that he was scarce able to hold, or brandish a sword, marching out against them with a handful of men, fell upon them unawares, put them to flight, and delivered both the emperor and the city from the dangers that threatened them; but that brave commander being disgraced upon his return to Constantinople, as we have related elsewhere †, the barbarians, who were hastening back to their own country, no sooner heard, that he was no more to be employed against them, than they returned before the royal city, committing dreadful ravages in all the countries through which they passed. But one Germanus, a youth of great expectation, putting himself at the head of the imperial troops, fell unexpectedly upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous flight. The victory had proved complete, had not young Germanus, by exposing his person more than a prudent general would have done, received a dangerous wound, which prevented him from pursuing the fugitives. Soon after, that party, which had taken their rout towards Greece, finding the streights of Thermopylae guarded by the natives, returned to Thrace, and there joined Zamarga, who, being thus reinforced, threatened to renew his ravages, and to put to death all the prisoners he had taken, unless a sufficient sum was sent forthwith to redeem them. Justinian, not caring to provoke the barbarians, and at the same time pitying the condition of the unhappy captives, sent a considerable sum to Zamarga; who no sooner received it, than he set the prisoners at liberty, and, putting a stop to all hostilities and depredations, returned beyond the Danube. In the mean time the emperor privately dispatched ambassadors to Sandilicubus, king of the Uturgurian Hunns, to whom he paid an annual pension, acquainting him with the late inroads of the Cuturgurians, to whom, he said, he had paid the sum that was due to him, and was resolved to do so for the future, unless he shewed himself, by a speedy revenge, worthy of his friendship. Upon this message, Sandilicubus, highly incensed against the Cuturgurians, broke into their territories at the head of a powerful army, and, falling upon Zamarga as he was returning from Thrace, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged him to quit the rich booty, with which his army was loaded. This gave rise to a bloody war between the two nations, which lasted many years, says Agathias ‡, from whom we have borrowed this whole account, and ended at last in the ruin of both; for, being greatly weakened by their civil wars, they became a prey, says that writer, to other nations, insomuch that they lost their very name, and were blended with the nations they served. But the utter destruction of that people, continues our historian, happened afterwards, as shall be related by us, according to the order of time. With these words he closes the fifth book of his history, the last of those that have reached us; so that for a further account of the affairs of the Hunns, we must have recourse to more modern writers. Among these, Venantius Fortunatus tells us, that in 560. a great body of Hunns, probably driven out of their own country by the neighbouring nations, took their rout through Germany, with a design to pass the Rhine, as Attila had formerly done, and settle in Gaul. In that country then reigned the four sons of Clotharius, viz. Cherebert at Paris; Chilperic at Soissons; Guntram at Orleans; and Sigebert at Mentz. The latter was no sooner informed of the motions of the Hunns, than, passing the Rhine at the head of a powerful army, he resolved to meet them in Thuringia, which then belonged to him, and there give them battle. Accordingly the two armies met, and engaged on the banks of the Elbe with incredible fury. The victory was

- a long doubtful; but in the end Sigebert, who was a warlike prince, gained a complete victory over the barbarians, of whom he killed many thousands, and obliged the rest to return through by-ways into Pannonia.^a They are defeated by Sigebert, king of the Franks. Year after Christ 560. The Hunns masters of Dacia, Mœcia, and both Pannonia's.
- No farther mention is made of the Hunns by any credible historian, till the reign of Charles the Great, in whose time they were masters of Dacia, now Transylvania and Valachia; of Upper Masia, now Servia; and of the two Pannonia's, viz. the Upper, containing the present provinces of Carniola, Carinthia, and the greater part of Austria, and the Lower, comprising Bosnia, Sclavonia, and that part of Hungary that lies beyond the Danube. In the year 776. while Charles was in Saxony, two princes of the Hunns, Caganus and Jugunus, sent ambassadors to him, desiring his friendship and alliance. Charles received them with extraordinary marks of honour, and readily complied with their request. However, they entered, not long after, into an alliance with Tassilo duke of Bavaria, who, revolting from Charles, raised great disturbances in Germany. This Charles wisely dissembled, till he had utterly reduced Bavaria, when a misunderstanding arising between him and them about the borders of their respective territories, he resolved to lay hold of that opportunity to be revenged on them for their sending under-hand succours to Tassilo. Accordingly he ordered levies to be made throughout his dominions, and having by that means assembled a very numerous army, he divided it into two bodies, whereof one he committed to the conduct of count Theodoric, and Magnifrid his chamberlain, with orders
- b to break into Dacia, while he himself, with the other, entered Pannonia by the way of Bavaria. The two armies laid waste the territories of the Hunns far and near, burnt their villages, and took several of their strong-holds, to which they had fled, not being able to keep the field against so powerful an enemy. Thus he continued ravaging the country, putting all to fire and sword, for the space of eight years, till that warlike nation was intirely subdued, and almost utterly extirpated. In one of these expeditions, Henry duke of Forum Julii, now Friuli, took the royal palace of the Hunns, called Rbing, in which he found an immense booty, great part whereof was, by Charles's orders, sent to Rome, as a present to that see, or, as they term it, to St. Peter.^a The intire reduction of the Hunns happened, according to the best
- c chronologers, in the year of the christian æra 794. Some authors write, that, by this long war, the whole race of the antient Hunns was cut off; and that the country was afterwards peopled by the neighbouring nations, to whom the present Hungarians owe their origin. Of this opinion was the celebrated Aeneas Sylvius, raised afterwards to the see of Rome. But the Hungarian writers maintain their nation to be descended from the antient Hunns, who, they say, were subdued, but not utterly extirpated, by the Franks. To confirm this, Bonfinius tells us, that, in his time, a nation was, by some merchants, discovered on the banks of the Tanais, speaking the same language with that of the present Hungarians; and that Matthias, then king of Hungary, being assured by persons of credit, whom he himself had sent into those parts, that the
- d report of the merchants was true, dispatched ambassadors to the chiefs of that nation, intreating them to send a numerous colony into Hungary, at that time but thinly inhabited, by reason of the long war, in which great numbers of the natives had perished. The prince's request, says our author, has not yet been, but will be, we hope, one time or other, complied with.^b Others write, that, upon the death of Attila, the Hunns were quite driven out of Pannonia, and never returned till the year 744. when, under the conduct of one Hungar, a word signifying in their language courageous or valiant, they entered Pannonia anew, and settled in the antient seats of their forefathers, after having driven out those, who, coming from the neighbouring countries, had seized them, and held them for some ages. From Hungar they were
- e called Hungarians, and the country no longer Pannonia, but Hungary. Thus Ranzanus^c; but what he writes evidently contradicts all the antient historians, who, as we have seen in the course of this history, speak frequently of the irruptions of the Hunns, of their passing the Danube, and laying waste the Roman provinces, long after the death of Attila and his children. Besides, the inhabitants of Pannonia are, by the writers of those times, constantly styled Hunns, and no mention is made of any other nation dwelling in that country. As for the name of Hungari, most writers will have it to be compounded of Hunni and Avares, two names of one and the same nation.^d They are intirely reduced by Charles the Great. Year after Christ 794. Whether the present Hungarians are descended from the antient Hunns.

But, on this subject, nothing can be offered, but what is founded on mere conjecture. And this is all we have been able to gather from the antients concerning the origin, migrations, government, manners, and wars, of the Hunns. As for the modern writers of the history of Hungary, their accounts of those ancient times are, for the most part, evidently fabulous, quite groundless, or altogether improbable. We have therefore all along confined ourselves to the antient and original writers, who lived in or near the times, in which the things they relate were transacted, not thinking any thing related by the moderns, and not vouched by them, worthy of a place in our history.

The antient state and history of the Goths, till the settling of the Visigoths in Spain, and the Ostrogoths in Italy.

Scandinavia
the country of the Goths.

THE Goths, a warlike nation, and, above all others, famous in the Roman history, came originally, according to Jornandes^a, out of Scandinavia, a country rightly styled by him officina gentium, and vagina nationum, on account of the incredible multitudes of people, that, issuing from thence in swarms, over-ran and stocked with inhabitants other as well distant as neighbouring countries. Scandinavia, comprising the present Sweden, Norway, Lapland, and Finnmark, was, by the antients, thought to be an island^b; but is now well known to be a peninsula. It is by Pliny called Scandinavia^c, or, as Vossius^d, and after him Gronovius, will have it, Scandinovia; by Xenophon Lampsacenus, Baltia^e; by Timæus, Basilea; and by Pytheas, sometimes Basilea, and sometimes Abalus^f. The writers of the middle ages style it Scanza, Scanzia, Scantia, and Scandia; which names, as well as that of Scandinavia, some derive from the German or Gothic word Scanzen, signifying castles; for the first inhabitants, say they, turned the high and steep rocks, with which the country abounds, into castles; and hence came the word Scandinavia, that is, a country filled with castles &c. Others will have the names Scandinavia, Scanzia, &c. to come from the word Seckanten, importing the sea-coast or shore^g. As for the Greek word Baltia, it signifies a breaking in of the sea. What we call the Baltic, was known to Tacitus by the name of the Suevian sea; and to Mela and Pliny by that of the Codan gulf. The bay into which the Vistula, now the Weissel, empties itself, is called by Ptolemy the Venedic bay, no doubt from the neighbouring Venedi, the antient inhabitants of Livonia, Lithuania, and part of Poland. In antient times the Vistula was the boundary on the east between Germany and Sarmatia. In Scandinavia Tacitus places two different nations, the Suiones and the Sittones, of whom the former inhabited the present Sweden, and the latter Norway; for they were separated, according to Tacitus, by mount Sevo, now Scagen; which mountain, or rather ridge of mountains, parts Norway from Sweden. The Suiones were divided, according to Ptolemy, into the following tribes, viz. the Chedini, Phavoni, Phirasi, Dauciones, Hilleviones, Scritofinni or Scritobani, mentioned also by *Prosopius*ⁱ, and the Gutæ. But these were either Gothic nations, or had settled in the country after the Goths were masters of it, it being certain, that, long before Tacitus's time, Scandinavia was inhabited by the Goths, tho' not yet known to the Romans by that name; nay, the learned Grotius, and after him Sheringham, and most of the northern writers, maintain with arguments, which have not yet been confuted, that the Cimbrians, Getes, and Goths, were one and the same nation; that Scandinavia was first peopled by them; and that from thence they sent colonies into the islands in the Baltic, the Chersonesus, and the adjacent places, yet destitute of inhabitants. The islands were called by them with one common name Wesallabeedb, signifying, in the Gothic language, land surrounded on all sides with water; but the Romans, after they became acquainted with the Goths under the name of Cimbrians, called them the Cimbrian islands; which appellation they gave likewise to the Chersonesus, now Jutland^k. - a time when the Goths first settled in Scandinavia, and the time when they first peopled with their colonies the islands, the Cbersonesus, and the neighbouring places, are equally uncertain, though the Gothic annals suppose the latter to have happened under the conduct of king Eric, whom they make contemporary with Saruch, the great grandfather of Abraham. But it is not at all probable, as Sheringham well observes, that Scandinavia, a country of no small extent, should, in the time of Saruch, who died soon after the confusion of languages, abound with people, so as to send colonies into other countries¹. Of this migration of the Gotes or Goths from Scandinavia into the above-mentioned places, under the conduct of king Eric, mention is made in all the ancient Gothic chronicles, and it is moreover vouched by the Danish, as well as the Swedish writers, who agree all in this, though they disagree, as it generally happens between neighbouring and rival nations, in most other points. The Danes ingenuously confess, and confess it they must, unless they give the lye to their own chronicles, that their country was first peopled by the Goths of Scandinavia; that to them they owe their origin, and that Dan, the son of Humelus, king of the Goths, from whom their country was called Dania, and they Dani, was the founder of their kingdom^m. This is agreeable to what we read in Jornandes and Freculphus, who tell us, that the Danes were the descendants of the Ostrogoths dwelling in *Scanzia*ⁿ. The peopling of the islands in the Baltic sea, of the Cbersonesus, and the adjacent places on the continent, is called, by the northern writers, the first migration of the Goths or Getes.

c THE second migration is related by Jornandes, and supposed to have happened several ages after the first, when the above-mentioned countries being overstocked with people, Berig, at that time king of the Goths, went out with a fleet in quest of new settlements, and landing in the country of the Ulmerugians, now Pomerania, drove out the ancient inhabitants, and divided their lands amongst his followers. He fell next upon the Vandals, whose country bordered on that of the Ulmerugians, overcame them, but instead of forcing them, as he had done the Ulmerugians, from their ancient seats, he only obliged them, probably because they were of Gothic extraction, to share their possessions with the new-comers^o. They send a colony into Germany

d THE Goths, who had settled in Pomerania, and the adjacent parts of Germany, being greatly increased, insomuch that the country could no longer maintain them, they went out in great numbers under Filimer, surnamed the Great, their fifth prince after their leaving Scandinavia, and, taking their rout eastward, entered Scythia, advanced to the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and, driving out the Cimmerians, settled in the neighbourhood of the Mæotic lake. Thence, in process of time, they sent numerous colonies into Thrace, Dacia, and Mæsia, and lastly into the countries bordering on the Euxine sea, forcing every-where the ancient inhabitants to abandon their native seats. Thus Jornandes p, and Ablavius, a celebrated writer among the Goths, who flourished long before him. In the neighbourhood of the Mæotic lake, they had Filimer for their

e king, a warlike prince; in Thrace, Mæsia and Dacia, Xamolxis, a great philosopher; and in the countries on the Euxine sea, princes of the illustrious families of the Balthi and the Amali, the Visigoths being subject to the former, and the Ostrogoths to the latter^q. In all these countries they were one and the same people, though subject to different princes, and known by different names. Thus, in Cimmeria, Sarmatia, Scythia, they were called Cimmerians, Sarmatians, Scythians; in Thrace, Dacia, and Mæsia, Thracians, Dacians, and Mæsiens; and in the neighbourhood of the Ister and the Pontus, Istrians and Pontics. As for the appellations of Westrogoths, softened by the Latins into that of Visigoths, and Ostrogoths, they were distinguished by these names, as Grotius shews from Jornandes, before they left Scandinavia, being called Westro- And into Scythia, Thrace, Mædia, &c.

f goths and Ostrogoths, or Western and Eastern Goths, from their situation there to the east and west, the former inhabiting that part of Scandinavia, which borders on Denmark, and the latter the more eastern parts, lying on the Baltic^r. What Jornandes writes of the various migrations and settlements of the Goths, is intirely agreeable to what we read in the ancient Greek and Latin authors concerning the various migrations and settlements of the Getes^s. And truly that the Goths and Getes were one and the same people, is supposed by all the writers, who flourished in or near the times, in which both empires were over-run by them. These authors, without all doubt Ostrogoths and Visigoths.

well acquainted with their origin, call them sometimes Goths, sometimes Getes, and a sometimes Scythians; nay, several writers, namely Orosius^c, who flourished in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, when the Goths broke into Italy, under the conduct of the famous Alaric, St. Jerom^u, St. Austin^w, Synesius^x, Photius^y, Capitolinus^z, Vopiscus^a, Spartian^b, tell us in express terms, that the Getes and Goths were one and the same nation; and that they had been long known to the Romans, and likewise to the Greeks, by the former name, but not by the latter, till their breaking into the empire. That this opinion was not, as some modern authors have been pleased to call it, a vulgar error, may be plainly proved; for, in the first place, it is evident from all the antients, that the Getes inhabited that part of Scythia, which is by Ptolemy called Asiatic Sarmatia, and comprises the Taurica Chersonesus, with the countries b lying between the Tanais, the Mæotic lake, and the Euxine sea. On the other hand, it is no less evident from all the writers, who speak of the Goths, that, from those very countries, they broke into the empire. Since therefore the Goths dwelt in the countries, where all the antients place the Getes, we cannot help concluding from thence, that they were one and the same people, though known by different names. Ptolemy, who lived in the time of the emperor Antoninus, mentions no Goths in Scythia, Thrace, Mæsia, or Pannonia; and nevertheless, scarce was half a century passed, when the Goths, coming in swarms from those very countries, over-ran great part of the empire. These Goths therefore, if we will not allow them to have dropt all on a sudden from the clouds, must have been the very people, who are by Ptolemy c called Getes, Pontics, Istrians, Trapezites, Gelonians, and Sauromatæ, and were soon after known to the Romans by the common name of Goths. Were all those nations utterly destroyed, and their seats seized, by the Goths? Of this general slaughter no mention is made by any historian; and we cannot persuade ourselves, that, if it happened, the writers of those times, who speak of the Goths, would have passed over in silence such a memorable event. Cluverius, who will have the Getes and Goths to be two different nations, believes, or at least would make us believe, that they dwelt together in the same countries. But is it at all probable, that two nations, obeying different princes, should live peaceably together in the same country, in the same cities, and within the same walls? How came the Getes to be so early d known to the Romans, and the Goths, living among them, utterly unknown till their breaking into the empire? It seems to us a paradox, that the Romans, who were constantly at war with those nations, and had both colonies and garrisons among them, should be well acquainted with the Getes, and utterly unacquainted with the Goths, a warlike and numerous nation, inhabiting the same countries. Besides, Mela tells us in express terms, that Thrace, the banks of the Tanais, Sarmatia, and the countries lying east of the Mæotic lake, were inhabited by one and the same people, though known by different names^e; and Strabo, that the Istrians, Dacians, Mæsiens, and Thracians, spoke the same language, and consequently were the same people^d. To these we may add Procopius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, of whom the former e writes, that there were several nations of the Goths, some being called by the antients Sauromatæ, others Melanclæni, and some Getes; but that these nations differed only in name^e; and the latter, speaking of the Goths, says, that they inhabited Thrace, Mæsia, and Dacia, and were sprung from the fierce nations, that dwelt before in those countries, that is, from the Getes^f. That the Getes and Goths were one people, and not two different nations living in the same country, as Cluverius would have it, may be further confirmed by the great conformity of their laws, manners, and institutions; for, if we compare the accounts, which the antients give us of the manners of the Getes, we shall find them intirely agreeable to those of the more modern writers describing the customs and manners of the Goths^g. Their language was likewise f the same, the Gothic being spoken by the Getes and Massagetes in Scythia, Thrace, Pontus, &c. as Grotius^h, and after him *Sheringham*ⁱ, have shewn; nay, Busbequius assures us, that, in his time, the Gothic language was still spoken, though with some variation in the dialect, by the Tartars of Precop^k; and Josaphat Barbarus, a noble-

- a man of Venice, who lived among them, that they not only speak the ancient Gothic language, but call themselves Goths, and their country *Gotbia*¹. Scaliger adds, that the christian Tartars of Procop still have the scripture written with the same characters, that were invented by Wulphilas, the first bishop of the Goths; and that they read it in the very language they spoke in the time of Ovid^m. This is agreeable to what we read in Lucian and Procopius, of whom the former tells us, that the language of the Alans, who were, without all doubt, a Gothic nation, was common to all the Scythians; and the latter, that the Sauromatae and the Melanclani, by most writers called Getes, were Gothic nations, and spoke the language of the *Goths*ⁿ. Of the ancient language of the Getes only the names of a few kings have reached us, and these
- b Boxhornius shews to be all Gothic.

THE Goths, being in process of time greatly increased in Scythia, resolved to seek new settlements; and accordingly, taking their rout eastward, and travelling through several countries, they returned at length into Germany. Their leader, in this migration, was the celebrated Woden, called also Voden, Oden, Othen, Godan, and Guodan. Of this Woden many strange and wonderful things are related in the Sueo-Gothic chronicles. He was king of the Asgardians, whom the northern writers will have to be the same people with the Asfurgians, mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy. They were called Asfurgians from the city of Asfurgia, placed by Strabo near the Bosporus Cimmerius^p; and in the same place stood, according to the northern writers, the city of

- c Asgardia: and truly that these were but two different names of one and the same city, is highly probable, the word gard signifying, in the Gothic language, the same thing as purgos in the Greek, viz. a fortress or castle. Asfurgia was the metropolis of a province, which Strabo calls Asia; and Woden, and his followers, are styled by the ancient Gothic writers Asæ, Asiani, and Asiotæ. The kings of Asfurgia were masters of all that part of Scythia, that lay west of mount Imaus, and was by the Latins called Scythia intra Imaum, or Scythia within mount Imaus. In this large tract of ground are placed by Ptolemy three different nations, the Aufones, the Syebi, and the Iotæ; but they are all blended by Strabo under the common name of Asfurgians. Of this Asfurgia or Asgardia, Woden was king, who, committing the government of the
- d kingdom to his two brothers, Ve and Velir, went out, with incredible multitudes of his people, in quest of new settlements, foreseeing by his magic, say some ancient chronicles, in which art he excelled all men, that he, and his posterity, should reign for many ages in the northern parts of the world. He first entered Riisland, and having, with great success and expedition, obliged the inhabitants to submit, he appointed his son Bo to reign over them. Riisland, called by the Latins Roxalania and Russia, extended from the mouth of the Vistula to the Palus Maotis, the banks of the Tanais, and the Riphaean mountains, and comprised Prussia, Livonia, and great part of Muscovy. From Riisland he went by sea into the north parts of Germany, and, landing in Saxony, he reduced that country, and divided it amongst his children,
- e appointing Vegdegg king of East Saxony, Begdegg of Westphalia, and Sigg of Franconia. Johannes Martinus, Wittekindus, Cranzius, and all the Saxon writers, assure us, that, time out of mind, a tradition has universally obtained among the Saxons, that their ancestors came first by sea into those countries. From Saxony, Woden passed into Reidogotbland, now Jutland, which he likewise subdued, and gave to his son Skiold, from whom descended the kings of Denmark, thence called Skioldungar, that is, the posterity of Skiold. Leaving Jutland, after he had settled his son there, he advanced into Suitbiad, now Sweden, where he was kindly received by Gylfus or Gylvo, king of the country, and, being allowed to settle there with his followers, he built the city of Sigtunum, where he reigned to his death, and became so famous, that his name
- f reached all countries, and he was, by the northern nations, ranked among the gods, and worshipped with divine honours. He is supposed to have brought with him out of Asia the Runic characters, and to have taught the northern nations the art of poetry; whence he is styled the father of the Scaldi or Scaldri, who were their poets, and described in verse the exploits of the great men of their nation, as the Bards did those of the Gauls and Britons. They were called Scaldi or Scaldri, according to Loccenius^q, from the sound skal, often heard in their verses and poems. The dialect, in which they wrote, was called Asamal, that is, the Asiatic dialect, because brought by Woden out of Asia. As for the Runic letters, the Goths used them in all their spells and enchantments, to which they were greatly addicted; whence, after embracing the christian religion, out of a blind and indiscreet zeal, they destroyed several antient monuments, and burnt a great number of books, because written with those characters. At length, in the year 1001. the Runic characters were quite laid aside in Sweden, and the Roman letters taken in their room, the Swedes being persuaded thereunto by the pope, and by Sigfrid, a British bishop^r. In Spain they were forbidden in 1136. by Alphonso king of Castile and Navar, and condemned by the council of Toledo in 1115^s. They were called Runic letters, according to some, from the Gothic word Ryn or Ren, signifying a furrow; according to others, from Ryne, signifying art, especially that of magic^t. One Pimbul, Fimbultyr, or Fimbultibular, is supposed to have invented these characters^u. Wulphilas, the first bishop of the Goths, invented other characters, which he made use of in translating the scripture into the Gothic tongue. But to return to Woden:

Woden.

THAT the Goths, under his conduct, came out of Scythia into the north parts of Germany, is a received opinion among the northern writers, and confirmed by an immemorial tradition, by all the antient chronicles of those countries, and by a great many monuments and inscriptions in Runic characters, some of which are still to be seen in Sweden, Denmark, and the neighbouring islands: and truly that there were such migrations, can hardly be questioned, since we find the same names common to the inhabitants of Scandia, and Asiatic Scythia, and likewise the same language, as Grotius, and after him Sheringham, has shewn^w; nay, the antient language of the Goths is spoken at this very day by the Tartars of Precop, as we have observed above; so that, upon the whole, we may conclude the Scandian Goths and the Asiatic Scythians to have had one and the same original. As to Woden, there was, without all doubt, a famous hero of this name, who became wonderfully revered by all the northern nations; but we will not take upon us to vouch the strange things that are related of him in the Sueogothic and Sacogothic chronicles. Some writers suppose the migration of the Scythian Goths into the north parts of Germany, under the conduct of Woden, to have happened about twenty-four years before the birth of Christ; for at that time, say they, Pompey laid waste Syria, and great part of Asia; and it is not improbable, that the Scythians, flying from him, went out in quest of new settlements. But Skjold, who was by his father Wouen appointed king of Reidogotbland, or Juland, as we have related above, lived, according to the Danish chronology, about a thousand years before Pompey; so that, according to this account, Woden must have been more antient than Homer. On the other hand, how can this be reconciled with the genealogies of our Saxon kings, the founders of the heptarchy, who all derived their pedigree from Woden? Hengist, the first that came into Britain, did not arrive in this island till the year 449. of the christian æra, and nevertheless he is said to have been the abnepos or great-grandchild of Woden, as Cerdic, the founder of the kingdom of the West-Saxons, the tenth by descent from him. To reconcile these seeming contradictions, some authors are of opinion, and their opinion does not at all seem to us improbable, that several persons or great men bore the name of Woden, and what was done by all, was ascribed to one, in the same manner as it happened among the Greeks with respect to Hercules. Be that as it will, the descendants of the Scythians, or Asiatic Goths, who, under the conduct of Woden, settled in the north parts of Germany, were first known to the Romans by the name of Cimbrians, derived, according to the opinion, which seems to us the best grounded, from the Gothic word Kimber, signifying valiant. The Cimbrians held antiently the islands in the Baltic sea, the Cbersonesus, and the neighbouring countries, and by degrees extended their conquests along the German ocean to both the mouths of the Rhine. The inland countries in that tract were likewise inhabited by them; but, in the different countries where they dwelt, they were distinguished by different names, some of them being called Saxons, others Suevians; some Angles, Sicambrians, Jutes, &c. but, by the Romans, they were all blended under the common name of Cimbrians, till the Saxons, placed by Ptolemy in the north part of the Cbersonesus, became known to them by their conquests, and then the name of Cimbrians was quite laid aside, and that of Saxons used by the Latin writers in its room, which they gave likewise to the nations the Saxons had subdued, calling Saxony that part of Germany, which lies between the Rhine and the Elbe, and had been reduced by them. - a the Goths out of Scandinavia into the neighbouring islands and continent, thence into Germany, from Germany into Asia, and from Asia back again into Germany. These migrations the northern writers endeavour to make out against Verstegan and Cluverius, who will have Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, not to have been inhabited, till Germany so abounded with people, that they were obliged to remove into those countries, which they had not chosen to settle in at first, on account of the greater cold, and barrenness of the soil. To confute this opinion, which derives the origin of the Goths from Germany, the above-mentioned writers, especially Grotius, who outshines all the rest, prove Scythia to have been peopled before any other of the northern countries had inhabitants. The antients indeed went farther; for they supposed, as appears from the epitomizer of *Tragus Pompeius*¹, that all the other parts of the world continued quite destitute of inhabitants, till Scythia, no longer able to support such multitudes, sent out numerous colonies to people them. To maintain this, would perhaps be overshooting the mark; but that Scythia was peopled before any of the northern countries, is highly probable, since, of all the northern countries, it lay the nearest to Babylon, and the only way to them by land was through Scythia. Several eminent writers, and among the rest Lutber, Goropius Becanus, and sir Walter Raleigh, are of opinion, that the ark, on the subsiding of the waters, rested on the Imaon mountains in Scythia; others say on the Gordizean mountains, at a small distance from Scythia, and consequently that Scythia must have been peopled, when the other northern countries still continued uninhabited. Now, as the way was much shorter from Scythia into Scandinavia, than into Germany, and lay in a direct line, it is more natural to suppose, that those, who were seeking places to settle in, went strait into Scandinavia, than by much longer and round-about ways through Sarmatia into Germany; nay, as Sarmatia and Scandinavia were near Scythia, and the ways leading to them not obstructed, it would not be absurd to suppose them to have been overstocked with people, while not only Germany, but all the other countries of Europe, were quite destitute of inhabitants, as being separated from Asia by the Mediterranean sea, the Bosporus Cimmerius, and the Palus Mæotis, unsurmountable obstructions, till the art of navigation was found out, which happened many ages after the confusion of languages. Then, and not till then, the inhabitants of Scandinavia passed into the neighbouring islands and places lying over-against them on the continent, till that period uninhabited. From thence, in process of time, they sent colonies into Germany, who, driving out the antient inhabitants, settled in their country, as we have related above. To prove the migrations of the Goths out of Scandinavia into the islands in the Baltic sea, the Chersonesus, and the adjacent places in Germany, several antient monuments and inscriptions in Runic characters on stones and rocks, are alleged by the northern writers, namely by *Zeilerus*², *Bureus*³, *Suaningius*⁴, and *Wormius*⁵, in whose times many of them were still extant, mentioning their leaving Scandinavia, and their settling in the places we have spoken of above, with the names of some of their leaders. Besides these antient monuments and inscriptions, the northern writers endeavour to make it appear by other arguments, that the Goths came originally out of Scandinavia into Germany, and not out of Germany into Scandinavia, as Verstegan would have it. Their arguments are, 1. That the Scandian Goths were not subject to the Germans; but, on the contrary, the first inhabitants of the Chersonesus, and the adjacent places, to the Scandian Goths; which proves them to have been a colony. 2. It is hardly credible, say they, that the Germans should chuse to settle in Norway and Sweden, when they might have settled in a far more friendly climate, and fruitful soil, by only crossing the Rhine on one side, or the Danube on the other. They add, that no mention is made in history of any colonies sent out of Germany into Scandinavia; whereas we read of many coming out of Scandinavia to settle in Germany. Among these are reckoned by *Freculphus*⁶ the Franks, by Grotius the Vandals and *Lombards*⁷, and by Lazius and *Rhabanus Maurus*⁸ the Marcomanns. 3. Polygamy was not allowed among the Germans, as appears from *Tacitus*⁹; whereas those among the Goths, who had but four or five wives, were thought to live in a state of celibacy. It is therefore far more probable, that the Goths should increase so as to people other countries with their colonies, than the Germans; and accordingly

all the antients speak of the Goths issuing in swarms out of Scandinavia, which is therefore styled by Jornandes, as we have observed above, officina gentium, and vagina nationum. We may further add, that all the other Gothic nations owned themselves descended from those of Scandinavia, as we find attested by Ablavius, an ancient Gothic writer, by Roderichus Toletanus, and by Jornandes. These are the arguments urged by the northern writers against Verstegan and Cluverius, whose opinion, deriving the origin of the Goths from Germany, seemed so absurd to Grotius, that he could scarce forbear reviling those, who maintained it, especially Cluverius, whom he taxes with introducing new opinions, in defiance to the most authentic writers, and supporting, without the least regard to truth, what he thought would be best relished by his countrymen. Thus far of the origin of the Goths from the best antient as well as modern writers.

The customs,
laws, and manners of the

As for the manners of the Goths, they were famous for their hospitality and kindness to strangers, even before they embraced the christian religion; nay, from their being eminently good, they were called by the neighbouring nations Goths, that name being, according to Grotius, and most other writers, derived from the German word Goten, signifying good. They encouraged, says Dion, the study of philosophy, above all other barbarous or foreign nations, and often chose their kings from among their philosophers. Polygamy was not only allowed, but countenanced among them, every one being valued and respected, according to the number of their wives. By so many wives they had an incredible number of children, of whom they kept but one at home, sending out the rest, when come to man's estate, in quest of new settlements; and hence those swarms of people, that over-ran so many countries. With them adultery was a capital crime, and irremissibly punished with death. This severity, and likewise polygamy, prevailed among them, when they were known to the Greeks and Romans only by the name of Getes, as appears from the poet Menander, who was himself a Gete, and from Horace, who bestows great encomiums on the virtue and chastity of their women. As for their laws, they do not fall much short of those of the antient Romans, as will appear when we come to speak of the Alaric code, and the laws of the Visigoths in Spain, and the Ostrogoths in Italy. Their government was monarchical; for, as we have observed above out of Jornandes, in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, they had Filimer for king; in Dacia, Mesias, and Thrace, Xamolxes; and in that part of Scythia, which bordered on the Euxine sea, princes sprung from the illustrious families of the Amali and the Baltbi. Of the latter Jornandes gives us the following series, viz. Gaptus, Hulmul, Auges, Amalus, Isarna, Ostrogotha, Cniva, Araric, Auric, Giberic, Hermaneric. To these princes were subject both the Visigoths and Ostrogoths. The former inhabited the country lying between the Borysthenes and the Tanais, and were afterwards allowed by the Roman emperors to settle in Pannonia, Thrace, and Illyricum. The latter dwelt between the Danube and the Borysthenes, and, in the reign of Honorius, after having over-run Italy, settled in Gaul, as we shall relate anon. Upon the death of Hermaneric, the Visigoths were driven out of their native country by the Hunns, and were admitted by the emperor Valens within the Roman dominions. Theodosius allowed them lands in Thrace, whence, in the reign of Honorius, they broke into Italy, under the conduct of the celebrated Alaric, who took and plundered Rome. Alaric was succeeded by Ataulphus, who founded the kingdom of the Visigoths in Gaul, and Ataulphus by the following princes of the family of the Baltbi, viz. Sigeric or Rigeric, Walila, Theodoric, Thorismund, Theodoric II. Theodoric III. Euric, Alaric, Gesaleich, Amalaric, Theudis, Theudiselus, Athanauld, Linva, Leunigild, Ermenigild, Ricared, Linva II. Witteric, Gundemar, Sisebatus, Reccared, Suintila, Reccimir, Sisenand, Cindila, Tulga, Chindasuintus, Reccesuintus, Wamba, Ernigius, Egica, Witiza, and Roderic. Most of these princes were not only masters of Narbonne and Aquitain, but likewise of Spain, which they held till they were driven out of both, and their nation almost utterly extirpated, by the Arabs, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place.

These were Winitbar, Hunnimund, Thorismund, Wandalar, nephew to Hermanaric by his brother, and the three sons of Wandalar, viz. Walimir, Theodimir, and Widimir, who were all subject to Attila; but, upon that prince's death, they were allowed by the Romans to settle in Pannonia and Mæsia. Theodemir was succeeded by his son Theodoric, who, having overcome Odoacer, made himself master of Italy, and was acknowledged king of that country. His successors in that kingdom were, Atbalaric, Theodotus, Visiges, Ildebald, Eraric, Totila, and Teia, the last king of the Ostrogoths in Italy°. As to the religion of the Goths, The religion of the Goths. it seems to have been the same with that of the ancient inhabitants of Scandinavia and Saxony, of which we have spoken above†, and shall speak more at length in
- b the history of the northern kingdoms. Apollinaris Sidonius describes their dress thus: They are shod, says he, with high shoes made of hair, and reaching up to their ankles; their knees, thighs and legs are without any covering; their garments of various colours, scarce reaching to the knee; their sleeves only cover the tops of their arms; they wear green cassocks, with a red border; their belts hang on their shoulders; their ears are covered with twisted locks; they use hooked lances, and missile hatchets‡.
- As to the ancient history of the Goths, Jornandes, supposing them to be one and the same people with the Scythians, Getes, Sarmatians, and Sauromatae, ascribes to them all the exploits, that are said by the Greek and Latin writers to have been performed by those nations, especially by the Scythians. But of that warlike nation, and their migrations into Europe, under the names of Cimmerians, Celts, Gauls, &c. we have spoken elsewhere, and therefore shall confine ourselves here to the history of the Goths, from the time they became generally known by that appellation. The first Roman writer, that mentions the Goths, is Spartian, who, in the life of Caracalla, tells us, that he overcame in some encounters the Getes, who, says he, were the same people with the Goths°. The same author writes elsewhere†, that Maximin, afterwards emperor, upon the death of Caracalla, quitted the service, and, retiring into Thrace, kept up from thence a friendly correspondence with the Goths. His father, named Micca or Micca, was by nation a Goth, and his mother Ababa or Abala an
- d Alan°. Hence Vorborgus concludes the Goths to have been masters of the countries bordering on Thrace before Maximin was born, that is, before the year 177°. Caracalla was the first Roman emperor that quarrelled with the Goths, and the advantages he gained over them were, it seems, very inconsiderable; for, according to Spartian°, he overcame them only in a few skirmishes. This must have happened about the year 215. the fifth of Caracalla's reign; for about that time he marched from Germany into Dacia°, and the Goths held then, according to Grotius‡, part of that province. The Romans began very early to dread the power of that warlike nation; for even in the reign of Alexander, which began in 222. considerable sums were annually sent them from Rome to keep them quiet, and prevent them from disturbing the
- e peace of the empire. Thus Petrus the patrician, who adds, that the Carpi, dwelling in Sarmatia towards the present Poland, demanded the same sums, that were paid yearly to the Goths; but their request was rejected by Menophilus, whom that writer styles duke of Mæsia, that is, general of the troops quartered in that province°. The Goths, notwithstanding the large sums sent them yearly by the Roman emperors, hearing of the death of the emperor Maximin, who was of Gotbic extraction, as we have hinted above, and had been murdered by his own soldiers, resolved to revenge it; and accordingly, breaking into Mæsia, laid waste that province, and utterly destroyed the city of Istria or Istropolis, on the most southern mouth of the Danube°. Balbinus, who, with Maximus, had succeeded Maximinus, resolved to march against
- f them, but was in the mean time murdered, with his colleague, by the mutinous soldiery; so that the Goths, loaded with booty, retired beyond the Danube unmolested°. Not long after, they made themselves masters of Thrace; but were driven from thence beyond the Danube by the emperor Gordian about the year 242. the fifth of that prince's reign°. But Gordian dying, and Philip, who succeeded him, refusing to pay them their annual pension, they passed the Danube, and, entering Thrace, committed dreadful ravages in that province, as well as in Mæsia. Philip dispatched against them the senator Decius, who was afterwards emperor; but he, not thinking it adviseable to engage them, returned to Rome, after having discharged with disgrace the troops, that had suffered them to pass the Danube. These went over in a body to the enemy, commanded at that time by their king Ostrogotha, the grandson of Amalus, who received them kindly, and, being thus reinforced, laid siege to Marcianopolis, the capital of Mæsia; but, not being able to reduce it, he abandoned the undertaking for a large sum sent him by the inhabitants, who were glad thus to compound with him, and redeem themselves from the calamities attending long sieges. Ostrogotha was scarce returned to his own country, when Fastida, king of the Gepidæ, elated with the success, that had attended his arms against the Burgundians, whom he had almost utterly destroyed, sent him the following haughty message, viz. That the Gepidæ being streightened for want room, he must either allow them lands, or prepare for war. Ostrogotha answered, That he should be sorry to engage in a war with the Gepidæ his kinsmen (for they were a Gothic nation); but was determined to part with no lands. Hereupon both nations took the field, and a bloody battle ensued, in which the Gepidæ were defeated with great slaughter; but Ostrogotha, contenting himself with the victory, suffered the Gepidæ to retire, and live in their own country unmolested.

Ostrogotha was succeeded by Cniva, who, breaking into Mæsia, was defeated, with the loss of thirty thousand men, by Decius, the eldest son of the emperor of that name, whom, in the end, he overcame, and, having cut his whole army in pieces, obliged the young prince to save himself by flight into the neighbouring provinces. Having now no enemy to oppose him, he made himself master of Philippopolis on the Hebrus, put the inhabitants, to the number of one hundred thousand souls, says Ammianus, to the sword, ravaged Thrace, and laid waste great part of Macedon. Hereupon the emperor Decius, setting out from Rome, hastened into Pannonia; and, putting himself at the head of his army, he overcame the Goths in several engagements, and drove them out of the Roman dominions. But they returned soon after with a numerous army, headed by their king Cniva; which obliged Decius to take the field a second time, when he was attended, at first, with the same good success, as he had been in their former irruption; for he reduced them to such streights, that they offered to set at liberty all the prisoners they had taken, and relinquish their booty, provided he would suffer them to retire unmolested. But the emperor, who had sent Trebonianus Gallus, with a strong detachment, to cut off their retreat, thinking he had it now in his power to rid the empire of so troublesome an enemy, instead of hearkening to their proposals, marched with all his forces against them. The Goths, knowing that all lay at stake, received him with great intrepidity, and, fighting like men in despair, gained a complete victory. In the battle fell first Decius, the emperor's eldest son, and then the emperor himself, upon whose death the Goths made a dreadful havock of the disheartened army. We only touch upon these events here, having related them at length elsewhere. Decius being killed, Gallus was by the soldiery proclaimed emperor in his room; but he, instead of revenging the death of the late emperor, and the overthrow of the army, concluded a peace with the Goths, suffering them to retire unmolested with all their booty, and the prisoners they had taken at Philippopolis, and elsewhere; nay, he engaged to pay them yearly a considerable sum, provided they continued quiet in their own country. However, three years after, that is, in 253. they entered the Roman territories in an hostile manner, probably because their pension was not paid them. But Æmilianus, who commanded the troops in Pannonia, marching against them, put them to flight, and drove them quite out of the empire, though his soldiers, at first, betrayed great unwillingness to engage so formidable an enemy. This Zonaras relates in a manner, which we do not well comprehend; for he supposes the Goths, who were overcome and put to flight by Æmilian, to have lived in friendship and amity with the Romans. In 256. the Goths, with the Carpi, the Barani, and the Burgundians, all nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, made a new inroad into the empire, laying waste,

- a according to Zosimus ^m, all Illyricum, and Italy itself, without meeting with the least opposition. But this we can hardly believe, since no other writer takes notice of any ravages committed by them in Italy. They continued all this year in Illyricum, laying the country waste far and wide; but the following year Aurelian, afterwards emperor, being sent to succeed Ulpus Crinitus in the command of the troops in Thrace and Illyricum, drove them out of those provinces, took a great number of them prisoners, and, pursuing them beyond the Danube, laid waste their country, and returned to Thrace loaded with booty ⁿ. After this, they continued quiet till the year 262. The Goths lay waste Thrace and Macedon. the ninth of the emperor Gallienus, when, breaking unexpectedly into Thrace, they made themselves masters of that province, and from thence over-ran all Macedon,
- b and laid siege to Thessalonica; but, not being able to reduce it, they attempted to enter Acbaia, when Macrianus, who had assumed the title of Augustus, arriving in Greece on his march into Italy, fell upon them unexpectedly, and obliged them to save themselves by flight into their own country ^o. At the same time another party of the Goths, having crossed the Hellepont under the conduct of one Rajpa, committed dreadful ravages in Asia, plundered several cities, and even the famous temple of Diana at Ephesus ^p. Jornandes tells us, that, in this irruption, they destroyed the city of Chalcedon, which, though afterwards rebuilt, says he, by one Cornelius Avitus, and enriched by the neighbourhood of Constantinople, yet, for the space of three hundred years and upwards, shewed the dreadful marks of its former ruin ^q. On their
- c return, they laid in ashes the poor remains of antient Troy; and, having repassed the Hellepont, they made an attempt upon Anquialum in Thrace; but, having spent some days in vain before that place, they abandoned the enterprize, and, after having ravaged Thrace, returned home, carrying with them an immense booty ^r. The following year 263. they made a new irruption into Asia, but were soon driven out by the Roman troops quartered there ^s. Two years after, that is, in 265. they made themselves masters of all Dacia beyond the Danube, extending from that river to the Carpathian mountains, which had been reduced by Trajan to a Roman province, and joined to Mæsia by a bridge, the most magnificent and wonderful of all that emperor's works ^t. Encouraged with this success, the following year, having built an
- d incredible number of vessels, they embarked on the Euxine sea, and, landing at Heraclea in Pontus, over-ran Asia Minor, Lydia, and Bithynia, made themselves masters of Nicomedia, plundered the Greek cities in those countries, and laid waste the provinces of Phrygia and Troas ^u. In Bithynia they met with some opposition; for we are told, that a battle was fought there; and, from what happened afterwards, it appears, that the Goths carried the day; for on one side the Romans, dissatisfied with the conduct of Gallienus, were for setting up another emperor; and on the other the Goths, pursuing their ravages, advanced as far as Galatia and Cappadocia, laying waste, without restraint, the countries through which they passed ^v. Eutropius, and after him St. Jerom ^x, and Orosius ^y, mention the ravages committed by the Goths in
- e Pontus and Asia; and Philostorgius names several cities ruined by them in Galatia and Cappadocia ^z. We learn from St. Basil, that Dionysius, who was raised to the see of Rome in 259. and died in 270. wrote a consolatory letter to the church of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, sending at the same time considerable sums to redeem the christian captives ^a, among whom were many holy ecclesiastics, who could not be ransomed, says Philostorgius ^b, because they were destined by Heaven to convert their conquerors. In the mean time the brave Odenatus, of whom we have spoken at length in our Roman history ^c, pitying the miserable condition, to which Asia was reduced by the Goths, hastened to the relief of that province. But the Goths, unwilling to engage
- f so renowned a commander, reimbarqued at Heraclea, and, by the Euxine sea, returned home with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives ^d. Many of them however were drowned, being attacked on their return by the Roman fleet ^e. The following year, they embarked anew on the Euxine sea, and, landing at the mouth of the Danube, laid waste great part of Mæsia; but were defeated by the troops and generals who guarded Byzantium. However, they advanced as far as

Illyricum; but being informed there, that the Heruli had received a dreadful overthrow in Greece, they began to retire, when Marcian and Claudius, whom Gallienus had sent against them, pursuing them close, cut great numbers of them in pieces^f; nay, Claudius was for cutting off their retreat, as might have been easily done, and putting them all to the sword; but Marcian thought it more adviseable to suffer them to retire^e. To be revenged on Claudius, they no sooner heard, that he was raised to the empire, than, stirring up all the northern nations against him, they assembled on the banks of the Tyras, now the Niester, and there built, says Zosimus^b, six thousand ships; but Pollio, who makes the most of this war, writes, that their vessels amounted only to two thousandⁱ, and he is therein followed by Ammianus Marcellinus^k. Having employed the whole year 268. in making the necessary preparations, they embarked, to the number of three hundred and twenty thousand fighting men, and, landing in Lesser Scythia, laid siege, at the same time, to the city of Tomi in that province, and to Marcianopolis in Mæsia; but being, in several attacks, repulsed at both places, they re-embarked on the Euxine sea, and entered the streights of the Bosporus, where, by the rapidity of the current, and the great number of their ships running foul of one another, they suffered a great loss both of men and vessels, and besides, they met with a vigorous opposition from the inhabitants of Byzantium^l. Making therefore what haste they could out of the streights, they attacked the city of Cyzicus on the Propontis; but, not being able to reduce it, they abandoned the enterprize, and, entering the Ægean sea, they refitted their shattered vessels at mount Athos in Macedon, and then laid siege to Cassandria and Thessalonica, two cities in the same province. But, when they were upon the point of making themselves masters of both, news was brought them, that Claudius approached at the head of a powerful army^m. That prince, upon the first news of their breaking into the empire, had dispatched his brother Quintillus against them, but, under him, committed the chief command of the army to Aurelian, afterwards emperor, whom he had, on that occasion, appointed general of all the troops in Thrace, Illyricum, and the other frontier provinces; but, when he was informed of the number of the enemy's forces, he resolved to head the army in personⁿ. Zonaras writes, that while they were deliberating at Rome, whether the emperor should march against the Goths, or against Tetricus, who had usurped the empire in Gaul, and was then besieging Autun, Claudius told them, That the war with Tetricus was his; but that with the Goths was the war of the Roman people, whose interest he preferred to his own^o. However, he could not set out so soon as he wished, it being no easy matter, as the empire had been quite exhausted by his predecessor Gallienus, to make the necessary preparations for an expedition of such importance, and to draw together an army fit to be commanded by him^p. The Goths therefore, abandoning the siege of Thessalonica upon the first report of his approach, advanced into the country lying on the river Axius, plundered Pelagonia, and committed great ravages in the neighbourhood of Doberus in Pæonia, where they were vigorously attacked by the Dalmatian horse, who signalized themselves on this occasion, and killed near three thousand of the enemy^q. The rest took their rout to Upper Mæsia, and were met by Claudius in the neighbourhood of Naissus, whom they immediately engaged^r. The victory continued long doubtful; nay, the Romans at first gave ground; but, returning through certain narrow passes to the charge, they fell unexpectedly upon the Goths, who, after a long and obstinate resistance, were in the end put to flight, and utterly routed^s. Such of them as had the good luck to make their escape, returned towards Macedon, covering their rear with their waggons; but they found no fence against the famine that raged amongst them, and daily carried off great numbers of men and horses. The Roman cavalry, attacking them in front, cut off many thousands of them, and, by guarding the passes of Macedon, obliged them to shut themselves up on mount Hæmus, where they passed the winter in the greatest hardships imaginable^t.

- a being able to reduce one single city. However, Zonaras tells us, that they made themselves masters of Athens; and that having laid together in one heap all the books they found there, with a design to set fire to them, they would have deprived the world of that unvaluable treasure, had not one among them, more discerning than the rest, told his companions, that, while the Greeks amused themselves with those books, they neglected the art of war, and were easily overcome. The same author adds, that Cleodemus, a native of Athens, having assembled some troops and vessels, attacked them by sea, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to save themselves by flight into other countries. From Athens they sailed to the islands of Crete, Rhodes, and Cyprus; but no-where performed any thing worth mentioning.
- b nay, they lost great numbers of their men by the plague, that raged among them. They returned therefore to winter in Macedon, where the contagious distemper completed their ruin. Those who had taken refuge on mount Hemus, as we have related above, were, before the end of winter, reduced by the plague and famine to a very small number; so that Claudius might have saved himself the trouble of attacking them. However, that prince, bent upon their utter destruction, marched against them early in the spring, and, having shut them up on all sides, in different skirmishes, put several thousands of them to the sword. Nevertheless the infantry having one day attacked them without the cavalry, which was employed elsewhere, the Romans, after having behaved some time with great gallantry, turned their backs, and fled. On this occasion, the loss on the side of the Romans was very considerable, and had been much greater, had not the cavalry come seasonably to their relief. Pollio perhaps speaks of this encounter, where he owns the Romans to have lost in an attack near two thousand men. But these were, as that writer tells us, Roman soldiers, who, after having put the enemy to flight, were busied in plundering their baggage; and Claudius, according to him, was not yet arrived in the camp: whereas Zosimus writes, that the infantry attacked the enemy by the emperor's orders; but he may therein be mistaken. However that be, the Romans, not in the least disheartened with this loss, continued harassing the Goths without intermission, and streightening them daily more and more. As the plague at the same time made a dreadful havock among them, they were in the end obliged to submit, and beg quarter; which was granted them. Some of them were incorporated among the Roman troops; to others lands were given to cultivate; and a small number of them found means to make their escape. We have inserted elsewhere two letters relating to this war, written by the emperor himself, the one to the senate, while he was upon the point of engaging the enemy, the other, after the battle, to Junius Bressus, governor of Illyricum. As the army was composed of divers northern nations, and followed by a great number of women, servants, and children, all the provinces of the empire were filled with captives, among whom were several kings, and women of distinction. The emperor caused some of their waggon to be burnt, and gave the rest, with a great number of slaves, to the public. For this victory, Claudius took the surname of Gothicus; in the second year of his reign, that is, before the twenty-fourth of March of the present year 270. but soon after died, at Sirwinum of the plague, which had contributed so much to his victory over the Goths. He was succeeded by his brother Quintillus, during whose short reign the Goths, who had made their escape from mount Hemus, plundered the city of Anquialum in Thrace, and made an attempt upon Nicopolis in Lower Macedonia; but were driven out of that province by the Roman troops quartered there. Themistius speaks of their taking both Anquialum and Nicopolis; but this must have happened in some other irruption. The same year 270. the Goths, notwithstanding the losses they had sustained, broke anew into the empire, and, entering Pannonia, laid waste that province; which Aurelian, who had been just raised to the empire, no sooner understood, than he left Rome, and, putting himself at the head of the army, marched against them. As the enemy did not retire at his approach, a battle ensued, which lasted till night coming on parted the two armies, without the least advantage on either side. However, the Goths, not caring to renew the combat, repassed the Danube in the dead of the night, and sent ambassadors the next morning to sue for peace^b; which was readily granted them, the Alemans being at that time in arms, and ready to invade Italy; which they did accordingly, as we have related elsewhere^c. But this peace was not of long duration; for two years after, that is, in 272. Aurelian, on his march into the east against the celebrated Zenobia, found them ravaging Thrace, and drove them out of that province; nay, he even passed the Danube, and having engaged Cannabaud, a Gotbic prince, slew him, and five thousand of his men^d. It was perhaps on this occasion, that the emperor took a chariot drawn by four stags, which he afterwards made use of in his triumphal entry into Rome; for he is said to have taken it from a Gotbic prince^e. Among the prisoners were ten women, who had fought in the habit of men, and a great many more were found among the dead. The emperor, in a letter to Gallonius Avitus, governor of Thrace, mentions some Gotbic women of distinction, whom he had sent to Perinthus to be kept there, and entertained in a manner suitable to their rank^f. Among these was a woman of the blood royal, named Hunila, whom the emperor gave in marriage to Bonofus, one of his generals, who, in the reign of Probus, usurped the sovereignty, as we have related elsewhere^g. Two years after, the Gotbs settled in Dacia beyond the Danube, abandoned by Aurelian, who was well apprised, that he could not maintain it, without an immense charge, in the midst of so many barbarous nations^h. The following year 275. they entered, in separate and numerous bodies, Pontus, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Cilicia, pretending to have been invited by Aurelian, who died some months before, to serve as auxiliaries against the Persians; but Tacitus, who had succeeded that prince, not thinking it advisable to trust them, endeavoured, by fair means, and even by offering them considerable sums, to induce them to return home. His offers were accepted by some; but others refusing to retire upon any terms, the emperor, and his brother Florianus, fell upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and drove the rest quite out of the empireⁱ. Of this victory mention is made on one of Tacitus's medals^j; and from an antient inscription may be gathered, that he took the surname of Gotbicus^k. In 278. the second of the reign of Probus, they broke into Thrace, and advanced as far as Illyricum, laying waste the country with fire and sword; but they no sooner heard, that the emperor was marching against them, and had already entered Rhatia, than they withdrew, leaving their booty behind them. From Rhatia the emperor pursued his march into Illyricum, and thence into Thrace, where he was met by deputies from all the Gotbic nations, either suing for peace, says Vopiscus^l, or submitting to his power. No further mention is made of the Gotbs till the year 289. the fifth of Dioclesian's reign, who is said to have gained a complete victory over the Sarmatians, that is, the Gotbs; nay, Eumenes writes, that the whole nation of the Sarmatians was cut off, and the province of Dacia beyond the Danube, which they had seized, re-united to the empire^m. For this victory Dioclesian assumed the surname of Sarmaticus, as appears from several antient coins and inscriptionsⁿ. But that the advantages he gained over the Gotbs were greatly exaggerated by Eumenes, is manifest from another panegyrist^o, who, in a speech he pronounced two years after in the presence of the emperor, takes notice of the victories lately gained by the Gotbs over the Burgundians dwelling on the banks of the Danube, whom they had overcome, and were then bent upon utterly extirpating the whole nation; which it would be no easy matter for them to effectuate, the Burgundians being powerfully supported by the Alans and Thervingians. He adds, that another Gotbic nation, assisted by the Taisala, made war upon the Vandals and Gepids. The Gotbs therefore were still a powerful nation, and had not been, as Eumenes boasts, utterly extirpated by Dioclesian; nay the panegyrist, whom we have quoted above, ascribes their not disturbing the peace of the empire to their being engaged in wars with other barbarous nations, and not to any awe they stood in of Dioclesian.

From the year 289. the fifth of Dioclesian's reign, to the year 321. the fifteenth of Constantine's, the Gotbs gave no disturbance to the empire, being engaged, as we have observed above, in wars with the neighbouring nations. But all we know of these wars is, that they not only overcame the Burgundians, but likewise the Vandals,

- a with their king Visumar, a prince of great renown, and descended from the Ardingi, the most illustrious family of that nation. The Vandals were, it seems, quite driven out; for we are told, that they begged and obtained Pannonia of the emperor Constantine ¹. The Goths were no sooner disengaged from other wars, than they broke into the empire; but they were overcome by Constantine in several battles fought at Campana in Pannonia, and at Marga and Bonnonia in Upper Mæsia ². Zosimus speaks of a city besieged by Raufimodes king of the Sarmatians, and relieved by Constantine, who, having defeated the enemy, and put them to flight, pursued them ^{But are overcome by Constantine.} across the Danube, and forced them to a second battle, in which great numbers of them were slain, and among the rest the king himself. Such as escaped the general slaughter, submitted to Constantine, who returned from this expedition with an incredible number of captives ³. Notwithstanding this defeat, the following year the Goths broke anew into the empire, while the emperor was busied in making a port at Thessalonica, and, over-running Thrace and Mæsia, ravaged both provinces, and took a great many prisoners ⁴. It was on occasion of this irruption, that Constantine enacted the two laws, dated the twenty-eighth of April 323. whereof the one commands those to be burnt alive, who shall lend the least assistance to the barbarians, or receive any part of their booty; the other forbids the tribunes of the cohorts, and the other subalterns, to suffer the soldiers to be absent from the camp and their colours, on pain of death, in time of war; and of banishment, and confiscation of their estates, in time of peace ⁵. Constantine marched against the Goths with incredible expedition, and, falling upon them, gave them a total overthrow, and pursued them with great slaughter into the dominions of Licinius; which that prince highly resenting, a war was kindled between him and Constantine, of which we have spoken at length elsewhere ⁶. Some writers are of opinion, that the victory gained at this time over the Goths gave rise to the Gotbic sports, which began, according to Bucherius's kalendar, on the fourth, and ended on the ninth, of February. The Goths, thus overcome, sued for peace; which was granted them, upon their setting at liberty all the prisoners they had taken ⁷; nay Constantine entered, it seems, into an alliance with them; for they assisted him against Licinius with a body of forty thousand men, ^{They assist Constantine against Licinius.} who were distinguished by the name of fœderati, or allies ⁸. These are, without all doubt, the Goths, who, as we read in an anonymous writer published by Valesius ⁹, fought at the battle of Chalcedon, under the conduct of one of their princes named Alaquæa. Notwithstanding the peace and alliance they had made with Constantine, they began about eight years after, that is, in 332. to make new inroads into the empire. Zosimus writes, that the Taisala, a Gotbic nation, having broken into the Roman territories with five hundred horse, Constantine, who was then in Mæsia, suffered them to lay waste the country to the very gates of his camp; and that, instead of putting his troops in battle-array to oppose them, he betook himself to a precipitous flight, after having lost great part of his army ¹⁰. Zosimus is the only author, ^{They make new inroads into the empire.} who relates this event, altogether incredible. Socrates tells us, that the Goths and Sarmatians over-ran some provinces, but were overcome and driven out by Constantine ¹¹. The same year, a war breaking out between the Goths and Sarmatians, the latter had recourse to Constantine, who, glad of the opportunity that offered to humble that fierce nation, fell upon them while they were busied in plundering the territories of the Sarmatians, and gained a memorable victory over them on the twentieth of April. Near an hundred thousand of the enemy were either cut in pieces, or perished after the battle with hunger and cold; which obliged Araric their king to sue for peace, and deliver hostages to the emperor, among whom was his own son ¹². This victory is ascribed by some to Constantine Caesar, and the emperor Julian tells us, that ^{But receive a dreadful overthrow. Year after Christ 332.} one of Constantine's sons awed the Goths with his victories ¹³. But Eutropius ¹⁴ and Eusebius ¹⁵ tell us in express terms, that the Goths were overcome by Constantine in a great battle; nay Eusebius writes, that Constantine, scorning to pay tribute to the barbarians, as other emperors had done, marched against them, while they were engaged in a war with the Sarmatians, and, having subdued the whole nation, obliged, what by dint of arms, what by treaties, the innumerable tribes, into which they were divided, to obey his commands^o. Sozomen and Socrates write, that the victory ^a he gained over them was so evidently miraculous, that the Goths, acknowledging the power of the God adored by Constantine, great numbers of them embraced the christian religion, which had been first preached among them about the year 270 P (A). Jornandes takes no notice of the victory gained over the Goths by Constantine; but only tells us, that they supplied his army with a body of forty thousand men, which was kept always complete⁴. Eutropius writes, that Constantine, having granted a peace to the Goths, left among them a great opinion of his humanity and good nature⁵; and Eusebius, that he even preferred to great dignities and employments the most illustrious among them⁶. In the time of Themistius was still to be seen at Constantinople, behind the hall where the senate used to assemble, a statue, which ^b Constantine had caused to be erected in honour of the father of Atbaneric king of the Goths; but this was done, says our author, to soften and gain over that barbarian⁷.

THE Goths not only continued quiet, but served the Romans with great fidelity, during the remaining part of Constantine's reign, and in the reigns of Constans, Julian, Jovian, and *Valentinian I*⁸. But in 364. the first of Valens, they broke into Thrace, and laid waste that province⁹. The emperor, who was yet scarce well-seated on his throne, instead of employing his troops against them, sent them a considerable sum; which they no sooner received, than they forbore all hostilities, and returned home¹. The following year 365. while the emperor was in Bithynia, news was brought him, that the Goths were ready to break anew into Thrace. Hereupon Valens dispatched a ^c body of troops to reinforce those, that, under the command of count Julian, were posted on the banks of the Danube; which prevented their passing that river². In the mean time Procopius having revolted, and assumed the title of emperor, the Goths, espousing his cause, sent a body of three thousand men to his assistance; but Procopius being defeated, taken, and put to death, before their arrival, they continued in the territories of the empire, committing great ravages in Thrace and Mæsia. Valens dispatched a strong detachment against them, who, having cut off their retreat, obliged them to lay down their arms, and yield themselves prisoners³. Hermanaric

(A) The Goths, says Sozomen (1), and the other barbarous nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, had embraced the christian religion long before Constantine was sole master of the empire, providence having made use of the very ravages they committed under Gallienus and his successors, to convert them to the true faith; for, having crossed over from Thrace into Asia, and there taken an incredible number of captives, and amongst the rest several holy ecclesiastics, who, by only invoking the name of Jesus, cured their sick, and delivered such among them as were possessed with the devil, they began to hearken to their doctrine; and observing, on the other hand, that their lives were quite blameless, many of them resolved to follow the example, that was set them by such wonderful men, and to acknowledge the God, whom they adored. Accordingly they took them for their teachers, hearkened with respect to their instructions, received the sacrament of baptism, built churches, and there celebrated, like other christians, the holy mysteries of our religion. Having embraced our faith, they divested themselves of their former fierceness, and led thenceforth more regular lives. Thus Sozomen, and what he writes is confirmed by Philostorgius, who, speaking of the ravages they committed in Asia, Gallia, and Cappadocia, under Valerian and Gallienus in 266. tells us, that they carried back with them, among the many other captives, the successors of Wulphilas, who, about the latter end of the fourth century, was revered by them as their prophet (2). This gives some light to what we read in St Basil, viz. that from Cappadocia were brought to the Goths the first seeds of the christian religion (3). St Cyril of Jerusalem in 347. names the Goths and Sarmatians among the nations, that had bishops, priests, deacons, monks, virgins, and even martyrs (4); for the whole nation did not at once embrace the christian religion; nay, after it was preached among them, they had some pagan kings, who persecuted the christians (5). Sozomen writes, that the barbarians, who inhabited Gaul, and the banks of the Rhine, down to the ocean, embraced the christian religion by the same means, and at the same time, as those who dwelt on the Danube (6). However, we find no footsteps of christianity among the Franks, whom Sozomen seems chiefly to hint at, till the reign of Clovis, which began about the year 468. Eusebius, who began, according to St Basil (7), the conversion of the Goths, and the other illustrious captives, fulfilled in a literal sense what we read in the prophet Isaiah: And the people shall take them, and bring them to their place, and the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of the Lord for servants and handmaids; and they shall take them captives whose captives they were, and they shall rule over their oppressors (8). To them may be likewise applied the words of Tobit, In the land of my captivity do I praise him, and declare his might and majesty to a sinful nation (9).

- a was then king of the Goths, of those at least, who by Ammianus are styled Greuthungi, and by Jornandes, Ostrogoths; but the above-mentioned body of troops had been sent to the assistance of Procopius by Atbanaric, whom Ammianus calls sometimes one of the most powerful men among the Goths^a, and sometimes the judge of the Thervingian Goths^b, that is, according to Jornandes, of the Visigoths^c. He was a man of great courage, and yet his courage, says Themistius^d, fell short of his penetration, eloquence, and address. He no sooner received the news of the captivity of his men, than he dispatched ambassadors to Valens, requiring they might be set at liberty, since they had been sent by a friend and ally of the Romans to the assistance of a Roman emperor. At the same time the letters were produced, which he had received from Procopius. On the other hand, Valens sent Victor, general of the horse, to complain of Atbanaric, for assisting a rebel against his lawful sovereign. The Goths answered, that they had looked upon Procopius as the kinsman of Constantine; and that it was not their business to examine whether he was, or was not, a lawful prince; and therefore, if they were deceived therein, the emperor ought to excuse them^e. But Valens could not be prevailed upon to set the captive Goths at liberty, being bent, as he was then engaged in no other wars, upon humbling that powerful nation^f. With this view, great preparations were made throughout the empire; which occasioned no small consternation among the people, who, as they had a mighty opinion of the valour of the Goths, dreaded the issue of this war^g. At the same time, in the dismantling of Chalcedon, certain verses were found engraved on a stone, which doubled their fears; for they seemed antient, and foretold a dreadful inundation of barbarians in Thrace^h. The emperor himself seems to have been under no small apprehension of this war; for Theodoret tells us, that, before he set out on so dangerous an expedition, in order to render Heaven propitious to his undertaking, he received the sacrament of baptismⁱ. The Goths, on the other hand, finding the emperor bent upon war, began to draw together their forces, with a design to attack him the first; which Valens no sooner understood, than he ordered his troops to take the field, though in the depth of winter, and soon after came in person to head them. Upon his arrival, he sent strong detachments to guard the banks of the Danube, and encamped, with the rest of the army, in the neighbourhood of Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Mœsia^k. Ammianus^l and Zosimus^m tell us, that early in the spring he left Marcianopolis, and, having passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, he ravaged the enemy's country far and near, without meeting with the least opposition, the Goths having retired at his approach to the neighbouring mountains. In the beginning of the autumn he led back his army to the Roman dominionsⁿ, and passed the winter at Marcianopolis, whence, as soon as the season was fit for action, he marched to the banks of the Danube, with a design to cross that river, and pursue the ravages he had begun the year before; but the Danube continuing swelled beyond measure the whole summer, he was obliged to remain encamped in the same place, till the latter end of autumn, when he returned to Marcianopolis, and there took up his winter-quarters^o.

THE following year 369. the emperor marched into Lesser Scythia, and, having passed the Danube at Noviodunum, advanced far into the enemy's country, destroying all with fire and sword. The Goths, not daring to keep the field, lay concealed in the woods and morasses, whence they frequently sallied out upon the Romans. Against them the emperor employed not the soldiers, but the servants of the army, and those who attended the baggage, promising them a certain sum for each head they should bring. Hereupon, avarice supplying the place of courage, they resolutely entered the woods and marshes, and, hunting the Goths like wild beasts, put great numbers of them to the sword in their very asylums; which struck them with such terror, that they sent ambassadors to sue for peace^p. Thus Zosimus; but Ammianus writes, that Valens, having attacked and overcome in several encounters the Greuthungi, a warlike nation of the Goths, dwelling at a considerable distance from the Danube, at last gave a total overthrow to Atbanaric, who, at the head of a numerous army, had ventured to engage him ^a. After this victory, Valens returned to Marcianopolis, with a design to winter there, and renew the war early in the spring. But in the mean time the Goths earnestly suing, by repeated embassies, for peace, he was at last prevailed upon by the senate of Constantinople to hearken to their proposals¹. What induced the senate to become mediators in behalf of a nation by them so much dreaded, and now reduced to the utmost distress, we are no-where told. Valens, after returning a favourable answer to the ambassadors, approached the Danube, and appointed Victor and Arintheus to treat with the Goths. After some conferences, a peace was concluded highly honourable for the Romans; for, in virtue of this treaty, the Goths were not, for the future, to pass the Danube, or set foot on the Roman territories, on any account whatsoever, barring that of trade, which was now confined to two cities on the Danube; whereas they had been formerly allowed to carry it on with what cities of the empire they pleased. They were not to expect or claim the pensions which had been paid them annually by other emperors; but Valens consented to continue Atbanaric's pension to him. This peace was ratified and signed by Valens and Atbanaric, who met for that purpose in boats in the middle of the Danube, the latter absolutely refusing to pass that river, by reason his father had obliged him, as he pretended, solemnly to swear never to tread on Roman ground². Valens, having thus concluded a peace with the Goths, ordered the forts on the Danube to be repaired, and some new ones to be built, and then, leaving strong garrisons in them, as if he distrusted the barbarians, he returned to Marcianopolis, and from thence to Constantinople. At this time Hermanaric was king of the Goths, as we have hinted above: he was descended from the noble family of the Amali, and had signalized himself in several wars; insomuch that he was compared to Alexander the Great. Jornandes names the many northern nations he subdued; but he might as well have spared himself that trouble, most of them being utterly unknown³. Among the rest he mentions the Heruli dwelling near the Palus Mæotis; the Venedi on the German ocean; and the Astii on the borders of the present Prussia and Poland; nay, Ablavius, as quoted by *Jornandes*⁴, assures us, that Hermanaric was obeyed by all the nations both of Scythia and Germany. However, not thinking himself in a condition to withstand the Hunns, who, passing the Palus Mæotis in 376. over-ran his country, he chose rather to lay violent hands on himself, than to behold the calamities that threatened his people⁵. He was succeeded by Vitimir, who, attempting to make head against the Hunns, was killed in a battle. His son Vitberic, driven out by the Hunns, retired with his people to the present Podolia, lying between the Nieper and the Danube. Atbanaric, king or chief of the Thervingi or Visigoths, alarmed at this sudden irruption of the Hunns, encamped, with all the forces he could assemble, on the banks of the Danastus or Niester, in order to dispute with the enemy the passage of that river, parting the country of the Thervingi from that of the Greuthongi or Ostrogoths. But the Hunns, falling upon him when least expected, obliged him to abandon his country, and take refuge in the present Moldavia, where he fortified himself with a wall from the Pruth to the *Danube*⁶.

A general consternation being now spread among the Goths, such of them as had the good luck to escape the dreadful havock, which the Hunns made of their nation, either submitted to them, or fled for refuge to the Roman dominions. Two hundred thousand of them were admitted by Valens into Thrace, upon their promising to live peaceably there, and to serve, when wanted, in the Roman armies. But, being justly provoked at the cruel treatment they met with from the Roman officers, who were to supply them with provisions, they had scarce entered Thrace, when they began to mutiny, and plunder the country. This gave rise to a long and bloody war between them and the Romans, the particulars whereof we have related at length in our Roman history⁷, to which we refer the reader. At length they submitted to Theodosius I. in the year 382. and were allowed by him to settle in Thrace and Mæsia; which two provinces were almost quite dispeopled by the frequent incursions of the neighbouring barbarians, and the late destructive war⁸. The emperor exempted them from all the tributes and taxes, that were paid by the other subjects of the empire. Great numbers of them entered into the Roman service, but formed a sepa-

- a rate body, and were commanded by officers of their own nation; which proved the source of many evils: but as they were well acquainted with the avarice, injustice, and cruelty of the Roman officers, they refused to put themselves into their power, and insisted upon their continuing united, in order to secure themselves against such insults, as they had reason to apprehend, when dispersed among the Roman troops. Zosimus does not forget to blame the conduct of Theodosius, and his want of foresight, in suffering them to continue united, not only in the army, but in the countries that were allotted them^b; and Synefius thinks it was highly impolitic to suffer them to settle upon any terms within the Roman dominions; for speaking to Arcadius, The Goths, says he, after having been punished by the arms of Theodosius for the evils they
- b had brought upon the empire, were forced, with their wives and children, to implore the clemency of that prince, who, as he was naturally generous and merciful, suffered himself to be overcome by the prayers of those, whom he had overcome with his arms. He granted them all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens, and distributed lands among them; which was encouraging all the other barbarians to demand, and even to exact, the same favour; and hence flowed the many evils, under which the empire has long groaned^c. Thus Synefius. But Themistius, who lived in those very times, in a speech, which he pronounced before the emperor himself, told him, that he had learnt by experience how dangerous a thing it was to reduce the Goths to despair^d. And truly, as the Hunns had seized on their country, the emperor must
- c either have allowed them settlements within the Roman dominions, or cut them all off; which it was highly dangerous for him to attempt, the Goths not being yet weakened to such a degree, as not to be able to make a stand, and even endanger the empire. Besides, people were wanting to inhabit and cultivate Thrace, where the lands had long lain fallow and uncultivated. Hence Zosimus himself, tho' no great friend to Theodosius, owns, that, partly by his victories, and partly by his treaties, he put a stop to the evils, that had almost overwhelmed the empire; that under him trade began to revive, and likewise agriculture, the husbandman cultivating his lands, and attending his flocks, without the least apprehension of seeing himself bereft by the barbarians of the fruits of his labour^e. What chiefly induced the Goths to lay
- d down their arms, and submit to Theodosius, was, if Orosius is to be credited, that prince's generous behaviour to Athanasius, who being, by a faction at home, driven out of the country, which he had kept, in spite of the Hunns, beyond the Danube, came to Constantinople, notwithstanding his pretended oath never to tread on Roman ground. The emperor went out to meet him, received him with great marks of friendship, and attended him into the city, which he entered on the eleventh of January 381^f; but died soon after, viz. on the twenty-fifth of the same month (B). The emperor caused him to be buried after the Roman manner, with such pomp and solemnity, that the Goths, who had attended him in his flight, out of gratitude to the emperor, who had thus honoured the memory of their deceased prince, took
- e upon them to guard the banks of the Danube, and prevented the Romans from being attacked on that side^g; nay the Goths, who had, for several years, maintained a war with the Romans in the very heart of the empire, were so taken with the generosity and good nature of Theodosius, that they renounced all further thoughts of war, and submitted to the laws of the empire. Thus Orosius^h, and likewise Idatius, and count *Marcellinus*ⁱ. Soon after the submission of the Goths, a soldier of that nation having committed some disorder at Constantinople, the populace fell upon him, and, would not have let slip this opportunity of upbraiding that prince with treachery and perfidiousness, had he only suspected him to have been any-ways accessory to the death of Athanasius, who had put himself under his protection. The manner he speaks of this death plainly shews, that no one entertained the least suspicion of any violence. Hence De Pontac thinks we ought to read in St. Prosper, occidit, instead of occiditur.

(B) Prosper writes, that Athanasius was killed (10); but he was therein certainly mistaken; for Ammianus, who lived in those times, and count Marcellinus, tell us in express terms, that he died a natural death (11); and Zosimus, with all the other writers, only that he died, which must be understood of a natural death; for, had it been violent, they would have expressed themselves in a different manner, Zosimus especially, a declared enemy to Theodosius,

having murdered him, threw his body into the sea. The emperor, fearing the Goths might, upon this provocation, fly to arms, and renew the war, resented his death to such a degree, that he deprived the people of the bread, which, by his orders, was daily distributed among them. The emperor however was appeased after a few hours, and the order he had given revoked ^l.

^{The Ostrogoths break into the empire.} ^{But are defeated by Theodosius. Year after Christ 386.} THE Goths, who were allowed by Theodosius to settle in Thrace, were, for the most part, Thervingians, or Visigoths. As for the Greuthungians, or Ostrogoths, they continued in their antient seats, but subject to the Hunns, who, as we have hinted above, suffered them to be governed by their own kings. However, great numbers of them, not able to brook that subjection, in the year 386. broke into the empire under the conduct of Odotheus, whom Claudian honours with the title of king ^b. Their design was to settle, as their countrymen the Visigoths had done, in some of the Roman provinces; but Theodosius, fearing the empire might be thus over-run by the barbarians, marched against them in person, with his son Arcadius, gave them a total overthrow, and returned, with an incredible number of captives, to Constantinople, which he entered in triumph on the twelfth of October of the present year ^m. This victory is likewise mentioned by count Marcellinus, who tells us, that Theodosius delivered Thrace from the barbarians, who had invaded that province; and that he afterwards returned, with his son, in triumph to Constantinople ⁿ. Claudian too speaks of a victory gained in the fourth consulship of Honorius, that is, in the present year 386. over the Greuthungians, and their king Odotheus ^o. This is, without all doubt, the victory, which Zosimus describes in two places; but, to rob Theodosius of the glory that was due to him, he would make us believe, that it was intirely owing to Promotus, who commanded in Thrace, in quality of general of the foot ^p. According to that writer's account, Odotheus having assembled an incredible number of barbarians, among whom were several nations never before heard of, Promotus fell upon them, as they were attempting to pass the Danube, and, having utterly defeated them, invited Theodosius, who was encamped at a small distance, to come and see the great number of prisoners, and the immense booty, he had taken ^q. This, according to Zosimus, is all the share Theodosius had in that victory. But all other authors suppose the emperor to have commanded his troops in person; nay Claudian ^d tells us, that he engaged Odotheus himself, who was killed in the battle. The far greater part of this numerous army being either cut in pieces, taken prisoners, or drowned in the Danube, the emperor ordered Majoranus, who commanded under him, to cross the Danube, and lay waste the enemy's country; which he did accordingly, without meeting with the least opposition ^r. Theodosius ordered all the prisoners to be set at liberty, and even made them rich presents, in order to entice them into his service, says Zosimus, and employ them against Maximus, of whom we have spoken at length elsewhere ^u.

^{The Goths stirred up by Rufinus to invade the empire.} THE Goths continued quiet from this time to the year 395. the first of Arcadius and Honorius, when they were stirred up by the famous Rufinus to invade the empire. ^e Rufinus governed with an absolute sway in the east under Arcadius; and Stilicho, with the same arbitrary sway, ruled in the west under Honorius; but as the latter pretended to have been appointed by Theodosius guardian to both his children, he was preparing to march into the east to dispossess his rival of the authority he had usurped. Rufinus therefore, to divert this storm, resolved to set all in a flame, and involve the whole empire in the utmost confusion. With this view, he privately stirred up the Hunns, who advanced as far as Antioch, destroying all with fire and sword, as we have related above. At the same time he encouraged the celebrated Alaric to put himself at the head of his countrymen the Visigoths, and to break into Greece. Alaric was descended from the family of the Balthi, the most illustrious of the Gothic nation, after that of the Amali. He passed the Danube in 376. with his countrymen driven out of their own country by the Hunns, and served, with great reputation, in the war between the Romans and Goths, which lasted from that time to the year 382. when they all submitted to Theodosius, and were allowed to settle in Thrace, upon condition of their serving, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Pursuant to this agreement, they attended Theodosius in his expedition against the usurper Eugenius; on which occasion

- a Alaric commanded a body of his countrymen. As Theodosius had preferred him to no higher rank, he was highly dissatisfied, and even threatened to revolt. Rufinus therefore, finding him thus disposed, encouraged him by his emissaries, and even by privately conveying to him considerable sums, to assemble as many barbarians as he could, and with them lay waste the Roman provinces, assuring him, that he might penetrate as far as Greece, without the least opposition ^w. Alaric, thus animated, assembled a numerous army, consisting chiefly of his countrymen, among whom served a body of Hunns, who, that winter, had passed the Danube on the ice, and, entering Pannonia, laid waste that province, as he did afterwards Macedon and Thessaly. When he drew near the famous streights of Thermopylae, Gerontius, one of Rufinus's creatures, who guarded them, withdrew, pursuant to the orders he had received from his patron, and opened a free passage for the barbarians into Greece, where they raged with incredible fury, rifling the temples, pillaging the cities, and committing such ravages and devastations, as were felt by the unhappy inhabitants for many years after, Antiochus, at that time proconsul of Achaia, and another of Rufinus's creatures, never offering to oppose them ^z. Thus was the whole country between Dalmatia, the Adriatic gulf, and the Euxine sea, laid waste, and the city of Constantinople itself, in a manner, besieged, parties of the barbarians advancing, with great boldness, to the very gates of that metropolis. Rufinus, attired after the Gothic manner, went out, as he said, to treat with them, and was received by the barbarians with extraordinary marks of esteem; which confirmed the suspicion most people entertained of his treachery ^y. News of these ravages were no sooner brought to Stilicho, than he resolved to march to the relief of Greece; in which undertaking he embarked the more readily, as he hoped it would afford him an opportunity of ruining his rival Rufinus, and getting the whole power of both empires into his own hands. Leaving therefore Gaul, where he then was, he set forward with all the western troops, and those likewise of the east, that had been left in the west after the defeat of Exuperius. He passed, with incredible expedition, the Julian Alps, crossed Dalmatia, and, entering Thessaly, was but at a small distance from the enemy's army, when an officer arrived in the camp, with a peremptory order from Arcadius to send him forthwith the oriental troops, and return with the rest into the west. This order Rufinus had procured, concluding that, if the barbarians were overcome and repressed, the storm would fall upon his own head. However, Stilicho, not daring to disobey it, sent back the troops belonging to the eastern empire, under the conduct of one Gainas, by nation a Goth, and his intimate friend, and returned with the rest to Italy, leaving the Goths to pursue their ravages without controul ^x. Zosimus writes, that they spared the city of Athens, defended, says he, by Minerva and Achilles, whose power Alaric dreaded, and therefore entered the city as a friend, and would not suffer his men to commit any ravages in Attica. But St. Jerom, who wrote at that very time, tells us, that the Athenians, and all the other Greeks, submitted to the barbarians ^a. Claudian names the Athenians among those, who were carried into captivity ^b; and Eunapius ascribes to the ravages committed by Alaric the intire suppression of the ceremonies, religion and sacrifices of Ceres and Proserpine, which had continued at Athens till that time ^c. Thus the remains of idolatry, which the christian princes had never been able to abolish with their laws, were at length utterly extirpated by Alaric and his Goths. During these ravages, several philosophers, overzealous for the worship of their gods, were either put to the sword by the Goths, or died of grief in seeing their mysteries despised, their gods trod under foot, and their altars pulled down. Among the former were Proterus, Hilarius, and Priscus, a celebrated magician, who had been one of the emperor Julian's chief favourites ^d. Thus the Goths continued in Greece, and the other Roman provinces, all the year 395. and part of 396. destroying all with fire and sword, and sending into their own country an incredible number of captives, with the whole wealth of the ravaged provinces.

As Arcadius, to whom these provinces belonged, seemed intirely to neglect them, Stilicho, pitying the condition to which they were reduced, set out anew with the western troops to relieve them. He embarked on the Adriatic sea, and, landing in Peloponnesus, cut off great numbers of the barbarians in several encounters, and obliged the rest to take refuge on a mountain in Arcadia, named Pholoe, at a small distance ^a from Pisa. But, after he had shut them up on all sides, and even turned the course of a river, that supplied them with water, he suffered them, by his misconduct, says Zosimus, to escape, to withdraw out of Peloponnesus unmolested, and to ravage Epirus in their retreat ^c. After this, he returned to Italy, suffering his soldiers to destroy and carry off whatever had escaped the avarice and fury of the Goths ^f. Orosius thinks that Stilicho's design was to deliver Greece, without destroying the barbarians, whom he might, some time or other, have occasion to employ; and therefore he often overcame them, often shut them up on all sides, but always suffered them in the end to escape ^e. But the poet Claudian tells us, that Stilicho would have put Alaric and all his men to the sword, as he had already killed great numbers of them on the mountains of Arcadia, had not Arcadius taken them under his protection, and ordered Stilicho to withdraw his troops out of Greece, a province belonging to the eastern empire ^b. Arcadius had, without all doubt, been induced to conclude a peace with the barbarians by the eunuch Eutropius, who had succeeded Rufinus, not only in his power and employments, but in his cruelty, avarice, and other detestable qualities. He was no less jealous of Stilicho's great power, than his predecessor had been; and therefore, to rob him of the glory of delivering the empire, and triumphing over the barbarians, he persuaded the emperor to conclude a peace with them, and order Stilicho, to whom he must otherwise have been highly indebted, to leave the barbarians, and return with his forces into the west. Soon after, Alaric was appointed, no ^c doubt in virtue of this treaty, commander of the troops in East Illyricum, which comprised Greece, and the other provinces he had laid waste ¹. Claudian complains, and indeed with a great deal of reason, that the barbarian, who, in defiance to the most sacred ties, had turned his arms against the empire, should be preferred and enriched, and the person, to whom the empire owed its safety, stripped of all his honours, and reduced to poverty ²; for Stilicho, though he immediately retired with his troops out of Greece, pursuant to the orders of Arcadius, yet that prince caused him to be declared a public enemy by the senate of Constantinople, and the lands he had in the east to be seized and confiscated ¹. It was, without all doubt, after Alaric had been raised to this dignity, and not during the war, that, coming to Athens with a small attend- ^d ance, he was received by the inhabitants, as we read in Zosimus ^m, with all possible marks of honour.

ABOUT three years after, new disturbances were raised in the east by two Goths, subjects of the empire, and in the Roman service, viz. Gainas and Tribigild. The former had, under Theodosius, the chief command of all the Goths and other barbarians in the Roman armies, to which post he had been raised, by degrees, from a common soldier. He reconducted, as we have hinted above, the eastern army to Arcadius, and, on that occasion, caused Rufinus to be cut in pieces by the soldiery, in the manner we have related elsewhere ⁿ. For this eminent piece of service, he was preferred by Eutropius, who succeeded Rufinus in all his employments, to the post of ^e general of the Roman horse and foot; but, not yet satisfied, he resolved to dispatch Eutropius, as he had done Rufinus, hoping, if he was once removed, to succeed him in his power and authority. With this view he persuaded Tribigild to revolt, who, at the head of a numerous body of his countrymen under his command at Nicolia in Phrygia, over-ran that province, and likewise Pisidia, pillaging the cities, and putting to the sword such of the inhabitants as fell into his hands. Eutropius dispatched a body of troops against him, under the conduct of one Leo, who was greatly attached to his interest; but, as he was a person in every respect unfit for that command, Tribigild, falling unexpectedly upon him, cut most of his men in pieces. Leo himself, attempting to make his escape, perished among the marshes. At length Gainas, ^f who pretended to be highly provoked against Tribigild, on account of his revolt, was sent against him; but he, keeping the whole time a private correspondence with the rebels, instead of opposing them, encouraged them to rage with greater fury than ever, magnifying, in all the letters he wrote to the emperor, the conduct of Tribigild, his exploits, and the number of his troops, and suggesting, that the only means to save the empire from imminent ruin, was to comply with his demands, the chief of which was, that Eutropius, the author of the present calamities, should be delivered

- a up into his hands. A report being spread at the same time, that the king of Persia was preparing to invade Syria, the emperor, to put an end to the domestic disturbances, resolved at last to sacrifice the minister to the welfare of the state; and accordingly, having sent for him, caused him to be stripped of the consular ensigns, and discharged him. He was afterwards banished to the island of Cyprus; but Gainas having caused several charges to be brought against him, he was conducted from thence under a strong guard to Pantycium, between Chalcedon and Nicomedia, and there tried, condemned, and beheaded^o. We only hint at these events here, having related them at length elsewhere^p. Eutropius being thus dispatched, Gainas, joining Tribigild with all the forces under his command, laid waste several provinces, and, approaching Constantinople, obliged the emperor to come to an agreement with him, upon terms highly dishonourable to the imperial dignity^q. Soon after, he formed a design of plundering the city of Constantinople, and enriching himself, and his Goths, with the spoils of that wealthy metropolis; but, failing in his attempt, he pulled off the mask, and, making open war upon the empire, ravaged the neighbouring country, and thence marched into the Chersonesus, with a design to cross over into Asia. But being attacked in his passage by Fravitus, who was likewise a Goth, but greatly attached to the Roman interest, he was obliged to return to the coast whence he had sailed. From the Chersonesus he marched back to Thrace, and was there, according to Socrates^r, and Sozomen^s, cut in pieces, with all his men, by the Romans, who pursued him. Zosimus writes, that, being desirous to end his days in the ancient country of the Goths, he passed the Danube, but was met on the frontiers by Uldin king of the Hunns, then masters of those countries, and, after a sharp dispute, cut in pieces, with all his men^t. As for Tribigild, all we know of him is, that he perished in Thrace, before Gainas passed the Danube^u; but, in what manner, we are no-where told.

- DURING the above-mentioned disturbances raised by the Goths in the east, the western provinces were alarmed with a sudden irruption of the same barbarians, under the conduct of Alaric. Arcadius, as we have related above, entered into a treaty with him, and appointed him commander in chief of all the Roman forces quartered in East Illyricum. The Goths, who were subject to the empire, created him, according to Jornandes^v, about the same time, their chief and general, with the title of king of the Visigoths. He was, in this very year 400. when he first broke into Italy, general of the Illyrian troops; whence some have thought he made that irruption by order of Arcadius, and as his general; for Arcadius never well agreed with his brother Honorius. But it is not at all probable, that Arcadius should chuse to make war upon his brother, while most of his forces were employed against Tribigild and Gainas. What Jornandes writes seems to us far more probable, viz. that the Goths, despising both Arcadius and Honorius, and discontented because they had not sent them the usual presents, resolved to make war on the empire, in order to enrich themselves with the spoils of so many wealthy provinces; and with this view it was that they chose Alaric for their chief, and even gave him the title of king^x. However that be, it is certain, that, in the year 400. the Goths, under the conduct of Alaric, entered Italy, and committed there dreadful ravages, laying the country waste far and near, and carrying off with them an incredible number of captives, as we have related elsewhere^y. Two years after, Alaric entered Italy anew, and ravaged, without controul, the provinces of Venetia and Liguria, there being then no army in Italy to oppose him. The emperor Honorius, who then resided at Milan, not thinking himself safe there, retired to Ravenna; which thenceforth became the usual place of his residence. In the mean time Stilicho, having assembled what forces he could, marched against the enemy, whom he found encamped at Pollentia on the Tanaro in Piedmont. There the two armies engaged; but, as to the issue of the battle, there is a great disagreement among authors, as we have observed in our Roman history^z. The wife of Alaric, with his children and daughters-in-law, fell into the hands of the Romans; which he no sooner understood, than he sent deputies to Stilicho to sue for peace; which was readily granted him, and the captives sent back, upon condition of his marching forthwith out of Italy. Pursuant to this agreement, he repassed the Po; but, having plundered the country in his retreat, Stilicho detached a strong body of barbarians against him, by whom he was defeated, and obliged to take refuge among the mountains, where they kept him blocked up, till most of his men forsaking him, and joining the Romans, he privately withdrew in the night-time, and returned through by-ways into Thrace^a. Three years after, Radagaisus invaded Italy with an army of two hundred thousand Goths, and other barbarians dwelling beyond the Danube and the Rhine, who were then all blended under the common name of Goths; but this numerous army was defeated and cut in pieces, and Radagaisus himself taken prisoner by Stilicho, with the assistance of a body of Hunns and Goths, who served the Romans as auxiliaries, under the conduct of Uldin and Sarus^b. Of this invasion we have given a particular and distinct account in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader^c.

immense sum.

THIS storm was scarce blown over, when another was raised by Stilicho, who, in order to kindle a war between Arcadius and Honorius, persuaded the latter, that not only West Illyricum, but the whole province, belonged to the western empire; nay, he even prevailed upon the weak prince to appoint Alaric general of all the Roman troops in West Illyricum, in order to recover, with them and his own Goths, that part of the province, which he pretended to be unjustly withheld from him by his brother Arcadius. Stilicho, in thus setting the two brothers at variance, had nothing less in view than the raising of himself to the empire; for, while the Goths invaded the eastern empire, his countrymen the Vandals, and their allies, were to break into the western provinces, and there second his treacherous and wicked design^d. At the same time that he acquainted Alaric with his promotion, he caused a considerable sum to be transmitted to him, to defray the charges of the war; which he no sooner received, than leaving Pannonia and Dalmatia, where lands had been granted to him and his Goths, he entered Epirus, then belonging to the eastern empire, and there waited for orders from Stilicho to begin hostilities. But while that general was upon the point of setting out from Ravenna to join him with the Roman forces, he was stopped by letters from Arcadius, acquainting him with the revolt of Constantine in Britain, and, by a false report, with the death of Alaric^e. Hereupon Alaric, after having long continued inactive in Epirus, left at length that country, and, bending his march towards Italy, arrived at Æmona, now Lanbach, between Upper Pannonia and Noricum. Thence he continued his rout, and, passing the river Aquila, and the streights of the mountains that bound Pannonia on that side, where a handful of men might have stopped his whole army, he entered Noricum^f. From thence he dispatched a messenger to Arcadius, demanding a sum of money for the time he had spent in Epirus, and the trouble of marching his troops into Noricum. Upon this demand the senate being assembled, (for Honorius was then at Rome) Stilicho pleaded so warmly in his favour, that it was agreed four thousand pounds weight of gold should be sent him^g. But the emperor putting off from time to time the payment of this sum, Alaric entered Italy, and, marching strait to Rome, laid siege to that metropolis, and, in a short time, reduced it to such streights, that the unhappy inhabitants, afflicted both with the plague and famine, were obliged to redeem themselves with an immense sum; which Alaric no sooner received, than he raised the siege, and retired with his army into Heitruvia^h. But soon after, he returned anew before Rome, the emperor shewing great backwardness to execute the articles of the treaty between Alaric and the Romans, which he himself had ratified. On this occasion, the Romans, after a few days siege, opened their gates to Alaric, who entered the city attended by a small guard, obliged the Romans to renounce their allegiance to Honorius, and acknowledge Attalus, then prefect of Rome, for emperor. But Honorius having, in the mean time, declared, that he was ready to comply with the terms proposed by the Goths, Alaric deposed Attalus, and, leaving Rome, approached Ravenna, where the emperor then was, in order to put the last hand to the treaty of accommodation. But the emperor refusing to comply with the terms proposed to him, Alaric departed in a great rage from the neighbourhood of Ravenna, and, return-

- a ing before Rome, took and plundered that wealthy metropolis, as we have related at length elsewhere¹. From Rome Alaric marched into Campania, and, having ravaged that and the neighbouring provinces of Lucania, Samnium, Apulia and Calabria, he approached the streights of Sicily with a design to pass over into that island, and thence into Africa; but he was seized in the neighbourhood of Rhegium with a fit of sickness, which carried him off in a few days. The Goths chose Ataulphus, whose sister the deceased prince had married, king in his room; for to Alaric, as we have observed above, the Goths had given the title of king of the Visigoths. Ataulphus, leaving Italy after he had quite drained it of its wealth, marched into Gaul, and there reduced the cities of Narbonne and Toulouse^k. Soon after, he married with great solemnity Placidia, the sister of Honorius, who had been taken with many other captives at Rome, and treated, both by Alaric and him, with all the respect due to her rank and sex. After this marriage, Ataulphus seemed mighty desirous of concluding a peace with Honorius, and turning his arms against the Alans, Vandals, Suevians, Burgundians, Franks, and other barbarous nations, that had broken into Gaul; but all the measures that were taken by him, and his wife Placidia, to bring about an accommodation, being defeated by Constantius, and his party, who bore a great sway at court, the war was renewed, and Ataulphus in the end obliged to retire with his Goths into Spain, where he was soon after murdered in the manner we have related in our Roman history^l. Before his death he charged his brother, not named by any historian, to send back Placidia to the Romans, and live in friendship with them; but the Goths, instead of his brother, chose for their king Sigeric, or Sergeric, brother to Sarus, whom Ataulphus had put to death. Sigeric was no sooner proclaimed king of the Visigoths, than, to revenge the death of his brother, he caused the six children Ataulphus had by a former wife to be inhumanly murdered^m. He seemed inclined to live in peace and amity with the Romans, and desirous of being employed by them in driving out the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, who had entered Spain in 409. and in the space of two years reduced almost the whole country, and divided it among them; but he was assassinated by his own people the seventh day after his election, perhaps on account of his cruelty to the children of his predecessor *Ataulphus*ⁿ. In his room was chosen Vallia, after he had caused all those to be assassinated, who stood in competition with him for the crown^o. As the chief provinces of Spain were already possessed by the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, he resolved to pass over into Africa, and attempt the reduction of that country, which still continued subject to the Romans; but the fleet he was sending thither being shipwrecked, and a great number of Goths on board of it drowned, he not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance, with the Romans, upon the following terms; viz. that Placidia, whom the emperor had promised to Constantius, should be sent back; that the Goths should make war upon the barbarians, who had settled in Spain, restoring to the Romans the places and territories they should recover out of their hands; that, on the other hand, the Romans should reward the Goths with lands within the empire, and send them forthwith six hundred thousand measures of corn. Pursuant to this agreement, the promised corn was immediately sent to the Goths, who were then in the utmost distress; and they no sooner received it, than Vallia sent back Placidia to her brother, and began to make the necessary preparations for the intended war with the barbarians in Spain^p. Jornandes writes, that Constantius advanced at the head of a powerful army to the frontiers of Spain, with a design to make war upon Vallia, in case he refused to send him Placidia, who had been promised to him in marriage; that Vallia came to meet him, on the Pyrenean mountains, with an army no ways inferior to his; and that the above-mentioned peace and alliance was there concluded^q. But Jornandes is so little acquainted with the history of those times, even that of his own nation, that we cannot give intire credit to any thing he writes.

An alliance being thus concluded between the Romans and the Goths in Catalonia, in 416. Vallia, without loss of time, fell first on the Vandals, called Silingians, who had settled in Betica or Andalusia, and having, in several successful encounters, cut off great numbers of them, he obliged the rest to abandon their country, and take refuge among the Alans in Celtiberia, now the kingdom of Arragon. Against these a he marched next, and made such a dreadful havock of that nation, that their king Ala being killed, the few who remained, instead of chusing him a successor, fled for protection to Gonderic, king of the Vandals, who had settled in Galicia, and submitted to him. To reward these eminent services of Vallia and his Goths, Honorius bestowed on them Aquitania Secunda, comprising the present archbishoprick of Bordeaux, and some neighbouring cities, that is, the whole tract from Toulouse to the sea; to which was added, soon after, Novempopulania, or Aquitania Tertia, that is, the provinces of Auch and Gascony. Vallia, on the other hand, yielded to the Romans, not only the country he had taken from the Vandals and Alans, but likewise Catalonia, which the Goths had held ever since their entering Spain, under the b conduct of Ataulphus their second king. Vallia fixed his residence at Toulouse, which by that means became, and continued to be, for the space of eighty-eight years, the metropolis of the kingdom of the Visigoths. Vallia died soon after he had brought his Goths back into Gaul, that is, in the year 418. according to the chronicle of Idatius, having reigned only three years. He left behind him one daughter, married to a Suevian, by whom she had the famous Ricimer, of whom we have made frequent mention in our Roman history.

makes war, and then concludes a peace, with

Vallia was succeeded by Theodoric, who, breaking the alliance which his predecessor had concluded with the Romans, made himself master of several places in Gaul belonging to them, and even laid siege to Arles; but, at the approach of Actius, c he abandoned the enterprize, and returned to Toulouse. He made peace soon after with the Romans; for Sidonius tells us, that after the siege of Arles, which the Goths had attempted in vain to reduce, several Gauls were delivered up to them as hostages, and among the rest one Theodorus, who was nearly related to Avitus, afterwards emperor: he adds, that Avitus went to visit his kinsman at the court of Theodoric; on which occasion he rejected the great offers, with which Theodoric endeavoured to entice him into his service. After this, the Goths continued quiet in the countries, that had been allotted them in Gaul, for the space of ten years, that is, to the year 436, when the Romans being engaged in a war with the Burgundians, Theodoric laid hold of that opportunity to enlarge his dominions. Having, d therefore made himself master of several cities, he laid siege in the end to Narbonne. But the Romans having in the mean time concluded a peace with the Burgundians, count Litorius hastened to the relief of the place at the head of a body of auxiliary Hunns, and, falling upon the Goths, put them to flight, and entered the city, each horseman carrying with him two bushels of corn; which proved a seasonable relief to the inhabitants, reduced, by the long siege, to the utmost extremity. Idatius ascribes the raising of the siege to Actius; probably, because Litorius commanded under him, and acted by his orders. The Romans pursued the war against the Goths with great vigour, and equal success. In 438. a battle was fought, in which Actius, who commanded the Roman forces, cut eight thousand of them in pieces. The following year, Litorius, who commanded the auxiliary Hunns, gained great advantages over them, and even laid siege to Toulouse, their capital. Theo- doric, who was in the place, sent several bishops to Litorius, hoping, by their mediation, to prevail upon the Roman general to accept the advantageous terms, which he offered; but Litorius, who thought the Goths reduced to the last extremity, openly declaring, that he would hearken to no proposals, Theodoric marched out at the head of his men, and offered him battle; which he not declining, as a more prudent commander would have done, both armies engaged with the utmost fury. Victory continued a long time doubtful, the loss being equal on both sides; but Litorius having in the end advanced too far at the head of his Hunns, in whose f valour he chiefly confided, the Goths, making a last effort, cut most of them in pieces, put the rest to flight, and, having surrounded Litorius, who had received a dangerous wound, took him alive, and carried him, with his hands tied behind his back, into the city, which he had hoped to enter that very day in triumph. Theodoric caused him to be exposed for some time to the insults and outrages of the populace and children, and then to be thrown into the public prison; where, after he had undergone inexpressible hardships, he was by the king's orders put to

After this victory the Goths might have extended their conquests to the Rhone; and this resolution they had taken, according to Sidonius, Aetius, who at that time had neither men nor money^c, being no-ways in a condition to oppose them. However, Theodoric, at the request of Avitus, then prefect of Gaul, and by him had in great esteem, readily hearkened to the proposals that were made to him, and concluded a peace with the Romans on the same terms he had offered them before the battle^d.

SOME years after, that is, in 453. Theodoric, entering into an alliance with the Romans, assisted them powerfully against the Hunns, who had entered Gaul, and, heading his own troops in person, distinguished himself in the famous battle of Chalons; but, falling unluckily from his horse, he was, according to some, trod to death by his own people, who did not know him; according to others, killed by a Goth, named Andagus, who served under Attila, and was descended from the royal family of the Amali^e. He was succeeded by his son Thorismund, who had fought under his father, and had been wounded in the same battle. The young prince was for revenging the death of his father on the Hunns, and attacking Attila in his camp; but Aetius, fearing the Hunns, whom he considered as a check upon the Goths and Franks, might be thus intirely cut off, craftily advised him to return home, lest his brothers should raise disturbances during his absence, and, seizing on the royal treasures, give rise to a civil war. Thorismund followed his advice, and, returning with his troops to Toulouse, was there received as king with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable^f. Being soon after apprised of the deceitful advice given him by Aetius, he broke the alliance he had made with the Romans, and laid siege to Arles; but was prevailed upon by Ferreolus, prefect of Gaul, to drop that enterprize, and retire^g. Sidonius writes, that Ferreolus did more by an entertainment, than Aetius could have done with an army; that by his obliging manner, and agreeable conversation, he gained Thorismund, and saved Arles^h. The same year Thorismund had a favourable opportunity of revenging, on the Hunns, the death of his father; for Attila having invaded Gaul anew, with a design to make war upon the Alans, next neighbours to the Visigoths, and, by reducing them, get footing in Gaul, Thorismund joined the Alans with all his forces, engaged Attila, and, having gained a complete victory over him, obliged him to return with shame and disgrace into his own countryⁱ. Gregory of Tours writes, that he overcame and subdued the Alemanns and the Alans^k. It appears from Sidonius, that his dominions extended to the Rhone^l: that writer styles him the haughty and untractable king of Gothia^m; for in his whole conduct he betrayed great pride and arrogance, was incapable of living himself, or suffering others to live, in peace, and seemed to delight in nothing but wars and slaughter. On the other hand, his brothers Theodoric, Frederic, Turic, or rather Euric, Rotemer, and Himnaris, were inclined to peace; which occasioned daily quarrels between them and the king. At length, his brothers, especially Theodoric and Frederic, finding they could by no other means divert him from engaging in new wars, resolved to dispatch him. Being therefore one day let blood on account of some slight indisposition, while his vein was still open, one of his officers, named Ascaleru, having first removed privately his arms, cried out aloud, that assassins were coming in to murder the king, and at the same time threw himself upon him with several others. Thorismund, missing his weapons, with the only arm he had free, laid hold of a foot-stool, and with it dispatched some of the conspirators; but was in the end overpowered and slainⁿ. and he is followed therein by Isidore, who will have Thorismund to have reigned only one year; but Prosper places the death of that prince in 453. and the year must have been near ended, since Thorismund was then, according to Jornandes^o, in the third year of his reign.

Thorismund was succeeded by his brother Theodoric, a prince, according to Sidonius^p, whom he honoured with his intimacy, of uncommon parts, and great accomplishments, but in point of religion a mere hypocrite. The same writer calls him elsewhere a martial prince, who even surpassed his illustrious parent, the glory of the

A friend to the Gothic nation, and the support of the Roman empire not able to maintain itself with-
Romans. out the assistance of the barbarians, whom the Romans had so often overcome ^a.

He was, it seems, a man of some learning, and well versed in the Latin poets ^r. In the beginning of his reign he not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance, with the Romans, sending his brother Frederic with a chosen body of troops into Spain, to make war upon the Bagaudeæ, who, driving out the Romans, had seized on great part of Hispania Tarraconensis. Frederic recovered several places out of their hands, which he restored to the Romans ^t. However, in the year 455. the emperor Maximus apprehending, that Theodoric designed to break with the empire, sent Avitus, who was greatly esteemed and respected by the Goths, to the court of Toulouse, to divert that storm. Avitus was received by the king with ^b the greatest marks of friendship and esteem, and the peace between the two nations confirmed. But in the mean time Maximus dying, Theodoric pressed Avitus to assume the sovereignty, promising to assist him to the utmost of his power. Avitus, encouraged with this promise, suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor by the Goths at Toulouse, on the tenth of July; and was, on the eighth of August, acknowledged and proclaimed anew at Arles by the Roman soldiery, and all the persons of distinction in Gaul. Theodoric went immediately, attended by his brothers, to Arles, to congratulate the new prince on his accession to the empire, and was received by him as one to whom he was chiefly indebted for the dignity he enjoyed ^u. The following year, the Suevians, taking advantage of the confusion which the assassination ^c of Valentinian III. and Maximus had bred in the empire, over-ran and pillaged the province of Cartagena, with a design to drive the Romans quite out of Spain. Hereupon Avitus dispatched count Fronto to Requiarius their king, putting him in mind of the treaties concluded between him and the Romans: Theodoric likewise interposed his good offices, conjuring Requiarius, who had married his sister, not to disturb the public tranquillity; and at the same time acquainting him with the engagements which he had entered into with Avitus ^v. What answer Requiarius returned to the ambassadors our historian does not tell us; but he had no sooner dismissed them, than, assembling his forces, he entered the province of Tarraco, which then belonged to the Romans, and there committed unheard-of ravages, ^d without any regard to the faith of treaties, or the laws of justice. Upon this, Theodoric sent him a second embassy, to which he answered, with great haughtiness, that he did not understand, why the king of the Goths should concern himself with his affairs; that if he found fault with his conduct, he would soon give him an account of it at Toulouse. Theodoric, piqued at this answer, began to prepare for war; but in the mean time Requiarius, entering anew the province of Tarraco, laid it waste far and near, carrying with him into Galicia a great number of captives ^w. Soon after, Theodoric, having concluded a peace with all his neighbours, left his own dominions, and, with the consent and approbation of Avitus, entered Spain at the head of a numerous army, consisting of Goths and Burgundians; the latter, ^e whom he had called to his assistance, being commanded by their king Hilperic or Chilperic. Requiarius met him about twelve miles from Astorga on the Urbicus, now the Orbegua: hereupon a battle ensued, in which the Suevians were utterly defeated, and their king, who was dangerously wounded, obliged to fly for shelter to the most distant corner of Galicia ^x. This battle was fought on the fifth of October, and Theodoric, pursuing the fugitives, entered Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of the same month, and gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers, who abstained from slaughter, and spared the sacred virgins, but committed all other disorders ^y. Requiarius had retired to a place called Portucal, thought to be the present city of Porto on the Dauno; and from thence attempted to make his escape by sea; but, ^f being driven back by a storm, he was taken and delivered up to Theodoric, who kept him under close confinement till December, and then ordered him to be put to death ^z. The Suevians, disheartened by the captivity of their king, and destitute of a leader, were most of them either taken prisoners, or put to the sword; tho' Theodoric had strictly enjoined his men to spare all, who laid down their arms, and submitted ^{aa}. Thus was the power of the Suevians reduced by the Goths to the lowest ebb. Some authors think, that Avitus, who owned himself indebted to

^a Theodoric for the imperial dignity, had yielded to him all the countries in Spain he should recover out of the hands of the Suevians: others are of opinion, that Avitus being in the mean time deposed, Theodoric thought he might retain for himself the countries he had conquered in the name of that prince. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the king of the Visigoths, appropriating to himself the countries he had taken from the Suevians, appointed one Aquiulpbus to govern them. Aquiulpbus, ^{which he retains.} or, as others call him, Acliulpbus, was not a Goth, as Jornandes takes care to tell us, but born in the country of the Warni, who are thought to have passed about this time from Lower Saxony into Frisia and Holland^b. He therefore, without any regard to the most sacred ties, abandoned the Goths, and, retiring into Galicia, endeavoured

^b to persuade the Suevians dwelling there to acknowledge him for their king^c; but a powerful army being sent against him by Theodoric, he was overcome in battle, taken and beheaded^d. Thus Jornandes; but Idatius only says, that he died in the month of June of the following year 456. at Porto^e. The Suevians, who, refusing to submit to Theodoric, had retired into Galicia, upon the news of the death of their king, chose one of their own nation, named Maldra, in his room.

THE following year 457. Theodoric, having almost intirely reduced the Suevians in Galicia, passed from thence into Lusitania, and there, after having laid in ashes several cities and villages, besieged and took Merida the metropolis of that province; but was, as we are told, deterred from plundering it by some prodigies that happened. He continued at Merida till Easter, which this year 457. fell on the thirty-first of March, when receiving some disagreeable tidings from Gaul, not specified in history, he returned in great haste to Toulouse. However, he left in Spain a body of troops, composed of different nations, with orders to reduce the Suevians in Galicia, who had not yet submitted to the Goths. These forces, being on their march admitted as friends into the city of Astorga held by the Romans, or rather by some banditti, who called themselves Romans, fell unexpectedly upon the inhabitants, put great numbers of them to the sword, set fire to the city after they had plundered it, and, having ravaged the neighbouring country, pursued their march, carrying with them an immense booty, and a great many captives,

^c among whom were several ecclesiastics, and two bishops. We are told, that they had express orders from Theodoric to act in this manner^e. The city of Palentia met with the same treatment; but the castle of Coviac, about thirty miles from Astorga, making a vigorous resistance, the Goths, after several unsuccessful attempts, in which they lost great numbers of their men, abandoned the enterprize, and returned to Gaul^f. In their room Theodoric sent another army into Spain, commanded by one Cyrila; but we read of no other exploits performed by them, besides the ravaging the province of Betica, now Andalusia^g. Idatius writes, that ambassadors were sent at this time by the Goths and Vandals to the Suevians; but he does not tell us, what was the subject of their embassy^h. Perhaps the Goths and

^d Vandals had entered into an alliance with the emperor Majorianus, and were endeavouring to draw the Suevians into the same league; but they did not therein succeed; for the following year Theodoric recalled Cyrila, and sent another general, named Sunieric, in his room, with orders to pursue the war with the *Suevians*ⁱ, who nevertheless ravaged the province of Lusitania under the conduct of Maldra their king, and Galicia under that of his son Remismund, whom Jornandes calls Richmund^m. Theodoric, tho' thus engaged in war with the Suevians, broke at the same time, upon what provocation we know not, with the Romans, and, taking unexpectedly the field, made himself master of several cities in Gaul belonging to them. But Majorianus, who was then at Arles, marching against him with

^e what troops he could assemble, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him ^{Is defeated by Majorianus!} to sue for peace, which was readily granted him, upon his promising to assist the Romans against the Suevians and *Vandals*ⁿ. But Majorianus dying soon after, Theodoric thought himself no longer obliged to maintain the peace he had concluded with him; and therefore made himself master of several places in Gaul belonging to the Romans, and among the rest of Narbonne, which was betrayed to him by one Agrippina. From Narbonne he marched to Arles, which he invested, but was obliged to raise the siege by Egidius a native of Gaul, whom Severus, the successor of Majorianus, had appointed commander in chief of the Roman forces there^a. The following year 463. Ægidius gained a signal victory over the Goths in the neighbourhood of Orleans. In this battle great numbers of the Goths were slain, and, among the rest, Frederic, the king's brother, who commanded in chief^b. The Goths being overcome and dispersed, Ægidius laid siege to Chinon in Touraine; but the vigorous resistance he met with obliged him to drop the enterprize, and retire^c. The Goths were attended with better success in Spain than in Gaul; for Idatius speaks of them as now masters of the whole country, except part of Galicia, which was still held by the Suevians; and the provinces of Tarraco and Cartagena, which belonged to the Romans, and were governed by a duke; for in 465. a Roman, named Vincentius, resided at Tarraco with that title^d. The provinces subject to the Goths were governed by the generals Sunieric and Nepotianus, the former a Goth, and the latter a native of Languedoc, which was subject to the Goths.

In the year 464. died Ægidius, and upon his death the Goths, says Idatius^e, made themselves masters of the far greater part of Gaul. But he is therein certainly mistaken; for Berri, Sens, and Auvergne, still belonged to the Romans in 472^f; Syagrius the son of Ægidius held Soissons, and its territory^g; Childeoric king of the Burgundians reduced the city of Paris after a siege, according to some, of five, according to others, of ten years^h. The Franks were masters of the countries bordering on the Rhine, the Saxons of Nantes and Bayeux, and the Britons driven out by the Angles of Vennes and *Trequier*ⁱ. The following year 465. Theodoric, more bent on making acquisitions in Gaul than in Spain, came to an agreement with Remismund king of the Suevians; but before he could put his vast designs in execution, he was taken off by the same crime that had raised him to the throne, being murdered by his brother Euric, after he had reigned thirteen years^j. Jordanes, ever favourable to the Goths, only writes, that the joy Euric had betrayed on this occasion induced some to imagine, that he had been accessory to the death of his brother^k. Euric, called also Eoric, Evarix, and Euthoric, had no sooner ascended the throne, than he dispatched ambassadors to Leo emperor of the east, to Remismund king of the Suevians, and to Genferic king of the Vandals. Remismund no sooner heard the ambassadors than he sent others to Euric, to the emperor, and to the king of the Vandals^l; but, what was the subject of so many embassies, our historian has not thought fit to acquaint us. All we know is, that the ambassadors, sent by Euric to the king of the Vandals, hearing that the Romans were making great preparations to attack that people, returned in great haste to Toulouse; and that Remismund, upon the departure of Euric's ambassadors, recalled, and assembled into one body, the troops he had sent out in small parties to ravage the country^m. These people were perhaps negotiating an alliance among themselves against the common enemy the Romans. Be that as it will, Euric this very year 466. committed great ravages in Lusitania, and, having reduced the cities of Pampelona and Saragoja, made himself master of *Upper Spain*ⁿ. The following year, Remismund, having entered Lusitania, took Coimbra, made himself master of several other places, and ravaged the country, committing every-where unheard of cruelties. Hereupon the natives, recurring not to the Romans, which shews that their power in Spain was now reduced to a very low ebb, but to the Visigoths, sent a solemn embassy, at the head of which was one Opilio, to implore the protection of Euric, who readily interposed his good offices, but, it seems, to no effect; for Remismund, upon the departure of the ambassadors sent to him by Euric, plundered the city of Coimbra, destroyed several houses, with part of the walls, and carried such of the inhabitants, as had not the good luck to make their escape, into captivity^o. Idatius adds, that the ambassadors sent by the Lusitanians reported, upon their return, that several prodigies had happened in Gaul, and, among the rest, that a fountain of blood had sprung up in the midst of Toulouse, and flowed a whole day^p. Euric having made himself master of Pampelona and Casaraugusta, or Saragoja, as we have related above, Tarraco with its territory was the only place held now in Spain by the Romans; and that city Euric besieged in 468. the second a of the emperor Antemius's reign, and having, after a long siege, reduced it; levelled it with the ground. Thus were the Romans driven quite out of Spain; and a period put to their empire there, after they had been at least seven hundred years masters of that country. All those provinces, except Galicia, and part of Lusitania, which were subject to the Suevians, acknowledged Euric for their king, who, residing at Toulouse, governed them by his lieutenants. Drives the Romans quite out of Spain.

Euric, not satisfied with the conquests he had made in Spain, resolved to extend his dominions likewise in Gaul. With this view he began to draw together his forces, and make other military preparations; which the emperor Antemius no sooner understood, than he wrote to Riotbam king of the Britons, who had settled on the Loire, pressing him to join the Romans against the common enemy; for the Britons were greatly attached to the Roman interest. Riotbam readily comply'd with the emperor's request, and, having assembled a body of twelve thousand men, marched at the head of them to Bourges, and from thence to Bourgeols on the Indre, in the province of Berri; but being there met by Euric, he was overcome by the Goths with great loss, and obliged to abandon that province, and take refuge among the Burgundians the friends and allies of the Romans. Gregory of Tours writes, that, after the defeat of the Britons, one Paul, whom he distinguishes with the title of count, having assembled a body of troops, consisting of Romans and Franks, made war upon the Goths, and gained considerable advantages over them. Defeats the Britons.

c Sidonius tells us, that the Goths overcame the Franks, and afterwards entered into an alliance with them. He writes elsewhere, that Euric gave his daughter in marriage to Sigimer a barbarian prince, whom Valesius conjectures to have been by nation a Frank. The war between the Romans and Goths continued all this and the following year 471. but the authors, who speak of that war without descending to particulars, only tell us, that the Goths gained great advantages over the Romans, and in the end made themselves masters of the provinces of Berri and Gevaudan, the inhabitants, who were greatly oppressed by the Roman officers, especially by Seronatus, governor of Gaul, chusing rather to live under the Goths than the Romans, or, as Salvianus expresses it, chusing rather to live free, under d the appearance of slavery, than be treated like slaves under the appearance of liberty. In 473. a peace was concluded; but Antemius being murdered the same year by Ricimer, and Olybrius proclaimed emperor in his room, as we have related in our Roman history, Euric, taking advantage of the weak and distracted state of the empire, renewed the war, hoping to drive the Romans quite out of Gaul, as he had done five years before out of Spain. Auvergne was the only province they still held in Aquitania Prima, lying between the ocean, the Rhone, and the Loire; and into this province Euric broke at the head of a powerful army in the beginning of the year 474. but met with a vigorous resistance from the inhabitants, who, without the assistance of any regular troops, gained some considerable

e advantages over the enemy. But in the end they laid siege to Clermont, and continued before that place, without being able to reduce it, till the rigour of the season obliged them to retire. As they seemed resolved to renew the siege early in the spring, Nepos, who had succeeded Olybrius in the empire, thinking he could better secure by treaty, than by arms, what he still possessed in Gaul, dispatched the questor Licinianus with the character of ambassador to Euric, in order to enter into a negotiation with that prince. Euric received him in a very obliging manner, and several conferences were held, at which some bishops of Provence were allowed to assist; viz. Leontius bishop of Arles, Faustus of Riez, Greus of Marseilles, and Basilus of Aix. To Basilus, Sidonius, then bishop of Clermont, wrote a letter, recommending to him the interest of the Catholic religion, and begging he would take care, that by the treaty the Catholics should be allowed to ordain bishops for the vacant churches in the countries subject to the Goths. For the Goths held the doctrine of Arius, and Euric, a professed enemy to the Catholics, would not allow them to appoint new bishops in the room of those who died; insomuch that nine episcopal sees were at that time vacant *. A report being spread, which proved a afterwards true, that a treaty was upon the point of being concluded between the Romans and Goths, in virtue of which Auvergne was to be delivered up to the Goths. Sidonius, who was bishop of Clermont in that province, and a zealous defender of the orthodox faith, wrote a letter to Grecus bishop of Marseilles, conjuring him not to agree to so shameful an article, and assuring him, that the inhabitants were ready to undergo the greatest hardships, rather than submit to the Goths, who, mindful of the vigorous resistance they had often met with from them, would treat them more like criminals than slaves. He concludes by earnestly begging, that if the country was to be yielded to the Goths, the inhabitants might be allowed to retire, and some place allotted to them within the bounds of the empire †. However, b the treaty was concluded, and Auvergne delivered up to Euric, tho' he would not by any means consent to the ordaining of catholic bishops for the vacant churches within his dominions ‡.

FIVE years after, that is, in 480. the few places in Gaul, that were still held by the Romans, having submitted to Odoacer, who, after putting to death Orestes, and deposing his son Augustulus the last emperor of the west, had assumed the title of king of Italy, that prince yielded them to the Goths, whose dominions, by that addition, extended from the Loire to the Alps §. However, the cities of Arles and Marseilles held out, it seems, some time against the Goths *. We leave Bucherius to inquire why Odoacer abandoned these countries, and, in abandoning them, chose c rather to bestow them on the Goths, than the Burgundians, the friends and allies of the empire †. That writer supposes the Burgundians, jealous of the too great power of the Goths, to have made war upon them; and that this is the year of which Jornandes speaks, where he tells us, that a war was kindled between two nations in Gaul ‡; for he speaks soon after of the war between the Burgundians and Goths. The Burgundians, sprung originally from the Vandals, had entered Gaul in 406. with the Vandals and Alans, and having some years after made themselves masters of the country, now known by the name of Alsace, they were allowed to settle there as friends and allies of the Roman people. They were removed from thence in 431. by Aetius to the present duchy of Savoy. In 456. d they seized on part of Spain, and made themselves masters of the city of Lyons, and in 478. reduced the whole province called Lugdunensis Prima. Jornandes writes, that in the present year 482. the Goths gained great advantages over them *. However, it appears from the acts of the council of Agde held in 526. and of the council of Epaune in 527. that no fewer than twenty-eight cities or dioceses belonged to the Burgundians, in which number were Lyons, Vienne, Besançon, and Embrun †; so that the Goths were not, as Jornandes supposes them to have been, masters of all the south part of Gaul ‡. Euric, having thus made himself master of the best part of Gaul, that is, of the whole tract between the Rhone and the Loire, and of all Spain, except a small corner of Galicia, and part of Lusitania held by the Suevians, e was still bent on making new conquests, and reducing the remaining part both of Spain and Gaul, when death put an end to his vast designs. He died at Arles in 484. the nineteenth year of his reign †, after the eleventh and before the end of September ‡. He had made himself way to the throne by the murder of his brother, and governed his subjects with a rod of iron §. He passed the greater part of his life in the field, was constantly quarrelling with his neighbours, and never pleased, but when he had an opportunity of staining his hands in the blood of his enemies &. He was a prince of great penetration, formidable in war, and attended with success in most of his undertakings †; whence he was dreaded by all nations, and his friendship courted by the neighbouring as well as the distant people ‡. Sidonius, f speaking in 476. of the court of this prince then at Bourdeaux, describes the Saxons, the Franks, the Heruli, the Burgundians, and even the Romans and Persians, falling down before him in the posture of suppliants, and conquered people †. Upon this Bucherius makes a long descant ‡, to which we refer the reader. Apollinaris Sidonius makes several excellent reflections on the success that attended Euric in most

- a of his undertakings^m, though he was not only separated from, but an irreconcilable enemy to, the catholic church, being a zealous Arian, and firmly persuaded, says Sidonius, that the success of his arms was owing to the purity of his faith. His aversion to the catholic church was so great, that he could not even endure the name of catholicⁿ. Gregory of Tours writes, that having raised a persecution against the catholics, he caused their churches to be shut up, and either banished, imprisoned, or put to death, their bishops, their clergy, and all who dared to oppose or impugn the Arian impiety^o. But if that writer had no other voucher for that persecution but Sidonius, whom he quotes, his account is greatly exaggerated; for Sidonius only says, that Euric banished two bishops, and would not suffer any to be named to the vacant sees^p. Most churches, continues Sidonius, in the countries held by the Goths are without pastors, and the bishopricks end there with the lives of the bishops. Of these vacant bishopricks he names nine, viz. Bordeaux, Pereguex, Rhodes, Limoges, Mande, Eause, Bazas, Cominges, and Auch. He adds, that the vacancy of the sees was attended with the ruin of religion, since it was the province of the bishops to provide the churches with inferior ministers, and bring back to the fold the sheep gone astray; that christianity was almost extinct in those dioceses; that the churches were ready to fall both in the towns and villages; that some of them were shut up by the thorns and briars that grew in the entry, and others lay open only for the sheep, that came to graze at the very foot of the holy altar. If such was the state of affairs in 474.
- when Sidonius wrote, we leave the reader to judge to what a deplorable condition they must have been reduced before the end of Euric's reign, which lasted ten years longer; for that prince never suffered the vacant sees to be filled. The two bishops he banished in 474. were Crocus, supposed to have been bishop of Nismes, and Simplicius, whose see is quite unknown^q. Euric was the first who gave written laws to the Goths, governed, till his reign, by customs only^r. The laws he published were called the Theodorian laws; which appellation has occasioned great disputes among authors. Baronius supposes them to have been so called, because the two Theodorics, predecessors of Euric, were the authors of them^s. But Isidore tells us in express terms, that Euric was the first who gave written laws to the Goths. Cujacius will have them to have been called Theodorian laws from Theodoric the Ostrogoth king of Italy^t, not reflecting, that they are styled Theodorian by Apollinaris Sidonius, who died, as is plain from Gregory of Tours^u, before Theodoric was master of Italy. Besides, it is certain, that Theodoric king of Italy paid the greatest respect to the Roman laws, and governed by them. Sirmund and Alteferra are of opinion, that they were, by paronomasia, called Theodorianæ, in opposition to the Theodosianæ; but this paronomasia, says the learned Savaron^v, would have been but very insipid, had not Evaric, the author of these laws, been likewise called Theodoric; and that this was his true name, is plainly shewn, both by him, and by Grotius in his nomenclature. As for the name of Evaric or Euric, which Grotius explains by legibus pollens, it was given him on account of the laws he published. These laws were by Euric obtruded upon the people of Gaul and Spain, who had been long accustomed to the Roman laws; but Alaric, his son and successor, restored the Roman laws to their former splendor, causing them to be observed throughout his dominions, as we shall see in the reign of that prince, where we shall have occasion to speak of the Alaric code. The person Euric chiefly employed in compiling his laws was Leo, his prime minister, and one of the most learned men, and best civilians, of his time^w (C). Some Spanish writers tell us, that,

(C) Leo was, according to Sidonius, a man of uncommon parts, the best civilian of his time, and well versed in every branch of literature (2). Hence he was highly esteemed by Euric, and raised to the first honours in his court. By him were penned all the letters that prince wrote to foreign kings and states (3). His advice was of such weight with

Euric, that he suffered himself to be intirely guided by him in affairs of the greatest importance (4). He was descended from Cornelius Fronto, who was preceptor to the emperor M. Aurelius, and one of the greatest orators of antiquity (5). He professed the catholic faith in the court of an Arian prince, and led a life without blemish or reproach (6). Si-

that, besides Leo, he employed seventy bishops, among whom was one Severus,^a bishop of Barcelona, whom he afterwards put to death, with a country-man named Emeterius, on account of their zeal for the catholic faith. But what these authors write is founded on an antient tradition, which Bollandus thinks quite groundless¹. Euric married one Ragnabild or Ragnabild, the daughter of a king, for whose use in bathing Evodius caused a silver vessel to be made, on which were engraved some verses composed by *Sidonius*². By her he had a son named Alaric, by whom he was succeeded, and a daughter, who was married to a barbarian prince named *Sigismer*³. From the description which Sidonius, who saw that prince, gives of him, Valerius concludes him to have been by nation a Frank; and that Euric gave him his daughter in marriage, hoping, by that means, to gain the nation of the Franks, which began to be very powerful in Gaul. But by that very nation the son he had by her was killed in battle, and a period put to the kingdom of the Visigoths in Gaul, who, being driven from thence, fixed their royal seat at Toledo in Spain. But, as in Euric's reign they firmly established their dominion in the latter of these countries, we shall, in compliance with our plan, leave them for the present, and reserving for modern history an account of their affairs from the time they settled in Spain to the loss of that country to the Arabs, return to the Ostrogoths, who, as we have observed above, upon the departure of their countrymen the Visigoths admitted by Valens, in 376. into the empire, continued in their antient seats, but subject to the Hunns, who nevertheless allowed them to be governed by their own kings of the illustrious family of the Amali.

The history of the Ostrogoths.
Their kings.

THE Ostrogoths, as we have related above, upon the death of Ermenric or Hermanric their king, chose Vithimir, by some called Winitbar, in his room. The new king gained at first some small advantages over the Hunns, but was in the end overcome, and killed in battle by Balamir or Balamber, king of the *Hunns*⁴. His son Vitimeric withdrew, attended by great numbers of his subjects, into the plains between the Borysthenes and the Danube, that is, into the present Podolia. Of him no further mention is made in history. He was succeeded by Hunimund, the son of Ermenric, who submitted to the Hunns, and is said to have made war upon, and gained a signal victory over, the Suevians. His son Thorismund reigned next, who defeated with a great slaughter the Gepidæ; but was soon after killed in the flower of his age by a fall from his horse. The Goths so lamented the loss of this prince, that, for the space of forty years, they chose no king in his room. After so long an inter-regnum, Wandalar, son to the brother of Ermenric, was raised to the throne; but of him no further mention is made in history. He was succeeded by his three sons Valemir, Theodimir, and Vidimir, who reigned jointly, and attended Attila in most of his expeditions. Upon that prince's death, several nations, by him formerly subdued, revolting from his children, begged and obtained leave from Marcian, then emperor, to settle in the Roman territories, almost quite dispeopled by the frequent incursions of the Hunns, and other barbarians. Among these mention is made of the Squiri,⁵ Satagairæ, and Alans, who settled in Lesser Scythia, and Lower Mæsia. To the Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemandrians, lands were granted in Illyricum, near a place called the Castle of Mars. To the Ostrogoths Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmish, in Sclavonia, to Vindobona, now Vienna in *Austria*⁶. The Goths, as well as the other barbarians, acknowledged the authority of the Constantinopolitan emperors, and were subjects of the empire; but at the same time governed by their own princes, to whom the emperors agreed to pay an annual pension, upon their promising to guard the frontiers of the empire, and serve, when wanted, in the Roman

St. Gregory of Tours tells us, that Alaric the son of Euric having once complained in the presence of Leo, that a fine view from his palace was obstructed by the church of Narbonne, he advised him to lower the church; which was done accordingly. Gregory of Tours adds, that Leo paid dear for this advice, having soon after intirely lost his eye-sight (9).

Soon after, Leo sent deputies to Valemir, to upbraid him with his late conduct, and renew the ancient treaties^h. The treaties were accordingly renewed, and the peace re-established, upon the emperor's promising to pay to the Goths what was due to them to that time, and for the future three hundred pounds weight of gold a year. On the other hand, Valemir sent to Constantinople by way of hostage the famous Theodoric, afterwards king of Italy, but then only eight years oldⁱ. Males the historian, and Damascus, who wrote the life of Isidore, and was contemporary with Theodoric himself, suppose him to have been the son of Valemir^k. But Jornandes, who lived some time after, but was perhaps better acquainted with the history of the Ostrogoths, being himself one of that nation, assures us, that Theodoric was the son of Theodimir by a concubine named Erelieva, and consequently only nephew to Valemir^l. Leo received him with the greatest marks of esteem and affection, maintained him for the space of ten years at his court,

In the year 473. during the short reign of Glycerius, the Goths in Pannonia, without the least provocation, says Jornandes, and only because they were incapable of living in peace, resolved to make war on the empire. Pursuant to this resolution, the two brothers Theodomir and Videmir met, when it fell to the lot (for they cast lots) of the latter to invade Italy, where Glycerius then acted as emperor, and to that of Theodomir to attack the eastern empire, governed at that time by Leo I. Videmir immediately set out on his march; but had scarce entered Italy, when he died, leaving the command of his troops to his son, who bore the same name. Jornandes adds, that the young prince being prevailed upon by the rich presents, which Glycerius sent him, to retire out of Italy, he marched into Gaul, and, joining the Visigoths, settled there, assisted them in the conquest of that country, and in the reduction of Spain, becoming one people with them². As for Theodomir, he entered Illyricum, and, having made himself master of Naissus, he divided his army into several small bodies, under the command of his son Theodoric, and other generals, who reduced, without any considerable opposition, the cities of Ulprana, Leraclea, and Larissa. Having afterwards re-united their forces, and left a strong garrison in Naissus, they laid siege to Theffalonica.³ But Clarianus, governor of the place, prevailed upon Theodomir, with rich presents, to abandon the enterprize, and retire. Soon after a peace was concluded between the Romans and the Goths, during which Theodomir died, and was succeeded by his son Theodoric, called Amalus, being descended from the Amali, the most illustrious family among the Goths. The emperor Zeno, overjoyed at the news of the young prince's accession to the crown, immediately invited him to court, received him with the greatest marks of friendship and esteem, raised him to the rank of a patrician, and even adopted him, if Jornandes is to be credited, for his son⁴. Theodoric was scarce returned to Pannonia, when news was brought him, that Basiliscus, of whom we have made frequent mention in our Roman history⁵, revolting from Zeno, had been proclaimed and acknowledged emperor by the senate of Constantinople. The usurper was chiefly supported by a Goth in the Roman service, named likewise Theodoric, who had been raised to the first posts in the army, and the command of his countrymen, who, following the example of their leader, had all declared for Basiliscus. However, king Theodoric, espousing the cause of Zeno, marched against them; but as his troops were far inferior in number to those of the enemy, Zeno assured him, that he should be joined at the straits of mount Hæmus by the general of Thrace, with ten thousand foot, and two thousand horse; and that, after passing the mountains, he should find twenty thousand horse on the banks of the Hebrus ready to join him; but at neither place did he find any troops, and the guides, who had been sent him by the Romans, leaving the known roads, and beaten ways, led him through deserts, where his men suffered greatly for want of provisions, and over steep mountains, till they brought his army, quite spent with such long and fatiguing marches, in sight of the enemy, encamped in a most advantageous post. But though they might, with great ease, have cut the king and his whole army in pieces, yet Theodoric their leader sent only some persons to upbraid the king with making war on his countrymen in favour of the Romans, who had thus betrayed him with fair promises, and only sought to set Goths against Goths, that they might have the cruel satisfaction of seeing them destroy each other. These remonstrances occasioned a mutiny in the king's army, who, finding himself reduced to the alternative of being abandoned by his own men, or coming to an agreement with Theodoric, chose the latter. The two generals conferred, having a river between them, and, in the end, agreed not to make war upon each other. They both dispatched ambassadors to Constantinople, Theodoric to demand the arrears that were due to him and his army, and the king to acquaint the emperor with the treaty he had made, and at the same time to let him know, that, unless provisions were sent to the army, it was not in his power to restrain his men from plundering

- a Thrace *. What answer Zeno returned to the former, we are no-where told ; but to the latter he made a long apology for not sending, as he had promised, the Roman troops to join him. But the author of Zeno's life, though not a little biassed in favour of that prince, cannot help owning, that he was therein greatly to blame †. The emperor did all that lay in his power to persuade the king to break the treaty he had lately concluded with Theodoric, sending to him for that purpose two solemn embassies, and promising not only to reward him with large sums, and great revenues, if he should defeat the rebels, but to give him in marriage Juliana, the daughter of Olybrius, and grand-daughter of Valentinian III. But the king could not, by any offers, be prevailed upon to make the least breach in the treaty with Theodoric ; which
- b obliged the emperor to conclude a peace with him upon the following terms, highly dishonourable to the imperial dignity ; viz. that Theodoric should have the command of the emperor's guards ; that he should retain all the honours conferred upon him by the usurper Basiliſcus ; that his estate, which had been confiscated, should be restored to him ; and lastly, that he should be appointed commander in chief of the Roman cavalry, which post was then held by king Theodoric, but, in virtue of this treaty, taken from him, and bestowed on the other ‡.

- In the mean time king Theodoric, who was still with his army among the mountains of Thrace, not receiving from the Romans either money or provisions to support them, He breaks with Zeno, and ravages Thrace and Macedon.
 c provoked at the emperor's conduct, laid waste the most fertile places of Thrace, destroying with fire and sword what he could not carry off. The emperor sent several generals to oppose him ; but though he lost, as we are told, a great many men in skirmishes, yet the loss on the side of the Romans must have been far more considerable, since, in the end, all the emperor's generals declined the command of the army in Thrace §. From Thrace Theodoric marched into Macedon, and, having pillaged the open country, made himself master of Stopi on the river Axius. From thence he marched into the neighbourhood of Theſſalonica ; which threw the inhabitants into such consternation, that, thinking themselves abandoned by the emperor, they pulled down and broke in pieces all his statues, and were ready to fall upon d their governor, named John ; but, in the end, contented themselves with taking from him the keys of the city, and delivering them to the bishop ¶. Theodoric, without making the least attempt on Theſſalonica, led his army from thence to Heraclea, where he was met by ambassadors from Zeno, with proposals for an accommodation ; which he being willing to conclude, sent others to Constantinople, and, in the mean time, ordered his men to forbear all hostilities. The person employed by Zeno to treat with Theodoric was the patrician Adamancus, who, as appears from some laws, had been governor of Constantinople, and was, on this occasion, honoured with the consular ornaments, but not with the consulship. During the negotiations, Theodoric found means of making himself master of Duras on the Adriatic sea, that he might e have some place of strength to retire to, in case the negotiations should not have the desired effect. Hereupon the conferences were broken off, Adamancus declaring, Which are rejected by Zeno. that he could not treat with the Goths, till they had restored the city of Duras to the empire. Theodoric could not, by any means, be prevailed upon to part with that important place during the winter ; but promised to abandon it early in the spring, to march against the other Theodoric, who had raised new disturbances in the empire, and, that the emperor might not question the sincerity of his intentions, to deliver up to him his mother and sisters as hostages. He likewise offered, with the emperor's approbation, to march into Italy, and restore Nepos, who was nearly related to the empress Verina, Zeno's mother-in-law, and had been lately driven from the throne
 f by Glycerius. To these proposals Adamancus answered, That he had no power to grant him any terms, till Duras was restored † ; but that he would write to the emperor, and acquaint him with his answer. The Romans, in the mean time, became more intractable, being elated with some advantages they gained at that very time over the Goths. Theodoric had marched before with a strong detachment to surprise Duras, while the main body, with the baggage, followed by slow marches, under the conduct of his brother Theudimund. This Sabinianus, general of Illyricum, and at that time the best commander in the whole empire, no sooner understood, than he ordered all the troops quartered in that province to assemble at Lychnidus in

Macedon, and, marching from thence with incredible expedition, overtook the Goths, as they were descending from the mountains of Candavia, between Lychmidus and Duras. Theudimund, and his mother, who followed the army, had just time to pass a torrent, and cause the bridge to be broken down, by which means they saved themselves, but stopped the march of the army; so that the Romans, falling upon them, cut most of them in pieces, took five thousand prisoners, two thousand waggons, and an immense booty^d. Zeno, elated with this victory, and not doubting but he should either take Theodoric himself prisoner, or oblige him to submit to what terms he pleased, wrote to Sabinianus, and to Gento, a Goth of great reputation in the Roman service, to pursue the war, and not suffer Theodoric, with the troops he had with him, to retire, but to keep him shut up on all sides, ordering at the same time Adamancus to break off the conferences, and return to Constantinople^e. But of this war all we know is, that the following year 480. Theodoric ravaged Greece, and that Sabinianus, as count Marcellinus writes, put, in the end, a stop to his ravages, more by address than by dint of arms^f; which plainly shews, that the Romans had not been attended with the success they expected.

No further mention is made of Theodoric till the year 482. when, Sabinianus being dead, he ravaged without controul both Macedons, with Thessaly, and even took and plundered Larissa, the metropolis of the latter province^g; insomuch that the emperor, to appease him, was at length obliged to yield to him part of Lower Mæsia and Lower Dacia, to give him the command of the troops of the household, and to name him consul for the ensuing year 484. which was the greatest honour he could confer upon him. Hereupon Theodoric, disbanding his troops, set out for Constantinople with a small retinue, and, being received there by the emperor with the greatest marks of kindness and esteem, discharged the following year the office of consul^h. During his consulship, Leontius, a native of Chalcis in Syria, and commander of the troops in that province, revolting, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Against him Zeno dispatched Illus, captain of his guards; but he, instead of opposing Leontius, joined him, and both together defeated and took prisoner Longinus, the emperor's brother, who, at the head of a considerable army, had ventured to engage them in the neighbourhood of Antioch; which city, after his defeat, submitted to the usurper. Zeno, upon the news of the defeat and captivity of his brother, dispatched one John, an officer of great valour, and experience in war, into Syria, and prevailed upon Theodoric to join him with a numerous army of Goths. These two commanders, meeting Leontius and Illus in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, gave them a total overthrow, and obliged them to fly for refuge to the strong castle of Papyra in *Cilicia*ⁱ. Evagrius, and others, ascribe this victory to the Valamerians, that is, the Goths; for so we find them styled by several writers, from their king Valemer^k. As the rebels were no more in a condition to give the least apprehension or uneasiness, Theodoric, leaving part of his forces with the other commander to pursue the war, returned with the rest to Constantinople; but finding that Zeno began to mistrust him, and even to seek under-hand his destruction, he withdrew from court, and retired into Thrace, the emperor having, some time before, appointed him general of the troops quartered in that country. Thus Evagrius^l. But Marcellinus, accusing Theodoric of ingratitude towards his benefactor Zeno, tells us, that, not satisfied with the innumerable favours he had received at the emperor's hands, he retired from court, and began to seek some plausible pretence of making war on the empire^m. Jornandes, ever favourable to that prince, but not well acquainted with his history, supposes him to have retired into Pannonia, chusing rather to live in poverty amongst his Goths, than in affluence among the *Romans*ⁿ. Be that as it will, it is certain, that, soon after his leaving Constantinople, he fell upon the Bulgarians, who, under the conduct of their king or leader named Libertem, had broken into Thrace, and gained a complete victory over them, Libertem himself being dangerously wounded, and most of his men cut in pieces^o. The following year 486. Theodoric spent in raising forces, and in 487. broke into Thrace at the head of a powerful army, putting all to fire and sword. Upon what provocation he thus turned his arms against the empire, we are no-where told; but, without all doubt, the same motives that,

■ some time before, had induced him to withdraw from court, prompted him now to act as an enemy. Having ravaged Thrace, he approached Constantinople, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Melantiades, a city placed by Sanfon about fifteen miles west of Constantinople, with a design, as was believed, of laying siege to the imperial city. But, while the inhabitants were under the utmost consternation, Theodoric, decamping all on a sudden, marched back to Novæ in Mæsia, whence he was come ^p. Some writers ascribe his sudden retreat to the regard he had for that metropolis; others to a private treaty between him and Zeno, who, putting him in mind of the kindness he had ever shewn him, and of the many honours he had heaped upon him, and representing to him at the same time the danger to which he exposed himself in making war on the empire, persuaded him to conclude a peace with the Romans, and turn his arms against Odoacer, who, having put Orestes to death, and deposed his son Augustulus, had taken upon him the title of king of Italy ^q. The Romans afterwards pretended, that Zeno had sent Theodoric to conquer Italy, not for himself, but for the emperor of the east, to whom of right it belonged ^r. On the other hand, the Goths maintained, that Zeno had yielded Italy to Theodoric and his posterity. Of this opinion was not only Jornandes ^s, by nation a Goth, but Procopius, a Roman writer ^t, who tells us, that Zeno encouraged Theodoric to conquer Italy, which he was to keep for himself. Ammianus writes, that, in virtue of this treaty with Zeno, Theodoric was to hold Italy during his life; but that, upon his death, it was to be re-united to the empire ^u. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Theodoric received with joy the proposal made him by the emperor of driving Odoacer out of Italy, and returned, as we have hinted above, to Novæ in Mæsia, in order to make the necessary preparations for that expedition.

THE following year 488. Theodoric, having assembled, says Ennodius ^v, an infinite number of people, carrying with them on waggons their wives, children, and all their effects, set out from Novæ, bending his march towards Italy. His mother, and sister named Amasrides, attended him in this expedition ^w. Several Romans of great distinction flocked to him from all parts to serve as volunteers in this war, and among the rest Artemidorus, who was nearly related to, and in great favour with, the emperor; but joyfully abandoned his country, and the grandeur he lived in at Constantinople, to share with Theodoric in his good and bad fortune, who afterwards created him a patrician, and made him governor of Rome ^x. On the other hand, a great many Goths declined following Theodoric into Italy, and, settling on the sea-coast in Thrace, formed there a separate nation, which lived in amity with the Romans, and is highly commended by Procopius ^y. From Novæ in Mæsia Theodoric marched strait to the Adriatic sea; but, for want of ships, was obliged to go round, and traverse the several nations dwelling on the coast. This march he performed in the depth of winter, a violent plague and famine, says Ennodius ^z, raging the whole time in his army, and carrying off great numbers of his people. He found the Gepidæ encamped on the banks of a certain river, with a design to oppose his passage; but Theodoric, passing it at the head of a choice body of men, charged them so briskly, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous flight. At another place he was met by the Sarmatians, whom he likewise overcame, and put to flight ^a. Thus, after a long and fatiguing march, he entered at length Italy, and, advancing to the river Sontius, now Bonno, in the neighbourhood of Aquileia, halted there, in order to rest his men, being informed, that Odoacer was in full march to meet him with a very numerous army, consisting of various nations, commanded by their respective kings or chiefs ^b. Soon after, Odoacer appeared, and was met by Theodoric with his men in battle-array. Hereupon an engagement ensued, in which Odoacer was, after a faint resistance, put to flight, and great numbers of his men cut in pieces. Theodoric pursued the fugitives, and, on the 28th of August 489, entered their camp, though defended by a river, and a great many works ^c. Odoacer retired to the plains of Verona, and encamped there at a small distance from the city. But Theodoric, pursuing him close, forced him to a second engagement, when he met with a far more vigorous opposition than in the former, for great numbers were killed on both sides; a but, in the end, Odoacer was again put to flight, and obliged to shut himself up in Ravenna; so that Theodoric, having now no enemy in the field to oppose him, made himself master of several important places, and among the rest of Milan and Pavia ¹. At the same time Tufa, commander in chief of Odoacer's forces, came over to Theodoric, with most of the troops under his command, and was immediately by him dispatched, with one of his own officers, in pursuit of Odoacer to Ravenna. Odoacer had left that city, and was advanced as far as Faenza, in which place he was closely besieged by Tufa; but that treacherous commander, declaring for his former master, joined him anew with all his troops, delivering up to him at the same time several officers, who had been appointed by Theodoric to command under him, and were, b by Odoacer's orders, sent in irons to Ravenna ². Ennodius writes, that Theodoric did not send against Odoacer all the troops that came over to him with Tufa, but placed several detachments of them, together with his own forces, in the towns that had submitted to him. He adds, that, when Theodoric was informed of Tufa's treachery, he caused them all, by a private order, to be cut in pieces, lest they should follow the example of their general ³. About the same time Frideric, the son of Lava king of the Rugians, who had joined Theodoric with a considerable body of his countrymen, fled over to Odoacer; who, being thus reinforced, left Faenza, and advanced as far as Milan; which city he is supposed to have taken, since he is said to have recovered all Liguria ⁴. Theodoric in the mean time, finding himself abandoned both c by Tufa and Frideric, kept himself shut up in Pavia, a place in those days of great strength, while Odoacer, without controul, ravaged the country that had submitted to him, and besieged him at last in Pavia, where the Goths, who had brought along with them their families, and all their effects, were greatly frightened for want of room. But Heaven, says Ennodius ⁵, openly declared in favour of Theodoric, the enemy's men quarrelling daily among themselves, and every thing contributing to their ruin. However, Theodoric, fearing he should in the end be overpowered with numbers, had recourse to Alaric king of the Visigoths, who had settled in Gaul. As the Visigoths and Ostrogoths were originally one and the same nation, and the Visigoths had received among them, about sixteen years before, a great number of Ostrogoths, d under the conduct of their king Vidimir, cousin-german to Theodoric, they readily granted him the desired supplies; which he no sooner received, than leaving Pavia, he marched to the river Addua, where the enemy lay encamped, engaged them the third time, and gave them a total overthrow. Odoacer took refuge anew in Ravenna; but left numerous garrisons in all the strong places ⁶. In this battle, which was fought on the eleventh of August, Odoacer lost several officers of distinction, and among the rest Pierius, his comes domesticorum, or captain of the guards ⁷. Theodoric, after the battle, marched in pursuit of Odoacer, and, approaching Ravenna, encamped at a place called Pinaia, about three miles from the city. On the other hand, Odoacer, with many new works, fortified himself in the town, and, with frequent sallies, e especially in the night, greatly harassed the Goths. The siege lasted three years, during which time great numbers were killed on both sides in the frequent sallies and attacks. Authors speak in particular of a sally made, according to some, on the tenth, according to others, on the fifteenth of July 491. in which Odoacer commanded in person, and, at the head of the Heruli, entered the camp of Theodoric at Pinaia, and made a dreadful havock of his men; but he was, after a long and sharp dispute, obliged to retire. The Goths pursued him to the very gates of the city, killing many of his men, and among the rest Libila or Levila, who commanded the Heruli under the king, and had eminently distinguished himself on that occasion ⁸. After this, Theodoric, leaving part of his army before Ravenna, marched with the f rest against the strong-holds, in which Odoacer had left garrisons, and was everywhere received with great joy, except at Cesena in Romagna, where he met with some opposition ⁹. Thus he made himself master of Italy ¹⁰, not at once, but by degrees; for he laid siege to Ravenna in 490. and pope Gelasius, who was raised to the see of Rome in 492. speaking of Odoacer, still gives him the title of king of

- a Italy. The sally we have spoken of above was made on the tenth or fifteenth of July, and Theodoric was, on the thirty-first of the following August, at Pavia, and returned to the siege of Ravenna on the twenty-ninth of August 492, pitching his camp at a place called the Little Palace. He was then master of Italy, no one place remaining to Odoacer, except Ravenna, in which he had been shut up three years with his foreign, and some Roman troops, now reduced to great straits by the enemy without, and the famine within, wheat being sold at six pieces of gold a bushel. On the other hand, the Goths were quite worn out with the fatigues of a three years siege; so that both parties being willing to put an end to the war, Odoacer sent John bishop of Ravenna to Theodoric, with proposals for an accommodation. This prelate died in 494. and there is still extant the original act of a donation made to him in January 491. Jornandes writes, that Odoacer only begged his life; which Theodoric bound himself by a solemn oath to grant him. Procopius tells us, that they agreed to live together on equal terms in Ravenna; which expression we do not well comprehend, it being altogether incredible, that Theodoric, who was already master of all Italy, and had reduced Odoacer to the last extremity, should suffer him to reign jointly, and have an equal share of power, with himself. The agreement was concluded on the twenty-seventh of February, Odoacer delivering up his son named Thelan to Theodoric as an hostage, who thereupon entered Ravenna in triumph by the Fleetgate on the fifth of March. Theodoric did not long stand to the agreement he had made; for having, a few days after, invited Odoacer to a banquet, unmindful of his oath, he dispatched him with his own hand, according to some, in the palace, according to others, in a grove of laurels adjoining perhaps to the palace. Some authors pretend, that Odoacer had formed a design upon the life of Theodoric, which he being acquainted with, resolved to be before-hand with him. But the dead are always found guilty. Jornandes, though himself a Goth, seems to insinuate, that Odoacer was murdered upon a bare suspicion, and that, as was then believed, quite groundless. All his servants and relations were massacred at the same time, except his brother Aemulphus, and a few more, who, having had the good luck to make their escape, retired beyond the Danube. Theodoric had sent, some months before, Faustus Niger, a leading man in the senate of Rome, to obtain of the emperor Zeno the ensigns of royalty. But Odoacer having submitted before the return of the ambassador, Theodoric, without waiting for the emperor's permission, caused himself to be proclaimed by his Goths king of Italy. However, he dispatched soon after Festus or Faustus, his magister officiorum, and Irenaeus, both distinguished with the title of illustrious, to Constantinople, to excuse the liberty he had taken. The ambassadors were received in a very obliging manner by Anastasius, the successor of Zeno, who readily confirmed the peace, which his predecessor had made with Theodoric, approved of what he had done, and sent him the ensigns of royalty. Hence it is manifest, that Theodoric himself owned he held the kingdom of Italy of the emperors of the east, by whom he suffered even the Roman consuls to be named. There is still extant a letter from Theodoric to Anastasius, concerning one Felix, who was consul in 511. wherein he acquaints the emperor, that he had named Felix for the consulship, and at the same time intreats him to confirm, by his suffrage, that dignity to so deserving a person.
- Theodoric, now master of all Italy, began to make the necessary preparations for reducing the island of Sicily, which refused to acknowledge him; but the inhabitants were persuaded by Cassiodore to submit to their new lord without bloodshed. After this, Theodoric, sheathing his sword, endeavoured, in the first place, to establish himself in his new kingdom, by alliances with the neighbouring princes. With this view, he sent Festus to Constantinople, to confirm the peace he had made with Anastasius, marrying at the same time Andesfeda, the daughter of Clodoneus king of the Franks, and bestowing his own two daughters, whom he had by a concubine, on Alaric king of the Visigoths in Gaul, and on Sigismund, the son of Gundobald king of the Burgundians. Having thus secured his new kingdom, he made it his chief study to govern it with salutary laws, following therein the advice of Cassiodore, a man of a great learning and integrity, whom he had created a patrician, and raised to the dignities of count, of consul, and even to that of præfectus prætorio. He first placed all his Goths in the castles and strong-holds, with their officers who were to command them in time of war, and govern them in time of peace. The Roman laws he retained, and commanded them to be inviolably observed, and to have the same force, which they had had under the emperors of the west ^a. In the first five books of Cassiodore, consisting of the letters and edicts of Theodoric, nothing is so much recommended to the judges and magistrates as the due observance of, and respect for, the Roman laws. In these books are quoted many constitutions of the Theodosian code, and many novellæ of Theodosius, Valentinian, and Majorianus ^b, Theodoric declaring, that he did not intend to introduce any new laws into Italy, the Roman laws, by which it had been so long governed, being the most equitable that could be enacted; nay, so great was the respect he bore to the Roman laws, that he ordered them to be observed, not only by the Romans, but likewise by the Goths, who lived among the Romans. To his Goths he left some of their own laws, or rather customs; but, in all matters of moment, such as successions, testaments, adoptions, contracts, penalties, crimes, and in whatever belonged to public or private property, the Roman laws were common to all. All law-suits and disputes between a Roman and a Goth, or a Goth and a Roman, were to be decided by the Roman laws, as appears from one of Theodoric's rescripts to Januarius, president of Samnium ^c. But when the dispute arose between a Goth and Goth, they were to have recourse to their own judge, who decided it according to Theodoric's own edicts, which did not much differ from the Roman laws, and were given to those, who were sent into the provinces as judges of the Goths ^d. Theodoric not only retained the same laws, but the same form of government, the same distribution of provinces, the same magistrates and dignities. As the emperors had, before his time, translated the imperial seat from Rome to Ravenna, to be near at hand, and ready to put a stop to the irruptions of the barbarians, who, on that side, broke into Italy, he likewise chose that city for the usual place of his residence, governing from thence the provinces by the same magistrates, that had presided over them in the times of the emperors, viz. by the consulares, the correctores, and the præsides. But, besides these, he sent, according to the custom of the Goths, to each city inferior judges, distinguished with the title of counts, who were to administer justice, and decide all controversies and disputes: and herein the policy of the Goths far excelled, as Grotius observes, that of the Romans; for, in the Roman times, a whole province was governed by a consularis, a corrector, or a præfes, who resided in the chief city, and to whom recourse was to be had at a great charge from the most remote parts; but Theodoric, besides the consularis, the corrector, or the præfes, appointed, not only in the principal cities, but in each small town and village, inferior magistrates of known integrity, who were to administer justice, and, by that means, save those who had law-suits the trouble and expence of recurring to the governor of the whole province ^e, no appeals to distant tribunals being allowed, but in matters of the greatest importance, or in case of manifest injustice ^f. Thus Italy, from the dominion of the Romans, came under that of the Goths, almost without perceiving the change. But of the eminent virtues of Theodoric, of his glorious reign, and the reigns of the Gothic kings of Italy his successors, to the expulsion of the Goths by Narses, we shall, pursuant to our plan, speak at length in a more proper place, and, in the mean time, proceed to the history of other ancient nations.

- ^a THE Vandals were originally a Gothic nation; for Procopius, who could not be a stranger to their descent, being well acquainted with Gelomir their king, and the other Vandals, who were brought prisoners to Constantinople in the reign of Justinian, tells us in express terms, that the Goths and Vandals were one and the same people, distinguished in names, but agreeing in original and manners^o. He adds, that they spoke the Gothic language, as did likewise the Gepids, Lombards, Burgundians, and Alans. They were called Vandals from the Gothic word Vandelen, which signifies to wander, because they often changed their seats, wandering from one country to another^p. They are supposed to have come originally out of Scandinavia with the other Goths, under the conduct of king Eric, of whom we have spoken in the foregoing section, and to have settled in the countries now known by the names of Mecklenburg and Brandenburg. Several ages after, another colony of the Goths, leaving Scandinavia under the conduct of king Berig, settled in Pomerania, after having driven out the Rugians, by Jornandes called Ulmerugians. At the same time Berig subdued the Vandals inhabiting the above-mentioned countries; but, instead of driving them from their ancient seats, he only obliged them, as they were a Gothic nation, to share their territories with the new-comers^q. In the reign of Augustus, part of the Vandals, streightened in their own country for want of room, settled on the banks of the Rhine; but were driven from thence by Tiberius and Drusus, and obliged to return home. As their country was overstocked with people, great numbers of them soon left it anew, and, taking their rout eastward, entered the country lying between the Bosphorus Cimmericus and the Tanais, inhabited at that time by the Scythians, whom they drove out, and, seizing on their country, took the name of the ancient inhabitants, calling themselves Scythians. Some of these, several ages after, that is, in the reign of Mauritius, which began in 586, settled in Dalmatia and Illyricum, which from them were called Slavonia^r. Others seated themselves in the eastern parts of Dacia beyond the Danube, which province comprehended the present countries of Transylvania, Moldavia, Wallachia, and the eastern parts of Upper Hungary. From those who remained in Germany, the present Poles and Bohemians are said by most writers to derive their origin^s. But the Vandals who, under Godegisilus their king, broke into Gaul, and afterwards settled in Spain and Africa, came, according to Procopius^t, from Dacia, and the neighbourhood of the Palus Maeotis. As the Vandals were a Gothic nation, the same customs, manners, religion, form of government, &c. obtained among them as among the Goths. They had, without doubt, their own kings long before they were known to the Romans; but Godegisilus, under whose conduct they entered Gaul in 406, is the first of their princes, whom we find mentioned in history. He was succeeded by Gunderic, who, in 409, from Gaul passed into Spain, and settled in Galicia. Genferic reigned next, who, abandoning Spain in 428, passed with his Vandals over into Africa, which the Vandals held under the following kings, Hunneric, Gundamund, Thrasamund, Genferic II. and Gelimer, till the year 533. when an end was put to their dominion by Belisarius, and Africa reunited to the empire. Salvianus, speaking of the Vandals, says, that they were excelled by all the other barbarous nations both in power and courage; but nevertheless made themselves masters of the best and most fertile provinces of the empire, Providence so disposing to convince the world, that their conquests were not owing to their valour, but to the Lord of hosts, who made use of so weak and contemptible an enemy to punish the sins of the Romans^u. They embraced the christian religion at the same time that the Goths were converted, but held, like the other Gothic nations, the tenets of Arius, and were irreconcilable enemies to the catholic church. Salvian however extols their continence and chastity^v.

As to their irruptions into the empire, for we know nothing of their wars with a other nations, they first began to be troublesome to the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius and Lucius Verus, about the year 166. when, entering into an alliance with other barbarous nations, viz. the Marcomanns, the Nariscians, the Hermundurians, Quadians, Suevians, Sarmatians, Visiovalians, Roxolanians, Baslernians, Costebochians, Alans, Iazygians, &c. they broke into the empire, took and plundered several cities, and, having put to flight the Roman armies sent against them, committed everywhere unheard of ravages. Of this war, which is compared by the antients to the Punic and Cimbrian wars, we have spoken in our Roman history ¹. On this occasion the Marcomanns and Vandals made themselves masters of Pannonia, after having defeated and killed Furius Victorinus the præfektus prætorio, who, with a considerable b army, attempted to put a stop to their inroads². They continued in Pannonia till the year 170. when they were driven out by M. Aurelius, who pursued them to the Danube, and cut great numbers of them in pieces as they were passing that river ³. They entered, it seems, afterwards into an alliance with the Romans; for one of the articles of the peace concluded in 180. between the emperor Commodus and the Alemans was, that they should not make war upon the Vandals ⁴. In the year 215. a war was kindled between them and the Marcomanns; for Caracalla, as we read in Dion ⁵, used to glory in his having set at variance these two nations, which, till then, had lived in peace and amity with each other. By this war both nations were greatly weakened; and this is all we know of it. In 271. the second of Aurelian's reign, c while the emperor was engaged in a war with several German nations, who had broken into Italy, the Vandals, having passed the Danube under the conduct of two of their kings, and several other princes, laid waste the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Aurelian, having gained a complete victory over the Germans, led his army against the Vandals, who, upon the news of his approach, retired with great precipitation. The emperor however pursued and overtook them before they reached the Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to sue for peace; which he readily granted them, upon their delivering to him, as hostages, the sons of their two kings, and several other persons of great distinction. He incorporated two thousand of their best men amongst his own troops, and ordered the rest d to be supplied with provisions at the public expence, till they reached the Danube. Five hundred of them, who had separated from the rest to plunder the country, were cut in pieces by the general of the foreign troops, and their leader put to death by their king's order ⁶. They continued quiet the remaining part of Aurelian's reign; but they no sooner received the news of his death, which happened in 275. than entering into an alliance with the Lygians, Franks, and Burgundians, they advanced as far as the Rhine, and having, without opposition, crossed that river, entered Gaul, and made themselves masters of almost the whole country, which they held for the space of two years, that is, till the year 277. when Probus, who had succeeded Tacitus, marching against them, overcame them in several battles. Most of the Lygians, e a German nation, were cut off, and their king Semno taken prisoner; but he was soon after set at liberty, in virtue of a treaty, by which the Lygians, after having restored the booty, and dismissed the prisoners they had taken, solemnly promised not only to live in amity with the Romans, but to guard the confines of the empire against the other barbarians, who should attempt to break into it ⁷. The Vandals and Burgundians retired at the approach of the Roman army, and, having crossed the Rhine before Probus could overtake them, encamped on the banks of that river. However, being provoked by the insults and raillery of the Roman soldiers encamped on the opposite bank, they attempted to pass the river, with a design to give them battle; but the Romans, falling upon the first that landed, cut great numbers of f them in pieces, took many prisoners, and drove the rest, who were hastening to the assistance of their companions, back into the river, where most of them perished. The emperor was preparing to pass the Rhine, in order to pursue the shattered remains of their army; but, upon their suing for peace, and promising to send back all the prisoners and booty they had taken, he agreed to let them retire unmolested. This promise they did not perform with due fidelity; which so provoked the emperor, that, crossing the Rhine, he fell upon them as they were retiring, put many of them

- a to the sword, and took a great number of prisoners, among whom was Igillus their king, with other persons of great distinction^c. These were afterwards sent by Probus into Britain, and are supposed to have settled in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, where, according to Bucherius, they gave name to the village of Vandelsburg^e. Two years after, Probus finding, on his return from Persia, the province of Thrace almost quite destitute of inhabitants, allowed a great number of Bastarnæ, a Scythian nation, some say an hundred thousand, to settle there. He likewise granted lands in the same province to the Gepidæ, the Juthungians, and the Vandals. The Bastarnæ continued faithful to the empire, and by degrees brought themselves to live after the Roman manner; but the other nations revolting, while the emperor's troops were employed against Saturninus and Proculus, of whom the former had assumed the purple in Egypt, and the latter in Gaul, over-ran, says our historian, the whole empire, committing every where dreadful ravages, to the great dishonour of the Roman name^f. But Probus, having with great success overcome the two usurpers, marched all his forces against the barbarians, and, in several battles, the particulars of which are unknown to us, made such a dreadful havock of them, that few of those, who had entered the Roman dominions, had the good luck to escape the general slaughter^g. No farther mention is made of the Vandals, till the year 291. the eighth of Dioclesian's reign, when we find them engaged in a war with the Goths. The Taisulæ assisted the Goths, and the Gepidæ the Vandals; but as the Romans were no-ways concerned in this war, authors only tell us in general terms, that it was carried on with great vigour; and that the barbarians were so weakened by it, that, for a considerable time, they suffered the Romans to live in peace, not being in a condition to molest them^h. As for the Vandals, they seem to have continued quiet till the year 406. the twelfth of Honorius's reign, when, stirred up by Stilicho, who hoped, by their means, to raise his son Eucherius to the empire, they broke into Gaul with the Alans and Suevians. The Vandals, in attempting to cross the Rhine, were attacked by the Franks, who cut twenty thousand of them in pieces, with their king Godigisles; and would have put them all to the sword, had not the Alans and Suevians come seasonably to their relief. These, joining the Vandals, obliged the Franks to retire; and, crossing without opposition the Rhine, entered Gaul on the last day of the present year 406^k. Procopius writes, that the Vandals, who entered Gaul, had been obliged, by a famine that raged among them at home, to abandon their own country, and seek new settlements; but that the greater part of the nation continued in their ancient seats beyond the Danube^l. Having passed the Rhine, they first ravaged Germania Prima, took by storm, and levelled with the ground, the city of Mentz, the metropolis of that province. From Germania Prima they passed into Gallia Belgica, and from thence into Aquitain, the most fertile and opulent province of all Gaul. Having advanced to the Pyrenean mountains, which they did not at first venture to pass, they over-ran all the neighbouring provinces, committing every-where unheard-of ravages. The Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, were soon joined by the Burgundians, and other barbarous nations, stirred up partly by Stilicho, and partly by the desire of booty, and hopes of enriching themselves with the spoils of so many wealthy provinces^m. An incredible number of barbarians, says St. Jerom, writing about this time, have spread themselves all over Gaul: the whole country between the Alps, the Pyrenean mountains, the ocean, and the Rhine, is held by themⁿ. In the mean time Constantine, being proclaimed emperor by the British legions, from Britain passed over into Gaul, taking with him all the Roman forces quartered in the island, and the flower of the British youth, who were joined, soon after his landing at Bologne, by the Roman troops quartered in Gaul. With these he overcame the Vandals and other barbarians in several battles, and, in the end, reduced them to such streights, that they were obliged to sue for peace; which he granted, without obliging them to quit Gaul, probably because he hoped to maintain himself, by their means, in the power he had usurped^o. Soon after, Geroncius, to whom Constantine, the son of Constantine, had committed the government of Spain, revolting upon some disgust, and setting up one Maximus for emperor, the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, flew to arms, probably at the instigation of the usurper, and made themselves masters of a several cities in Gaul. Hereupon the natives, expecting no relief either from Hono- rius or Constantine, resolved to defend themselves; and accordingly, uniting their forces, they fell upon the barbarians, and defeated them in several encounters. The barbarians, meeting with greater opposition than they expected, and at the same time acquainted with the distracted state of Spain, which was represented to them as a wealthy and fruitful country, resolved to try whether they could settle there. With this design, they bent their march towards the Pyrenees, which they passed without opposition, the guards, who had been placed there, either abandoning their posts at the approach of such multitudes, or joining them, in order to avoid the punishment due to the ravages they had committed in those provinces before their arrival. b

The Vandals,
Suevians, and Alans, enter
Spain.
Not after
Christ 409.

Thus the Vandals, Suevians, and Alans, first entered Spain in 409. according to some,
on the twenty-eighth of September ^a; according to others, on the thirteenth of Octo- ber ^c. They soon made themselves masters of several cities and strong-holds, defeated the troops, which Constantine had sent, under the conduct of his son Constans, to suppress the rebellion of Gerontius, and before the end of the year 410. obliged Constans himself to abandon the country, and retire to his father at Arles ^d. As for Gerontius, he entered into a kind of alliance with them against their common enemy Constantine ^e.
And now the barbarians, having no enemy to oppose them, over-ran the whole country, committing every-where, without controul, unheard-of cruelties; which they themselves afterwards repented ^f. St. Austin, speaking of the duty of bishops on such occasions, alleges the example of the bishops of Spain, when over-run by the barbarians: Many holy bishops, says he, fled, after having seen their flocks dispersed by the barbarians, put to the sword, destroyed by long sieges, or carried into captivity; but many more remained among the barbarians, because those who were committed to their care, chose to remain, being willing to endure all sorts of hardships, rather than be wanting to their duty ^g. The barbarians allowed such of the natives, as desired to abandon the country, to retire unmolested; nay, for a small sum, they conducted them to such places of safety, as they thought proper to chuse ^h.

The unhappy condition of
those provinces.

Idatius, who was about this time bishop of a city in Spain, describes at length the calamities suffered on this occasion by that unhappy people. He tells us, that in d
409. the country was ravaged on one side by the barbarians, and on the other by a dreadful plague, which daily swept off great numbers ⁱ; that, besides these two evils, so great a famine raged in 410. that many were reduced to the dreadful necessity of feeding upon human flesh; that several parents, pressed by hunger, devoured their own children; and that the wild beasts, accustomed to live upon the dead bodies of those who were killed by the barbarians, or died of the plague, being deprived of that food, fell upon the living, and made a dreadful havock of the country-people in the fields and villages. To these calamities was added, says our author, the cruelty of the soldiers and officers, who, being employed by Constantine to levy the taxes, seized and carried off the effects and wealth of the inhabitants, who had e conveyed them into the towns, as places of safety ^j. Olympiodorus tells us, that the Romans, who, upon the breaking in of the barbarians, had taken refuge in the fortified cities and strong-holds, were in the end obliged to feed upon one another. He adds, that a woman, who had no fewer than forty children, killed and devoured them one after the other; which the people no sooner knew, than they fell upon her, and stoned her to death ^k. Such was the deplorable condition, to which the provinces of Spain were reduced by the Vandals, Suevians, and Alans, upon their first entering that country; and in this state they continued from the year 406. to 411.

The Vandals,
Alans, and Sue-vians divide
the provinces of Spain among them.

when Heaven, says Idatius ^l, inspiring the barbarians with thoughts of peace, they began to prefer agriculture to war. Having therefore divided among themselves by lot the provinces of Spain, they applied themselves to the tilling of the ground, and to other works of agriculture. In that division, Galicia fell to the Vandals and Suevi- ans, the former having Gonderic, who had succeeded Godigifles, for their king, and the latter Ermeric; Lusitania, and the province of Cartagena, to the Alans; Betica to the Vandals, called Silingians, who are supposed to have given to their lot the f

- a name of Vandalusia, changed afterwards into that of Andalusia c. Such of the natives as had escaped the general slaughter, and taken refuge in the fortified places, submitted in the end to the barbarians, who, touching the holy book of the gospels, swore, that they would treat them for the future as their friends and allies; which oath they observed so religiously, that many Romans chose to live in poverty under the barbarians, rather than to return into the dominions of the empire d. However, the inhabitants of Galicia maintained their liberty, and formed a separate state in a corner of that province, where they were often attacked by Ermeric king of the Suevians, who, in the end, suffered them to live in peace, being seized with a distemper, of which he languished the seven last years of the fourteen he reigned e.
- b Pope Leo observes, that the catholic church suffered greatly by this irruption of the barbarians, who would not suffer the civil and ecclesiastical laws enacted against heretics, especially the Priscillianists, to be put in execution. On the other hand, the bishops not meeting and holding councils as usual, the followers of Priscillian, who, till that time, had been obliged to keep themselves concealed, began publicly to own their tenets, and gained over a great many profelytes f.

- In the year 416. Vallia, king of the Goths in Gaul, having concluded a peace with the Romans, took upon him to drive the barbarians out of Spain; which gave rise to a war, of which we know but very few particulars. Orosius writes, that on this occasion Vallia gave signal proofs of his zeal for the welfare of the empire g; and
- c Idatius, that Vallia made head against the Alans and Vandals, masters of Lusitania and Betica, and gained great advantages over them h. This is all we know of the present war. In 422. the emperor Honorius, acquainted with the low condition to which the Vandals had been reduced by the Goths under the conduct of Vallia, resolved to attempt the recovery of the provinces held by them in Spain. With this view, he ordered Castinus, general of the foot, and captain of the guards, to march against them at the head of a considerable army, in which served a great number of Goths. Castinus defeated them in several encounters, and reduced them to such streights, that they began to think of abandoning the country; which they had seized; but the Roman general having in the mean time unseasonably ventured an engagement,
- d twenty thousand of his men were cut in pieces, and he obliged, with the poor remains of his shattered army, to take refuge in the city of Tarraco i. Idatius ascribes this defeat to the treachery of the Goths, who served as auxiliaries in the Roman army; but Gregory of Tours, and Salvian, suppose it to be intirely owing to the rashness of Castinus. After this victory, the Vandals made themselves masters of Seville; and, having firmly established their dominion in Andalusia, they ravaged the neighbouring provinces, almost utterly destroyed the city of Cartagena, and, passing over into the Balearic islands, committed unheard-of ravages there, carrying back with them into Spain an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives k. Not long after, the Vandals and Suevians falling out, Gonderic, king of the Vandals, gained
- e great advantages over Ermeric king of the Suevians, whom, in the end, he obliged to fly for refuge to the mountains of Biscay, and there kept him and his people blocked up. But in the mean time Asterius, count of Spain, and the vicar Maurocelus, falling unexpectedly upon Gonderic, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to abandon Biscay and Galicia, and retire into Andalusia l. Gonderic, on his return to Seville, took the church of that city from the catholics, and gave it to the Arians; upon which, being immediately possessed, says Idatius, and tormented with an evil spirit, he perished soon after, that is, in 428. in a miserable manner m. The Vandals gave out, that he had been taken prisoner by the Suevians, and by them put to death, hoping by that means, say some modern writers, to conceal his shameful end;
- f which was a manifest condemnation of the tenets of Arius held by them. Gonderic left several sons behind him; but was nevertheless succeeded by his brother, named by the antients Gaiseric, Geiseric, and Gizeric, but now commonly known by the name of Genferic. Procopius tells us, that he was the natural son of Godigisles, killed by the Franks in 406. and Sidonius, that he was the son of a king; but that his mother was a slave n. He renounced the catholic faith, which he first professed, to embrace the doctrine of Arius held by the Vandals his countrymen o. He was remarkably brave and courageous, well skilled in the art of war, and, from his infancy, inured to the hardships and toils attending a military life^p. But, as we have elsewhere drawn his character^q, we shall only add here from Idatius, that, before his accession to the crown, he was well known to the Romans by the many advantages he had gained over them in Spain; that the victory over Cassinus in 422. was no less owing to his bravery, than to the rash conduct of the Roman general; and that chiefly by his means the Suevians in Spain were reduced to the lowest ebb of power^r. Upon his arrival in Africa, he caused the wife of the deceased king to be drowned in the river Amsbachus, and soon after put all her children to death, to prevent the disturbances they might have raised, as they had an undoubted right to the crown. Genferic had scarce taken possession of the throne, when he was invited over into Africa^b by count Bonifacius, who commanded the Roman troops in that province. Bonifacius had served the empire with the utmost fidelity, and, on that account, had been raised by the empress Placidia to the highest honours, and sent with an unlimited power into Africa; which province he had defended with great bravery against the repeated attempts of the usurper Jobn. His rise gave no small jealousy to his rival Aetius, who thereupon found means to persuade Placidia, that Bonifacius had preserved Africa for himself, and only waited an opportunity of pulling off the mask, and establishing there an independent sovereignty. Placidia, giving intire credit to the insinuations of Aetius, whom she did not in the least mistrust, declared Bonifacius a public enemy, as we have related more at length elsewhere^s, and dispatched a strong body of troops^c against him. Bonifacius, finding the empress bent upon his ruin, and himself not in a condition to contend with the whole strength of the empire, had recourse to Genferic king of the Vandals, who, at this time, peaceably enjoyed the province of Andalusia. Procopius writes, that, in virtue of the treaty concluded between them and Bonifacius, Genferic, whom he supposes to be still living, against the testimony of Idatius, and Genferic, were to have two-thirds of Africa, and he the other; and that they were to assist each other to the utmost of their power^t. The treaty being agreed to, Genferic began to make the necessary preparations for so important an expedition. The barbarians, says Prosper^u, had no vessels, neither did they know how to make use of them; but those who employed them, took care to supply them^d with every thing they wanted. When necessary vessels were got ready, and the Vandals upon the point of going on board, Genferic was informed, that Hermigarius, a celebrated commander of the Suevians, was laying waste the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Genferic, putting himself at the head of a chosen body of troops, went in quest of the enemy; and, coming up with them in Lusitania, gave them a total overthrow. Hermigarius their leader attempted to make his escape; but was drowned in crossing on horseback the river Guadiana near Merida^v. Idatius looks upon his death as a punishment inflicted upon him for speaking contemptuously of St. Eulalia, and pillaging the city of Merida, where the body of that saint was kept and revered^e.

abandon Spain, and pass over into Africa.
Chr. 428.

FROM this expedition Genferic returned to the place where the vessels were kept in readiness for his embarkation. There he had ordered, before his departure, all the Vandals to assemble, with their wives, children, and effects; and having, upon his return, commanded them to go on board, he put to sea in the month of May of the year 428. and, abandoning Spain, crossed the streights of Gibraltar, and landed in Africa^f. The Romans took possession anew of the provinces, which the Vandals had abandoned, and held them till they were driven out by the Suevians, as the Suevians were in their turn by the Goths, as we have related above. Genferic gave out, that his army was eighty thousand strong; but in that number he must have comprised the old men, the children, and even the slaves^g. The author of St. Austin's life^h describes at length the dreadful ravages committed by them in that wealthy province. According to that writer, they were, in the month of May of the year 430. already masters of all the cities of Africa, except Carthage, Cirtba, and Hippo. Cassiodore writes, perhaps to curry favour with those under whom he lived, that the Vandals were driven out of Spain by the *Goths*ⁱ. But Salvian assures us, that they abandoned

- a those countries of their own accord, when they were in a condition to maintain themselves in the possession of what they had acquired with their valour, in spite of the utmost efforts of their enemies, Heaven, that had made use of them to punish the sins of the Spaniards, employing them for the same purpose against the Africans. The same writer adds, that they themselves could not help owning, that they were animated to this enterprize more by a secret impulse from Heaven, than by their own inclination. In the mean time Placidia, having discovered the true cause of the revolt of Bonifacius, wrote a most kind and obliging letter to him, assuring him of her favour and protection for the future, and exhorting him to return to his duty, and exert his usual zeal for the welfare of the empire, by driving out the barbarians, whom the malice of his enemies had obliged him to call in for his own safety and preservation. This Bonifacius readily undertook, offering them considerable sums, provided they quitted Africa, and returned to Spain. But the Vandals, already masters of the far greater part of Africa, first returned him a scoffing answer, and then, falling unexpectedly upon him, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged Bonifacius himself to take refuge in Hippo; which place they invested in the month of May 430. about three months before the death of St. Austin bishop of that city. The siege lasted about fourteen months, that is, till the month of July of the following year 431. when the Vandals were forced, by a famine that began to rage in their camp, to drop the enterprize, and retire^d. Soon after, Bonifacius having received two reinforcements, the one from Rome, and the other from Constantinople, under the conduct of the celebrated Aspar, a resolution was taken by the Roman generals to offer the enemy battle. The Vandals readily accepting the challenge, a bloody engagement ensued, in which the Romans were utterly defeated by the barbarians, who took an incredible number of captives, and obliged the rest to take shelter among the rocks and mountains. Among the prisoners was Marcian, then assessor to Aspar, and afterwards emperor. Aspar, who commanded the eastern troops, escaped with much-ado out of Africa, and returned to Constantinople. As for Bonifacius, he repaired with all speed to Italy, being called thither by the empress Placidia. Upon their departure, the barbarians over-ran all Africa, committing every-where, without controul, unheard-of ravages; which struck the inhabitants of Hippo with such terror, that they abandoned their city, which was first plundered, and then set on fire by the victorious enemy^e; so that Cirtba and Carthage were the only two strong places in Africa still held by the Romans^f. About the same time Genferic made several attempts upon Sicily; but was constantly repulsed by Cassiodore, great-grandfather to the celebrated senator of the same name^g. At length a peace was concluded on the eleventh of February of the year 435. between Valentinian and Genferic^h, whose moderation is greatly extolled by *Procopius*ⁱ. But other writers ascribe his making peace with the Romans, not to his moderation, but to the apprehension he was under of being attacked anew by the united forces of both empires. Be that as it will, the Romans yielded to him part of Numidia, the province Proconsularis, and likewise Byzacene^k. Prosper writes, that, for these provinces, Genferic was to pay a yearly tribute to the emperor of the east^l. He delivered up to the Romans his son Hunneric by way of hostage; but so great was the confidence they placed in Genferic, that, some time after, they sent him back his son; of which they had soon occasion to repent, being convinced by experience, that he had either brought with him into Africa, or learnt there, the treachery peculiar to the inhabitants of that country; for four years after, that is, in 439. the Romans being engaged in a war with the Goths in Gaul, Genferic, laying hold of that opportunity, surprised the city of Carthage on the twenty-third of October; by the taking of which place, the Vandals remained masters of the Proconsularis, of Byzacene, Gatulia, and part of Numidia^m. However, Valentinian maintained, so long as he lived, the other provinces of Africa, though reduced to a most deplorable condition. These were the two Mauritanias, viz. Cæsariensis and Sitifensis, with Tripolitana, Tingitana, and that part of Numidia, in which Cirtba stood. Thus Carthage fell under the power of the Vandals, after it had belonged to the Romans for the space of five hundred and eighty-five yearsⁿ. When news of the taking of Carthage by the Vandals was brought to Rome, Valentinian, not doubting

but they would soon make some attempt upon Italy itself, ordered the walls, towers a and gates of all the cities on the coast to be repaired. The governor of Rome was strictly enjoined to put that city in a state of defence against any sudden attack, and impowered to oblige all the inhabitants, without distinction, to concur in the work. Levies were made, and guards placed on the walls, and at the gates, as appears from a law enacted on the second of March, and addressed to the people of Rome p. From another law dated the twenty-fourth of June 440. we learn, that the Roman people had already received intelligence of Genferic's being sailed from Carthage with a powerful fleet, but were still unacquainted with his design. Hereupon Valentinian published a law, granting to all ranks of people the liberty of taking arms, to defend themselves against the common enemy. By the same law he yields to them whatever they shall take from the Vandals, and exhorts them to act b on this occasion with the courage of true Romans, and with that moderation and justice, that become men of honour. He adds, that an army, destined by Theodosius for the defence of Italy, was in full march; and that Aetius would soon arrive from Gaul at the head of another army. Several bodies of troops were placed, at proper distances, along the coast, under the conduct of Sigisvult, by nation a Goth; and the people ordered to be in readiness to take arms upon the first alarm c. But, notwithstanding all these precautions, Genferic, in the month of June, made a descent upon Sicily, and, meeting with little or no resistance, ravaged the open country, and even laid siege to Palermo; but, not being able to reduce the place, he returned c to Africa with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. It was, without all doubt, on this occasion, that Paschasius, bishop of Lilybaeum, was carried into captivity, as pope Leo informs us, and kept in a most miserable servitude for the space of three years, viz. to the year 443. when he returned back to his see d.

He ravages Sicily.

Genferic being now become formidable to both empires, Theodosius resolved to assist Valentinian his cousin and son-in-law against so powerful an enemy. Accordingly, he fitted out a fleet consisting of eleven hundred large ships, and, putting on board of it the flower of his army under the conduct of Arcovinidas, Ansilus, and Germanus, he ordered them to land in Africa, and, joining the western forces there, to drive d Genferic out of the countries he had usurped. But Genferic pretending in the mean time to be desirous of concluding a peace with both empires, the Roman generals waited on the coast of Sicily the result of the negotiations, till the season proper for action was over. The following year 442. the Huns breaking into Thrace and Illyricum, and committing there dreadful ravages, Theodosius was obliged to recall his forces, and Valentinian to conclude a peace with Genferic, which he could not obtain, but by yielding to him all the countries in Africa which he had seized e. Some years after, that is, in 455. Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian III. being forced, by the usurper Maximus, who had murdered her husband, to marry him, in order to revenge this affront, dispatched a trusty messenger to Genferic, conjuring e him to come and revenge the death of his friend and ally Valentinian, and rescue her out of the arms of a tyrant, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of her husband f. As the empress assured him, that he would meet with little or no resistance in Italy, and at the same time promised to assist him to the utmost of her power, he embraced, with great joy, so favourable an opportunity of enriching himself with the spoils of so wealthy a country; and, putting to sea without loss of time, steered his course strait to Rome, which he took and plundered, as we have related at length in our Roman history g. Amongst other persons of great distinction, Genferic carried with him over into Africa the empress Eudoxia, her two daughters Placidia and Eudocia, and Gaudentius the son of Aetius. Marcian, who succeeded Maximus, dispatched ambassadors to Genferic, earnestly intreating him to suffer the empress and the two princesses her daughters to return to Rome; but he, despising both his intreaties and menaces, kept them till the year 462. when he sent back Eudoxia, with her second daughter Placidia, to Leo, the successor of Marcian; but kept Eudocia, and married her to Huneric his eldest son, who had by her Hilderic, afterwards king of the Vandals in Africa h. Victor Tununensis tells us, that Leo, then a bishop of Rome, went out to meet Genferic, and, with his affecting eloquence, persuaded him to forbear shedding the blood of the innocent citizens, and setting fire to the city ¹; but, according to Evagrius, the Vandals not only pillaged the city, but set it on fire; so that several public as well as private buildings were intirely consumed ². Baronius writes, upon what authority we know not, that Genferic spared, as Alaric had done, the churches of St. Peter, St. Paul, and the Lateran ³.

Genferic, upon his return to Africa, made himself master of the countries that were still held there by the Romans. Hereupon Avitus, who had succeeded Valentinian III. dispatched embassadors to him, putting him in mind of the treaty he had concluded with the empire in 442. and threatening, if he did not observe the articles of that convention, to make war upon him, not only with his own forces, but with those likewise of his allies, meaning the Visigoths, that were ready to embarque and pass over into Africa. Accordingly, he sent a numerous fleet to Sicily, under the conduct of Ricimer, whom we have had frequent occasion to mention in our Roman history, with orders to keep themselves in readiness to put to sea upon the first notice ^b. But Genferic, without the least regard to the emperor's remonstrances or threats, sailed from Carthage with a fleet of sixty ships, having on board a great number of land-forces, and shaped his course towards Corfica, it being yet a secret whether he designed to make a descent upon Italy or Gaul. But Ricimer no sooner heard he had put to sea, than he too weighed anchor, and, coming unexpectedly upon him near

c Corfica, utterly defeated him ^c. However, he returned soon after with a more numerous fleet, and, making a descent on the coast of Italy, carried off unmolested an immense booty, and a great number of captives; which Marcian, emperor of the east, hearing, and at the same time pitying the condition to which Eudoxia and her two daughters were reduced, dispatched embassadors to Genferic, earnestly intreating him to send back the three princesses, and to forbear ravaging the lands of the empire, pursuant to the treaties he had concluded with the emperor of the west. Genferic heard the embassadors; but dismissed them without any answer. Upon their return Marcian, imagining, that an Arian might speak with more liberty to, and be more favourably received by, a prince of that persuasion, wrote a letter to d him with his own hand, and charged Bleda, a bishop of that sect, to deliver it to him. Bleda, finding he could obtain nothing by prayers and intreaties, told him boldly, that he ought not to let himself be so blinded by the success that had hitherto attended him, as not to reflect on the danger to which he exposed himself, by provoking such a warlike prince as Marcian. Genferic heard him with patience; but refused to comply with either of the emperors requests ^d. Some writers tell us, that Marcian, finding he could obtain nothing of Genferic by fair means, resolved to make war upon him, but died before he could put his design in execution ^e. Jornandes, as quoted by other writers, supposes him to have concluded a peace with the Vandals ^f. Procopius, who greatly extols Marcian in other respects, blames him for e neglecting the affairs of Africa, and scrupling to make war upon Genferic, by reason of the oath he had been obliged to take, when prisoner in Africa, that he would never molest the Vandals ^g. Evagrius supposes Eudoxia, with her second daughter Placidia, to have been sent back to Marcian ^h; but he was therein certainly mistaken; for Genferic set those two princesses at liberty several years after, at the request of the emperor Leo. Priscus writes, that Genferic obtained of the emperor of the east, Marcian, or his successor Leo, part of the effects of the deceased emperor Valentinian, as the portion of Eudocia that prince's daughter married to Huneric the son of Genferic ⁱ. But we do not well comprehend what right the emperor of the east had to dispose of what belonged to the emperor of the west. In the year 457.

f Avitus, emperor of the west, who had succeeded Valentinian III. being deposed, after a short reign, Majorianus was chosen in his room. In the beginning of that prince's reign, the Vandals made a descent on the coast of Campania; but the Romans, falling upon them while they were busied in plundering the country, put great numbers of them to the sword, among whom was the brother-in-law of Genferic, and obliged the rest to quit their booty, and save themselves on board their fleet ^k. Majorianus, not satisfied with this small advantage, resolved to pass over into Africa, and attempt the recovery of those wealthy provinces. With this view ^a he assembled a fleet consisting of three hundred vessels, hired a great number of troops of the barbarians, who lived in amity with the empire, and are named by Sidonius ¹, and made other necessary preparations for so great an undertaking; the Gauls, though greatly exhausted by heavy imposts, contributing with joy their share towards them ^m. Of these military preparations mention is made by Procopius ⁿ, and likewise by Cassiodore ^o, who tells us, that Majorianus spent the whole year 457. and the three following, in making the necessary preparations for driving the Vandals out of Africa. At length, in the year 460. Majorianus leaving Arles, where he then resided, soon after Easter, which that year fell on the twenty-seventh of March, bent his march towards Spain, which he entered in the month of May, with a design ^b to cross over from thence into Africa ^p. Procopius writes, that Majorianus, the better to inform himself of the strength of the enemy, went in disguise to the court of Genferic, pretending to be an ambassador sent by the Roman emperor with proposals for an accommodation: he adds, that, while Genferic was shewing him his arsenal, all the arms moved of their own accord with a dreadful noise ^q. The Romans did not in the least doubt of success, having Majorianus for leader; and the Vandals, dreading the issue of a war under the conduct of so renowned a commander, did all that lay in their power to avoid it. Genferic sent ambassadors with proposals for concluding a peace with the empire, which he promised to observe with the utmost fidelity; but these being rejected by the emperor, he laid waste all Mauritania, and ^c even poisoned the waters, being informed, that Majorianus designed to land there, and thence march to Carthage ^r. In the mean time, the Roman fleet being assembled in the bay of Alicant, and Majorianus ready to embark, a Squadron of Genferic's best ships appeared unexpectedly, and, falling upon the Roman vessels at anchor, sunk a great number of them, disabled others, and returned with some in triumph to Africa. This misfortune, which, we are told, was owing to the treachery of some on board the Roman fleet, disconcerted all the emperor's measures, and put a stop to the enterprize. However, Majorianus, persisting in his resolution of invading Africa, ordered the ships to be repaired, and in the mean time returned to Arles, to pass the winter there. Genferic, finding the late misfortune had not diverted Majorianus ^d from his former resolution, and dreading the arms and valour of so great a general, dispatched ambassadors to him with new proposals, which he in the end accepted ^s. Thus a peace was concluded between Majorianus and Genferic; but the articles of the treaty have not been transmitted to us. Whatever they were, Genferic did not long observe them; for he was no sooner informed of the death of Majorianus, which happened the following year 461. than he sent a powerful fleet to pillage the coasts of Sicily and Italy, and even made himself master of Sardinia ^t.

Genferic.

THE following year 462. the inhabitants of Italy, being informed, that Genferic was making great preparations with a design to renew his ravages on their coasts, had recourse to Leo emperor of the east, Severus, whom Ricimer had raised to the em- ^epire of the west, being no-ways qualified for that high station, and altogether incapable of protecting them against so powerful an enemy as Genferic. They earnestly intreated Leo either to supply them with ships of war, or to procure for them, by his mediation, some kind of agreement with the king of the Vandals. Leo declined sending them any supplies, which, he said, would be an open breach of the treaties subsisting between Genferic and the emperors of the east; but dispatched ambassadors into Africa, with proposals for a peace with the western empire, earnestly pressing Genferic at the same time to send back Eudoxia and her daughter Placidia. Genferic answered, that he would hearken to no terms till the effects of Valentinian were delivered up to him, which he claimed as the portion of Eudocia, that prince's eldest ^f daughter, whom his son Huneric had married. However, he sent back to Leo the two princesses, declaring, that he was willing to live in peace with the emperor of the east; but under the above-mentioned pretences he never failed, for some years, to make descents early in the spring on the coasts of Sicily and Italy, pillaging the country; but ever avoiding to engage the Romans, and retiring as soon as their forces appeared ^u. Olybrius, of whom we have spoken elsewhere ^v, having soon after mar-

- a ried Placidia, Genferic took from thence a new pretence to ravage Italy more than ever, declaring, that he would wage an eternal war with the western empire, unless Olybrius, brother-in-law to his son, was raised to the imperial dignity ^a. Hereupon the inhabitants of Italy had recourse anew to the emperor Leo, who dispatched the patrician Tatian to Genferic, injoining him to conclude a peace with that prince upon any terms; but Genferic would hearken to none ^b. In the mean time the emperor Severus dying, the Romans sent deputies to Constantinople, intreating Leo to send Anthemius into Italy, whom they designed to chuse emperor. Anthemius was a native of Constantinople, descended of an antient and illustrious family, had married the daughter of the late emperor Marcian, and was at that time count of the east. Leo readily complied with the request of the Romans; so that Anthemius, arriving in Italy, was with one consent chosen emperor, notwithstanding the great interest made by Genferic in favour of Olybrius. Hereupon Genferic, highly provoked against Leo for contributing to the promotion of Anthemius, sent a powerful fleet with orders to ravage Peloponnesus and the Greek islands, which they did accordingly, committing unheard-of cruelties, and carrying off a great number of captives ^c. Leo was no sooner informed of these ravages, than he dispatched one Philarchus to acquaint Genferic, that, if he did not forbear such acts of hostility, he should be obliged to make war upon him, and repel force with force. But Genferic, despising his menaces, answered, that, if Leo thought fit to make war upon him, he should not find him unprepared; and soon after, to bid him, in a manner, defiance, he sent his fleet to ravage anew the coasts of Greece, and the other maritime provinces of the eastern empire; nay, a report was spread in Constantinople, that his fleet had appeared before the city of Alexandria, which greatly alarmed the emperor, and the whole court. But we are told, that the famous anchoret Daniel Stylita, to whom the emperor had recourse, removed their fears, by assuring them, that the design of the barbarians would prove abortive; and that they would soon return to Africa, without being able to make themselves masters of Alexandria, or any other place. As he foretold, so it happened; for the barbarians, after several unsuccessful attempts on Alexandria, and some other places, returned home, without either captives or booty ^d.
- e THE following year 468. Leo, resolving, at all events, to revenge the affront offered by Genferic to the eastern empire, made vast preparations for carrying the war over into Africa. Procopius writes, that on this occasion he spent an hundred and thirty thousand pounds weight of gold ^e. Candidus, as quoted by Suidas, tells us, that the prefects contributed forty-seven thousand pounds weight of gold towards defraying the charges of this war; the prince seventeen thousand of gold, and seventy thousand of silver, out of his privy purse; that the money arising from the sale of confiscated estates, was employed in buying up provisions, purchasing ships, hiring troops, &c. and that Anthemius, emperor of the west, assisted Leo to the utmost of his power both with men and money ^f. Cedrenus computes the charges of this war in a manner, that to us seems quite unintelligible ^g. Leo, says Procopius, assembled all the ships that were found in the seas and ports of his empire ^h, which, according to Theophanes, amounted to one hundred thousand ⁱ. But that writer confounded perhaps the number of the ships with that of the men, who, according to Procopius ^j, did not exceed that number. Nicephorus supposes, with Theophanes, the fleet to have consisted of an hundred thousand sail; but, speaking of the rowers, he makes them to amount to no more than seven thousand ^k; a mistake altogether unpardonable. Procopius only says, that Leo fitted out the greatest fleet the Romans had ever had ^l; and Cedrenus, that the number of the ships amounted to one thousand one hundred and thirteen, each ship having an hundred men on board ^m. In this enterprize were employed the best troops of both empires; for not only Anthemius sent very considerable supplies both of men and ships ⁿ, but likewise Marcellinus, who had established a new sovereignty in Dalmatia, as we have related elsewhere ^o; nay, that prince commanded in person, not only his own troops, but those likewise that were sent by Anthemius emperor of the west ^p. The same of these warlike preparations struck the whole world, says Constantine Manasses ^q, with terror and amazement:

And likewise Peloponnesus, and the Greek islands.

Leo makes vast preparations, with a design to invade Africa

nothing, continues he, seemed capable of defeating so numerous an army, so powerful a fleet, except gold, which no power can resist. But as the time appointed by Providence for punishing the Vandals was not yet come, Heaven suffered Leo to commit the whole management of this war to Basiliscus, brother to his wife Verina. Basiliscus had gained great advantages over the barbarians in Thrace, where he had commanded as general of that province; so that, as to his military capacity, he seemed sufficiently qualified for so great a command, the more as he had under him one John, a person of extraordinary courage, and experience in war ^a. But, on the other hand, Basiliscus was actuated by two very dangerous passions, viz. avarice and ambition. The latter even prompted him to aspire at the sovereignty, which he hoped to attain by means of Aspar, who governed under Leo with almost an absolute sway; but, as he professed the doctrine of Arius, he was himself, on account of his religion, excluded from the imperial dignity. He had lately quarrelled with Leo, and therefore fearing, lest that prince, if he got the better of the Vandals, should, by his victory, be enabled to reduce his power, and punish him, as he well deserved, for his arrogance, he is supposed to have entered into a private treaty with Basiliscus, promising to raise him to the throne, provided he spared Genferic, for whom he might likewise have some regard, as for one who professed the same tenets with himself ^b. The island of Sicily was appointed the place of the general rendezvous. From thence Marcellinus was to sail for Sardinia, which the Vandals had lately seized; Heraclius of Edeffa, a brave and experienced officer, for Libya; and Basiliscus, with the greatest part of the fleet, and the flower of the troops, to steer his course strait to Carthage ^c. Pursuant to this plan, Marcellinus landed in Sardinia, and made himself master of that island, while Heraclius, with the troops quartered in Egypt, in Thebais, and Cyrenaica, landing unexpectedly in the province Tripolitana, reduced Tripolis, and the other cities in that country. From thence he began his march by land, with a design to join Basiliscus at Carthage. That commander, sailing from Sicily, arrived with his fleet at cape Mercury, but fourteen leagues from Carthage, soon after Genferic had received the disagreeable news of the loss of Sardinia and Libya. The arrival of so formidable a fleet, and the losses he had already sustained, struck him, tho' a man of great intrepidity, with such terror, that, looking upon himself as irretrievably lost, he is said to have had some thoughts of evacuating Africa, and retiring elsewhere: and truly, if Basiliscus had marched directly to Carthage during the panic which had seized the barbarians, he might, in all likelihood, have made himself master of that city, and put an end to the war at once, by an intire reduction of the country ^d. Some authors write, that he had already gained considerable advantages over the fleet of Genferic ^e; and Jornandes, that he attacked Carthage several times by sea; but either for want of skill, or because he was willing to favour Genferic, his attacks were not so vigorous as the barbarians expected ^f. Hereupon Genferic, recovering from his late consternation, sent deputies to the Roman admiral, begging a truce of five days, to settle with him the conditions, on which he was to submit to Leo ^g. Some writers tell us, that, with the ambassadors, Genferic sent privately a considerable sum to Basiliscus, hoping to induce him, by that means, to grant him his request; which he did accordingly, continuing in the mean time inactive in his camp ^h. Genferic demanded the above-mentioned truce, hoping a favourable wind might spring up during that time for falling upon the Roman fleet; for his men were all on board the ships of war, which were to tow other light and empty vessels. The wind proving as favourable as the Vandals could wish, before the truce was expired, they weighed anchor, and, drawing near to the Roman fleet, set fire to the empty ships, which being, by the wind, driven upon the Roman fleet, spread to many of their ships, and threw their whole navy into the utmost confusion. While the Romans were thus in disorder, and busied either in keeping off the fire-ships, or extinguishing the flames on board their own, the Vandals, falling upon them, overwhelmed them with showers of darts, took several of their ships, sunk others, and obliged the rest to save themselves in the best manner they could ⁱ. Several Romans distinguished themselves on this occasion in a most eminent manner; but above all John, whom we have mentioned above, who, finding himself surrounded on all sides by the

- a enemy, attacked them one after another, and killed a great number of them on board their vessels; but, not being able to prevent their boarding his, when he saw himself overpowered, he threw himself, armed as he was, on a plank into the sea. Genſon, the ſon of Genſeric, admiring his courage and gallant behaviour, begged he would not abandon himſelf to deſpair, offering him at the ſame time his life and liberty; but the brave commander answering, John ſhall never fall into the hands of ſuch dogs, quitted his plank, and was drowned^b. Theophanes writes, that Genſeric fell upon the Romans in the night, and that finding them not upon their guard, but aſleep, as they depended upon the truce, he eaſily overcame them^c. Baſiliſcus, ſays Conſtantine Manaffeſſes, was glad to be overcome^d; and Zonaras writes, that, inſtead of encouraging his men with his example, he betook himſelf the firſt to flight; which gave new vigour to the enemy, and quite diſheartened the Romans^e. Heraclius, who was in full march from Libya to Carthage, upon the news of the bad ſucceſs of Baſiliſcus, thought it adviſeable to turn back, and haſten into the territories of the empire. Marcellinus returned to Sicily, where he was aſſaſſinated by an officer who commanded under him, not without the privity, as was ſuppoſed, of Anthemius, to whom his power gave no ſmall umbrage^f. As for Baſiliſcus; he returned to Sicily with the few ſhips that had eſcaped, and from thence to Conſtantinople, where, upon his arrival, he took refuge in the church of St. Sophia. But tho' his treachery was publicly known, his life was ſpared, and leave granted him to retire to Heraclea in Thrace, the empreſs Verina, his ſiſter, having employed the great intereſt ſhe had with the emperor in his behalf^g. But Aspar, who had promiſed him the ſovereignty, as the reward of his treachery, was ſo far from being able to perform his promiſe, that he could not ſave his own life, being, by Leo's orders, put to death ſoon after, as we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory^h. Such was the iſſue of his unhappy expedition, which is ſaid to have drained both empires of their wealth, and to have coſt them the lives of above fifty thouſand menⁱ. Genſeric, finding the Romans quite diſheartened by the loſſes they had ſuſtained, reſolved not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of extending his conqueſts. Accordingly, without loſs of time, he put to ſea, and, landing in Sardinia, recovered that iſland from the Romans. Genſeric reduces Sicily, Sardinia, &c.
- d Thence he ſailed to Sicily, which he likewise reduced, as he did the three following years all the iſlands between Italy and Africa^k, the Romans being no-ways in a condition to put a ſtop to his conqueſts, and trembling at the very name of Genſeric^l. From theſe iſlands he ſent yearly fleets to ravage the coaſts of Italy, of Peloponneſus, and the Greek iſlands, equally deſpiſing both emperors, and bidding defiance to their power. At length, in the year 476. he concluded a peace with Odoacer king of Italy, to whom he yielded the iſland of Sicily, but upon condition he ſhould hold it of him, and pay him a yearly tribute, for the ſecuring of which he kept the ſtrong caſtle of Lilybaeum^m. The year before, he had concluded a peace with the emperor Zeno, Concludes a peace with Zeno, who renounces all claim to Africa Year after Chriſt 475. the ſucceſſor of Leo, who, renouncing all claim to the provinces of Africa, yielded them for ever to Genſeric, and his deſcendants. The perſon employed by Zeno on this occaſion was one Severus, a ſenator of an unblemiſhed character, and highly eſteemed on account of his diſinterreſtedneſs, candor, and integrity. He was received by Genſeric with all poſſible marks of honour and eſteem, that prince, who was ſtricken in years, being deſirous to put an end to the war by a laſting peace, that his ſon Hunneric might quietly enjoy the kingdom he had founded. After the concluſion of the peace upon the terms we have mentioned above, Genſeric, greatly taken with the frugal life and modeſty of the Roman ambaffador, ſent him a conſiderable ſum of money, and very rich preſents; which he reſuſed, ſaying, That the only preſent worthy of a Roman ambaffador, would be the delivery of the many Romans, who
- f were held in captivity. Genſeric was ſo pleaſed with this answer, that he immediately ſent for Severus, and told him, that all the Roman captives, who had fallen to his ſhare, and to the ſhare of his children, were free, and at his diſpoſal; and gave him at the ſame time leave to ranſom ſuch as had been divided among the ſoldiers and officers of his army, provided he could prevail upon them to part with them, it not being in his power to force them to it. Severus, having thus obtained without ranſom the liberty of all the Roman captives belonging to the king and the royal fa-

But as by this peace the dominion of the Vandals was firmly established in Africa, the Romans renouncing all claim to that province, we shall, pursuant to our plan, reserve a farther account of their affairs to a more proper place, and in the mean time deliver what we have found in the antients concerning the Sueves, b from the earliest account of time till their settling in Spain.

The name, seats, origin, &c. of the Sueves.

THE Sueves were, in Cæsar's time, the greatest and most warlike nation of all c Germany p. Tacitus divides them into several tribes or nations, known by different names, comprehending, under the common name of Sueves, the following people, viz. the Longobardi, the Semnones, the Rheudingi, the Aviones, the Angli q. Ptolemy mentions only three nations of the Sueves, viz. the Suevi Longobardi, the Suevi Samnones, and the Suevi Angli, whom Tacitus, and other writers, call Angli. Some writers will have the Vandals and Sueves to be one and the same people, called Vandals from the word Wandrende, and Sueves from the word Schwachende, both which signify wanderers; for Strabo tells us, that the Sueves often changed their seats, wandering from place to place r. In the time of the emperor Nero, they dwelt between the Rhine and the Elbe; for Strabo, who flourished under that prince, speaks d of them thus: The Sueves are a great and powerful people; for their country extends from the Rhine to the Elbe, nay, some of that nation dwell beyond the Elbe. Some years after, that is, in the time of Tacitus the historian, they were seated between the Elbe and the Vistula or Weisser; for there they are placed by that writer s. From them the Suevus, now the Oder, took its name; and the Baltic was called the Suevian sea. Solinus is of opinion, that they were called Suevi from mount Suevio, parting Germany from Sarmatia. As to their origin, nothing has been alleged by authors but what is very uncertain, and no ways to be depended upon, some deriving their origin from Scandinavia, some from Sarmatia, some from Hungary, and some endeavouring, with several arguments, and monuments of antiquity, to convince us, that they e were originally a German nation t. Some writers tell us, they came out of Scandinavia, and settled on the banks of the Albis or the Elbe; that they were there subdued by the Saxons, and thence blended under their name, as were all the other nations conquered by that people. However, the Sueves retained at the same time their own name; and hence the Angli, who were, as we have hinted above, a Suevian nation, are sometimes called Saxones Angli, and sometimes Suevi Angli. Cisnerus supposes these to be two different nations u; but his opinion is plainly confuted by the learned Sheringham w. The Sueves were a warlike nation, and, as such, are commended both by Cæsar and Tacitus, of whom the former often confounds them with the Catti, as after him does Strabo x, and likewise Seneca the tragic writer y; for, by these writers, they are placed in the Hercynian forest, which was, beyond dispute, inhabited by the Catti or Cbatti. The Sueves had kings of their own, and seem to have agreed in customs and manners with the other German nations. But of their affairs we know very little till the Romans became acquainted with them, which happened in the year of Rome 742. the twenty-second of Augustus's reign, and about eight years before the birth of our Saviour, when Drusus, the son of Livia, and brother to Tiberius, passing the Rhine, entered Germany, and, in three campaigns, reduced f.

- a all the nations between that river and the Elbe^a, and among the rest the Sueves. But that young prince dying on his return to Rome, the nations he had subdued threw off the yoke; which obliged Augustus to dispatch Tiberius against them, who overran great part of Germany, and forced the barbarians to send deputies to Augustus, suing for peace; but the emperor would not even hear them, because the Sicambrians, one of the most warlike nations among them, had not sent their deputies with those of the other barbarians. The war was therefore continued, till the Sicambrians, no longer able to hold out, submitted to such conditions as Augustus thought fit to impose upon them, as did likewise the Sueves, the allies and confederates of the Sicambrians^a. The Sicambrians and Sueves having thus submitted, Tiberius, pursuant to the instructions he had received from Augustus, obliged forty thousand of them to pass the Rhine, and settle in Gaul^b. Suetonius tells us, that seats were allotted to them on the banks of that river^c; but Suetonius, says Bucherius, was therein perhaps mistaken, it being probable, that they were placed at a considerable distance from the Rhine, to prevent their passing that river, and joining the other German nations; nay, that author endeavours to prove from several ancient monuments, which are still extant, that the country about Courtray was antiently inhabited by the Sueves^d. Some are of opinion, that from these Sueves sprung the Burgundians, so called from the boroughs, in Latin burgi, in which they were placed by the Romans; but this opinion is generally exploded. There are no traces remaining, whence we can conjecture what country was allotted to the Sicambrians^e. Though some of that people remained beyond the Rhine, yet, in the space of about sixty years, the whole nation was extinct^f. Of them therefore is to be understood what we read in Dion, viz. that Augustus having distributed into several villages the Germans he had taken in war, they were so grieved thereat, that they destroyed themselves with their own hands, especially the persons of distinction among them, who were very numerous^g. Mention is made of the Sicambrians after this time; but it is commonly thought, that the name of Sicambrians was given to the neighbouring nations, who settled in their country^h, that is, in the southern parts of Westphalia. Augustus thus obliged part of the Sicambrians and Sueves to quit their own country, in order to weaken them, having found by experience, that he could neither depend upon their word nor their hostagesⁱ.

The Sicambrians and Sueves submit to Tiberius. Year before Christ 8.

Part of them transplanted into Gaul.

- In the reign of Tiberius, the Sueves, quarrelling among themselves, which was chiefly owing to his intrigues, drove out Marobodes their king, a prince greatly dreaded by the Romans, and chose Catualdes in his room, who, at the instigation of Tiberius, had stirred up the Sueves against him. Marobodes took refuge in the Roman dominions, and was allowed by Tiberius to settle at Ravenna, where he passed the last eighteen years of his life. Catualdes himself was soon after driven from the throne, and obliged to take refuge in the city of Frejus. As both princes came attended by great numbers of Sueves, their friends and adherents, Tiberius, apprehending they might disturb the peace of the empire, allotted them lands beyond the Danube, and appointed a Quadian, by name Vannius, to reign over them. Vannius governed them for the space of thirty years, that is, to the year 50. of the christian æra, the tenth of the emperor Claudius, when being in the end become obnoxious to the nation, on account of his haughty and imperious conduct, he was by them, with the assistance of their neighbours the Hermundurians and Lygians, deposed and banished^k. Claudius refused to assist him; but nevertheless allowed him to retire into Pannonia, and even gave him and his followers lands in that province^l. Vangio and Sido, nephews to Vannius by his sister, but his declared enemies, divided his dominions between them, and continued ever faithful to the Romans^m. Sido, and Italicus, who had succeeded Vangio, joined Vespasian with all their forces against Vitellius, and on that occasion commanded their troops in personⁿ. In the year 83. a colony of Sueves was settled in Frisia; for Tacitus, in the life of Agricola, tells us, that some Germans in the Roman service, and quartered in Britain, having killed their officers, and made their escape, were driven ashore on the coast of Germany, and there taken and sold for slaves by the Sueves and Frisians, who believed them pirates^a. How, or on what occasion, the Sueves came to settle there, we are no-where told. In the year 85. the Sueves, and their allies the Lygians, being greatly harassed by the neighbouring nations, sent deputies to Domitian, earnestly intreating him to assist them in their distress. Domitian dismissed the ambassadors with a favourable answer, but sent them only one hundred horsemen; which so provoked the Sueves, that, joining the Iazyges, a Sarmatic nation, they resolved to pass the Danube, and, by laying waste the Roman territories, revenge the affront that had been offered them; for they thought themselves affronted and derided by the emperor^b. What happened after, our historian has not thought fit to tell us; but Tacitus, in one place^c, writes, that the Sarmatians and Suevians rose in arms against the empire: and in another^d, that, soon after Agricola was returned to Rome, that is, in 85. the Roman armies were defeated in Pannonia. The Sueves, of whom Dion speaks here, were, without all doubt, those to whom Tiberius had allotted lands beyond the Danube, as we have related above. That writer places them, and likewise the Lygians, in Mæsia, giving to that province a far greater extent than other historians and geographers have done; for, even according to him, these people dwelt beyond the Danube, which was, according to all other writers, the boundary of Mæsia to the north, that province extending along the south side of the Danube, from the confluence of that river, and the Saw or Savo, at Belgrade, to the Euxine sea^e. We find no farther mention of the Sueves till the year 168. when, joining the Marcomans, and other German nations, they laid waste several provinces, defeated great armies, and threatened the empire with utter destruction. But of this war, which is compared, by the antients, to the Punic and Cimbrian wars, we have spoken at length in our Roman history^f, to which we refer the reader. In 268. the first of Claudius's reign, the Sueves, entering into an alliance with other German nations, broke into Italy, and advanced as far as the lake Benacus, now lago di Garda, in the neighbourhood of Verona; but were there utterly defeated by the emperor, and most of them cut in pieces^g. This, perhaps, is the victory of which Vopiscus speaks, where he tells us, that, in the reign of Claudius, Aurelianus fought a great battle with the Sueves, and gained a signal victory over them^h. In 357. the twenty-first of Constantius's reign, the Sueves broke into Rætia, the Quadians into Valeria, and the Sarmatians into Lower Pannonia and Upper Mæsia, which obliged the emperor, who was then at Rome, to quit that metropolis, and march against themⁱ. But as he returned soon after to Italy, and no mention is made of any engagement, we may conclude from thence, that at his approach the barbarians withdrew, and retired to their respective countries. The poet Claudian, in his poem against Eutropius, tells us, that when news was brought to Honorius of that minister's promotion to the consulship, the prince was then busied, with Stilicho, in receiving the submissions of the Alemans, the Suabians, and the Sueves; in giving them kings, and settling the number of troops which they were to furnish^j. This is supposed to have happened about the year 398. but as these nations are not said, by any historian, to have submitted to Honorius, we are inclined to believe these pretended submissions to be only a poetical fiction. In the year 406. they entered Gaul with the Alans and Vandals, and from thence passed into Spain in 409. as we have related above. They continued ravaging that country, putting all to fire and sword, till the year 411. when, the Romans being quite driven out, they made peace with the natives, and divided the Spanish provinces, by lot, among them. In this division, Galicia fell to the Vandals and Sueves; but the inhabitants of that province, refusing to submit to the barbarians, stood up in defence of their liberties, and formed a separate state in a corner of their antient country, where they were often attacked by the Sueves, under the conduct of Emeric or Ermeric, their king. But that prince, being seized with a lingering distemper, suffered them to live in peace the seven last years of his reign^k. About three years after the Sueves, Vandals, and Alans, had divided the Spanish provinces among them, Alaulphus, king of the Visigoths, quitting Gaul, settled in Catalonia, where he was murdered the same year, as was likewise his successor Sigeric, after a

- ^a short reign of seven days, as we have related above. But Vallia, who succeeded Sigeric, having concluded a peace with the Romans, fell upon the Sueves, Vandals, and Alans in Spain, gained several advantages over them, and cut off such numbers of the Alans, that the few, who escaped the general slaughter, were obliged to submit to Gonderic, king of the Vandals. The Sueves likewise sustained great losses in this war; but nevertheless maintained, against the utmost efforts of the Gotbs, that part of Galicia, which, in the division of the provinces, had fallen to their share. The Gotbs returning soon after, that is, in 418. to Gaul, where Constans had bestowed on them Aquitania Secunda, the Vandals and Sueves began to quarrel among themselves; for, the year after the departure of the Gotbs, we find the Sueves, with their king
- ^b Emeric, shut up by Gonderic, king of the Vandals, among the mountains of Biscay. But Asterius, count of Spain, and Maurocelus, vicar to the præfectus prætorio, falling unexpectedly upon the Vandals, obliged them to leave the Sueves, and retire out of Galicia into Bætica. Upon their retreat, the Sueves made themselves masters of that part of Galicia which had been held by them. In the year 430. a body of Sueves attempted to cross the Rhine, with a design to enter Gaul, and from thence to pass into Spain, and join their countrymen settled in Galicia; but Aetius, who was then in Gaul, falling upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to return to their own country, between the Elbe and Weissel.^b Of this victory Jornandes speaks without all doubt, where he tells us, that Aetius overcame the Sueves, made a dreadful havock of that nation, and subjected them to the empire.^c At the same time he defeated, with great slaughter, the Juthongians, whose country bordered on Rætia, and the Norici, who were subjects of the empire, but had revolted, and joined the Sueves and Juthongians.^d
- In Spain the Sueves made their utmost efforts to reduce the inhabitants of Galicia; but that brave people still maintained themselves free, defending their strong holds, against the repeated attacks of the barbarians, with such resolution, that Emeric thought it advisable to conclude a peace with them, that his people, who began to be greatly distressed for want of corn, might apply themselves to the tilling of the land, and other works of agriculture. This peace, however, was but short-lived; for, the following year 431. the Sueves began hostilities anew, and, breaking into the territories of the natives, committed there dreadful ravages, destroying all with fire and sword. Hereupon the unhappy Galicians dispatched Idatius the chronologer, their bishop, into Gaul, to acquaint Aetius with the deplorable condition to which they were reduced; and to intreat him to send what troops he could spare to their assistance. Aetius, who was then at war with the Franks, not being able to afford them the least aid, sent count Censorius into Spain, with the character of ambassador, to Emeric, hoping to induce him, by that means, to conclude a peace with the natives. Emeric received the Roman ambassador with the greatest marks of honour, and, at his request, began to treat with the Galicians; but the treaty was soon broken off, and hostilities renewed, which continued till the year 437. when Censorius was sent again to the court of Emeric, with one Fresimund, to bring about an accommodation between that prince and the Galicians; which they did in the end, Emeric being seized with a lingering distemper, and thereby rendered incapable of bearing the toils of war.^e A peace being thus concluded, Emeric resigned the crown to his son Rechila, after he had reigned twenty-eight years, reckoning from the year 409. when the Sueves first entered Spain under his conduct. He lived four years after his resignation quite retired, without ever concerning himself with public affairs.^f Rechila signalized the beginning of his reign, says Idatius, with a victory gained in Bætica over one Andevotus, whose rich treasures he pillaged;^g but who this Andevotus was, we are no-where told. In the year 439. Rechila, entering Lusitania, made himself master of Merida, the capital of that province;^h and, pursuing his conquests, reduced, the two following years, the city of Seville, and the two provinces of Bætica and Cartagena. Hereupon the Romans, who had anew taken possession of Bætica, upon the departure of the Vandals, dispatched into Spain one Astierus, to drive them out of the provinces they had seized. Astierus fell upon the Bagaudæ, who had lately settled in the province of Tarraco, and, cutting most of them in pieces, recovered that country;ⁱ but we do not find, that he attempted any thing against the Sueves.

Rechila succeeded by his son Rechiarus. Year after Christ 447.

Rechiarus concludes a peace with the Romans.

Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, espouses the cause of the Romans against him.

Rechiarus utterly defeated, taken, and put to death by Theodoric.

Not long after, Visus, who commanded a considerable body of Roman troops in Spain, with the title of magister militiæ, entering the provinces of Bætica and Cartagena, committed there great ravages; but a body of Goths, who came to his assistance, being defeated by Rechila, both he and his army were seized with such a panic, that, betaking themselves to a shameful flight, they left the Sueves at full liberty to pillage the country at their pleasure, and reduce several strong-holds, that, till then, had been held by the Romans ^k. Two years after, that is, in 447. died Rechila, and was succeeded by his son Rechiarus, who took the royal ensigns at Merida, in the month of August of the present year, notwithstanding the opposition he met with from some of his own nation ^l. He professed the catholic faith; but began his reign by plundering his neighbours lands ^m. The following year, he married the daughter of Theodoric, king of the Goths, in Languedoc, and, immediately after his marriage, entering the territories of the Gascons, who were still in Spain, says father Labbé in his chronology, laid them waste far and near ⁿ. From thence he went to pay a visit to his father-in-law at Tboulouse, and, on his return to Spain, surprised the city of Lerida, whence he carried with him a great number of captives. He afterwards pillaged the territory of Saragosa ^o, which, according to Isidorus, in his chronology of the Sueves, belonged to the Romans ^p. The same writer adds, that in this expedition Rechiarus had with him a body of Goths; and that he likewise laid waste the province of Cartagena, which Rechila, says he, had restored to the Romans ^q. In the year 452. the twenty-seventh of the reign of Valentinian III. Manfuetus, count of Spain, and count Fronto, were sent, by the emperor, to Rechiarus, with proposals for an accommodation between him, and the natives of Spain who still continued subject to the Romans. Rechiarus not only received the Roman ambassadors with the greatest marks of esteem, but concluded a peace upon the terms which the emperor had enjoined them to propose. What these terms were, we are no-where told; but they are said, by Idatius, to have been very advantageous to the empire ^r. The peace, thus concluded, was religiously observed by Rechiarus till the death of Valentinian in 455. when, taking advantage of the general confusion occasioned by the murder of that prince, and likewise of his successor Maximus, he over-ran and pillaged the province of Cartagena, with a design, says Jornandes, to make himself master of all the countries that were still held in Spain by the Romans ^s. Hereupon Avitus, who had succeeded Maximus, dispatched count Fronto into Spain to put the king of the Sueves in mind of the treaty he had concluded with Valentinian. At the same time, Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, who had espoused the interest of Avitus, dispatched ambassadors to Rechiarus his son-in-law, earnestly intreating him not to seize on the countries belonging to the empire; lest he too should be obliged to treat him as an enemy, and join the emperor, whom he was bound to support against him ^t. What answer Rechiarus returned to the ambassadors, our historian does not inform us: he only tells us, that he had no sooner dismissed them, than, breaking into the province of Tarraco, which belonged to the Romans, he laid it waste, without the least regard either to treaties or justice ^u. Hereupon Theodoric sent him a second embassy, to which he answered, with great haughtiness, that if Theodoric found fault with his conduct, he was ready to give him an account of it at Tboulouse. Theodoric, piqued at this answer, began to prepare for war; and, having first concluded a peace with the neighbouring nations, he set out, with the consent and approbation of Avitus, for Spain, leading with him a very numerous army, consisting of his own people, and a body of auxiliary Burgundians, commanded by Gondiac and Hilperic, or Chilperic, the son, as is supposed, of Gundicarius, king of that people, who was killed about the year 436 ^v. Rechiarus was in the mean time busied in ravaging anew the province of Tarraco, whence he carried with him into Galicia a considerable booty, ^w and a great number of captives ^x. But hearing that Theodoric was marching against him, he went to meet him at the head of a powerful army. Hereupon an engagement ensued, on the banks of the Urbicus, now Orbegua, at a place about twelve miles from Astorga. Both armies engaged with great resolution and intrepidity; but in the end the Sueves were utterly defeated, and put to flight. Rechiarus, who was dangerously wounded, with much ado made his escape, and took refuge in a distant corner of Galicia. The battle was fought on a Friday, the fifth of October;

- ^a and Theodoric, pursuing the enemy, entered Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of the same month, and gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers ^γ. From Braga he advanced to a place called Portugal, whither the fugitive king had retired. Jornandes writes, that Rechiarus attempted to make his escape by sea, but was driven back by a storm ⁷. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken and delivered up to Theodoric, by whose orders he was put to death, after he had been kept some time in prison ^α. The Sueves, disheartened by the captivity of their king, submitted to the Goths, by whom great numbers of them were put to the sword, tho' Theodoric had ordered their lives to be spared ^β. Theodoric appointed one of his officers, named Aquilulphus, to govern the Sueves who had submitted to him. But he, revolting from Theodoric, caused himself to be proclaimed king of the Sueves; which obliged Theodoric to send a powerful army against him, by whom he was defeated, taken prisoner, and, by Theodoric's orders, soon after beheaded ^γ. Thus Jornandes; but Idatius only says, that he died the following year at Porto ^δ. The Sueves, who, refusing to submit to the Goths, had retired to the most distant corner of Galicia, no sooner heard, that Rechiarus was dead, than, scorning to live in subjection either to the Goths, or the treacherous Aquilulphus, they chose one Maldra, the son of Maffilel, in his room ^ε. Maldra chosen king in his room. Year after Christ 456.
- Theodoric* king of the Visigoths, after the above-mentioned victory over the Sueves, had marched from Galicia into Lusitania, and there, after reducing several other cities, had laid siege to Merida, the metropolis of the province, which, in the end, was obliged to surrender. The king designed at first to give up the city to be plundered by his soldiers; but St. Eulalia, a famous martyr of that place, is said to have deterred him, by some prodigies, from putting his design in execution ^ζ. Being soon after obliged to return to Gaul, he left behind him part of his troops, consisting of different nations, and commanded by several generals, with orders to march into Galicia, and there reduce such of the Sueves, as had not yet submitted to him. But these troops, after having committed dreadful ravages in the countries belonging to the Romans, were recalled by Theodoric, who had occasion to employ them elsewhere, before they began to act against the Sueves. That people, having now nothing to apprehend from so formidable an enemy, began to quarrel among themselves; some of them continuing faithful to Maldra, whom they had lately chosen, and others setting up against him one named Franton. Being thus divided among themselves, they made peace with the Galicians, or the natives of that province, who still held several strong-holds, and maintained themselves a free people among the mountains, and in some of the fortified towns ^η. These are, by most authors, styled Romans, because they still acknowledged the Roman emperor, and looked upon themselves as subjects of the empire. Notwithstanding the peace concluded between them and the Sueves, the partisans of Maldra, breaking unexpectedly into Lusitania, pillaged the country, and put to the sword a great number of Romans, under pretence of making war on the Goths. Being received into Lisbon as friends, they made themselves masters of the city, and kept it ^θ. Soon after, that is, in 458. Franton dying, the whole nation of the Sueves acknowledged Maldra for their king, by whose orders they laid waste that part of Galicia, which lay on the Douro, without the least regard to the treaty of peace concluded the year before ^ι. About this time Theodoric sent an army into Spain against the Sueves, under the conduct of Cyrila, who, entering Bætica, which belonged to the Romans, committed there the same disorders, as the Sueves did in Galicia, without offering to molest those against whom they were said to have been sent. At the same time ambassadors were sent to the Sueves, both by Theodoric king of the Visigoths, and by Genferic king of the Vandals in Africa, probably to conclude, not only a peace, but an alliance with them against the emperor Majorianus, whose great parts, and military genius, gave them no small umbrage. The peace however was not concluded; for the following year 459. Theodoric, having recalled Cyrila, and the army commanded by him, sent one Sunierac with another army in his room; which did not prevent the Sueves from pillaging Lusitania under the conduct of Maldra, and Galicia under that of his son Remismund ^κ, by Jornandes called Richmund. Some writers speak of a battle fought this year between the Sueves and Galicians, in which the latter lost many persons of distinction¹. The same year a 459. Ma'dra killed, upon what provocation we are not told, his brother, whose name has not been transmitted to us. Soon after this murder, he surprised the strong castle of Portugal, which was held by the natives. But he was soon overtaken by the doom his treachery and barbarity well deserved, being killed, by whom our historian does not tell us, in the end of February of the following year 460^m. Upon his death his son Remismund and Frumarius divided his troops between them. Frumarius was likewise, as we may suppose, the son of Ma'dra, and brother of Remismund; for he not only had part of the troops, but shared with Remismund the dominions of the deceased prince. In the first year of their reign, the Sueves of Lugo in Galicia, falling treacherously upon the Romans, who lived in that city, on Easter-day, which in b 460. fell on the twenty-seventh of March, cut great numbers of them in pieces, as they were not upon their guard, thinking themselves sufficiently protected by the solemnity of a day held by all christians in the greatest venerationⁿ. Sunieric and Nepotianus, who commanded the troops of Theodoric in Spain, no sooner heard of this outrage, than they detached part of their forces to take vengeance on the traitors. The Goths, entering Galicia, laid waste the territory of Lugo; but a false report being spread among them by Dielines, Spinio, and Ascanius, who were natives of the country, but held a private correspondence with the Sueves, they returned into their own territories, without daring to advance farther into the enemy's country^o. The same year, the three above-mentioned persons led a party of Sueves through c by-ways to surprise the city of Aque Flavia, where they took Idatius, bishop of the place, prisoner, on the twenty-sixth of July, and carried him into captivity, as he himself relates^p. After this, Frumarius laid waste the territory of Braga, and Remismund, at the same time, that of Orenso, on the Minho in Galicia. But the two princes, growing jealous of each other's power, began to quarrel, which gave the natives some respite; for with them they concluded a peace, that they might be more at leisure to watch each other's motions. This peace was observed for the space of four years, that is, till the year 464. when, Frumarius dying, the Sueves were again all reunited under Remismund, who immediately dispatched ambassadors to Theodoric, acquainting him with the death of Frumarius, and soliciting him to conclude a peace d with the Sueves, which he did accordingly, sending ambassadors to Remismund with rich presents, and likewise arms, in token of his sincere friendship, and the confidence he reposed in him. At the same time he sent him a young woman of extraordinary beauty, whom he married^q; but who she was, our historian does not inform us. Jornandes writes, that Remismund sent the bishops of Galicia to Theodoric, hoping, by their mediation, to obtain a peace; that Theodoric received them with all the respect that was due to their rank and dignity; that he soon after recalled the general and troops he had in Spain; and that Remismund, by a second embassy, returned him thanks for the peace he had granted him. This peace, however, did not hinder Remismund from surprising, this very year, the city of Coimbra, which was held by the natives, e and carrying with him from thence several captives. He did not, it seems, keep this city; for, three years after, that is, in 467. he surprised it anew^r. The following year 465. Remismund was prevailed upon by Theodoric to set at liberty the prisoners he had taken at Coimbra, and make peace with the natives^s. But this peace, says Idatius, was attended with a greater and far more dangerous evil than the war itself. Rechiarus, king of the Sueves from the year 447. to 456. renouncing paganism, had embraced the catholic faith, and his example had been followed by the whole nation of the Sueves; but at this time they suffered themselves to be infected with the heresy of Arius by one Ajax, a native of Galatia, who, abandoning the catholic faith, had been ordained by the Arians. Coming into Gaul, he had staid some f time at the court of Theodoric, and had been treated by that prince, who held the tenets of Arius, with great respect. From Gaul he passed into Spain, where he was well received by the Sueves, upon the recommendation of Theodoric. The kind reception he met with encouraged him to propagate his errors among the Sueves, and impugn the doctrine of the trinity^t. Isidore writes, that he infected the whole nation with the pestiferous tenets of Arius, and that they continued in their errors during a the reigns of several princes, till the time of king Theodemir, who, about an hundred years after, brought them back to the true faith *.

In the mean time, Theodoric being murdered by his brother Euric, Remismund, thinking himself no longer bound by the treaty of peace, which he had concluded by his mediation with the natives, broke into Lusitania, and, having surprised the city of Coimbra, gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers. He likewise ravaged and laid waste the territory of Aunona belonging to the Galicians; who thereupon sent deputies to Euric king of the Visigoths, begging his mediation and good offices with the king of the Sueves. Accordingly Euric prevailed upon Remismund to grant a peace or truce to the people of Aunona; but, in the mean time, he himself committed dreadful ravages in Lusitania, made himself master of Pampelona and Saragosa, and, having overcome and put to flight the nobility of the province of Tarraco, who continued faithful to the Romans, made himself master of all Upper Spain †. Thus were the inhabitants of Spain, who could not prevail upon themselves to withdraw their obedience to the Romans, and submit to the barbarians, in a most cruel manner plundered and harassed on one side by the Goths, and on the other by the Sueves, while the Romans were no-ways in a condition to relieve them. Of the calamities they suffered, the reader will find a full and pathetic account in Idatius, who tells us, that the Sueves, when they surprised Coimbra, plundered the houses, laid most part of the city in ashes, and carried with them into captivity such of the inhabitants as had not the good luck to make their escape ‡. The following year 688. they made themselves masters of Lisbon, which was betrayed to them by one Lusides, who was a native of the place, and commanded in the town. As Lisbon was at that time held by the Goths, the troops of that nation, entering Lusitania, committed dreadful ravages on the territories belonging to the Sueves, as did the Sueves on those of the Goths. However, Euric, being wholly bent upon driving the Romans quite out of Spain, with a design to fall afterwards upon the Sueves, concluded, for the present, a peace with Remismund, and then, turning his arms against the Romans, made himself master of all the places, that had been hitherto held by them, as we have related above, in the history of the Visigoths; but he died before he could put in execution the design he had formed against the Sueves. Remismund, finding he could no longer cope with the Visigoths, who were now masters of almost all Spain, retired into Galicia, and there, giving over all thoughts of new conquests, ended his days. His successors followed his example, contenting themselves with the kingdom of Galicia, and observing a strict neutrality in the disputes, that arose between the Visigoths and the Romans. By this means they maintained themselves in the quiet possession of Galicia till the year 585. when they were subdued by Leunigild or Leovigild king of the Visigoths, and their kingdom reduced to a province of the Gothic monarchy, after it had lasted an hundred and seventy-four, or, as some will have it, an hundred and seventy-seven years. But of the successors of Remismund, to which prince the emperor Antemius is said to have yielded Galicia in 468. and of the downfall of their kingdom, we shall speak at length in a more proper place.

f AS the antients, by whom mention is first made of the Franks, have given us no account of their origin, and Valesius, a most diligent and curious inquirer into the antiquities of his nation, has prudently waved this subject, it cannot be expected we should say any thing relating thereto, that may be depended upon. Of the various opinions, or rather conjectures, that have been offered on this head by the modern writers, and which it would be too tedious to relate, that of Buchorius seems to us the most probable, viz. that the Franks were originally a motly multitude of several antient nations dwelling beyond the Rhine, who, uniting against the Romans in defence of their common liberty, styled themselves Franks, that word signifying, in their language, as it still does in ours, free §. It is certain, that under the name of Franks are comprised in history several nations, whose names were known a long before theirs, viz. the Aëluarii, Chamavi, Bructeri, Salii, Frisii, Chauci, Amisvarii, and Catti. The Franks are sometimes called Sicambrians, because they inhabited the country formerly possessed by that nation, of which the far greater part was cut off by Augustus, and the rest transplanted into Gaul, as we have related above. As for the opinion of those writers, who derive the name and origin of the Franks from one Francio, the son of Hector, it is too fabulous to be seriously confuted. No less ridiculous, if we may be allowed to use that term, is the opinion of the abbot Urspergensis, and several others, who suppose the name of Franks to have been first given them by the emperor Valentinian. The original of the Franks, says Urspergensis, is to be fetched from the antient stock of the Trojans; for at the time that Aeneas, after the destruction of Troy, came into Italy, other Trojan exiles arrived in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, and, settling there, enlarged their bounds as far as Pannonia, and built the city of Sicambria, from which they took the name of Sicambrians. Being in process of time become a powerful and mighty nation, they drove out the Alani their neighbours. Valentinian, admiring their courage and intrepidity in war, gave them the name of Franks, and, for the space of ten years, exempted them from all tributes and taxes. That time being expired, the emperor sent an officer to raise the usual tribute; but they, shaking off all subjection, slew the officer, and openly declared they would no longer obey the Roman emperors. At that time reigned amongst them c two, who bore the antient names of Priamus and Antenor. The emperor, highly incensed against them, ordered all the Roman forces, and a great many auxiliaries, to march into their country. The Franks met them; but, in the battle that ensued, they were overpowered with numbers, and put to flight, their king Priam being killed in the engagement. Scorning to live in subjection to the Romans, they abandoned their country, and, retiring into Germany, settled in Thuringia, where they were governed by Marcomicus the son of Priam, and Sunno the son of Antenor. Thus Urspergensis. And the same account of the origin and name of the Franks is given by Aimonius, Ado archbishop of Vienna, Gaguinus, and Aeneas Sylvius; only the latter writer supposes Francio to have been their leader from Troy to the Palus Mæotis; and d Ado brings them from thence, not into Thuringia, but to the countries bordering on the Rhine. This account, of all others the most akin to the idle romances of our Geoffrey of Monmouth, is so far from being vouched by any antient historian, that, on the contrary, it evidently contradicts all antient history, in supposing the Franks to have been so called from Valentinian; whereas it is certain, that their name occurs in history at least an hundred years before that emperor's time. Goropius Becanus explodes the opinion of those, who derive the origin of the Franks from the Trojans; but at the same time supposes them to have come from the Palus Mæotis into Germany, without being able to allege any thing to support his opinion, but a few groundless, not to say childish conjectures. Bodin will have the Franks to have been descended from the e Gauls, who, being increased to such a degree, that the country was too narrow for them, sent colonies beyond the Rhine into Germany. Some of these colonies settled on the banks of that river, and, in process of time, conquered their antient country. Cæsar indeed tells us, that the Gauls sent colonies into Germany; but upon what authority can we suppose the Franks to have been descended from those Gauls, rather than from some other of the many nations settled in Germany? Upon the whole, we think the opinion of Buchorius, which we have mentioned above, to be by far the most probable; for, as we have hinted before, we find several German nations, whose names occur in history many ages before that of the Franks was known, comprised under the general name of Franks; a strong proof, that the Franks were not a new nation come from the Palus Mæotis, or any other country, to settle in Germany, but f consisted of several German nations united, as Buchorius conjectures, against the Romans, in defence of their common liberty.

As for the seats of the Franks, it appears from their constant incursions into Gaul, that they dwelt on the banks of the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Menz. All historians speak of them as placed there, till their settling in Gaul. The orator Eumenes, who flourished at Autun, in the end of the third century, distinguishes the country, which the Franks held originally, and he places on the coast of the ocean, from the country which was conquered by the Romans beyond the Rhine, and after-

- a wards seized by the Franks^a. Their country, according to the best modern geographers and historians, was bounded on the north by the ocean; on the west by the ocean and the Rhine; on the south by the Lbone or the Mein; and on the east by the Weser^b: according to which description, they possessed the present countries of Westphalia, Hesse, and some adjacent states. St. Jerom calls them a nation not so great as powerful, and places them between the Saxons and Alemans^c, viz. the Saxons to the east, and the Alemans to the south; for those were properly called Alemans, who dwelt between the Rhine, the Mein, and the Danube. The same writer tells us, that the Saxons received a great overthrow at Deuson, in the country of the Franks^d; which place Pontanus, and most other writers, suppose to be the same, that, by later historians, is called Duisium, and now Duyts, over against Cologne. Pontanus adds, that, in his time, a stone was discovered in a monastery there, with an inscription, importing that fortress to have been placed there in the country of the Franks by the emperor Constantine. Beatus Rhenanus assures us, that he saw at Ausburg, in the custody of Peutinger, a map drawn in the time of the later emperors, wherein the country, from the mouth of the Rhine to Cologne, is marked in capital letters with the word Francia. Aimoinius likewise writes, that Clodio, who succeeded Pharamond, resided at Dyspargum, now Duisburg, at a small distance from the Rhine. Upon the whole, we may conclude, that the Franks possessed the countries we have mentioned above, and that, in process of time, they extended their borders along the Rhine, as far as the mouths of that river, and the ocean. The Franks were antiently divided into several tribes, whereof the Ansuarii and Salii, mentioned by Ammianus, were by far the most considerable. Pontanus supposes the Ansuarii to be the same people with the Ansinarii, of whom mention is made by Tacitus. These, being driven out of their own habitations by the Cbauci, seized on the country from which the Frisians had been driven by the command of Nero. Tacitus calls them a more powerful nation than that of the Frisians. Pontanus is of opinion, that they were a nation that wandered from place to place, without any fixed habitation, ready to join any other, as they found their advantage therein; that, agreeable to this principle, they joined the German nations lying towards the ocean, when, uniting against the Romans, in defence of their common liberty, they took the name of Franks; that they too were blended under that common appellation; but at the same time retained their antient name, being called Ansuarii, or Ansinarii Franci. This name some derive from the Teutonic word Hance, signifying excellent, free; whence the free towns of Germany are still called the bance towns. Others, and among the rest Goropius Becanus, will have them called Ansuarii or Ansinarii, from the German word Ansie, signifying society, because they were ready to join any other nation in league and society; and hence, according to these writers, the free towns of Germany are styled bance towns, they being united in one society, though far separated from one another. As for the Salian Franks, who broke into Taxandria, now Brabant, but were driven out by Julian, as we read in Ammianus^e, Beatus Rhenanus derives their name from the Sala, which falls into the Mein; Paulus Æmilius from another river of the same name, that empties itself into the Elb; Sidonius Apollinaris from the Latin word Salio, as if they had been so called from their leaping and dancing; and lastly, Pontanus from the river Sala, now the Issel, on the banks of which they dwelt. The latter opinion seems to us by far the most probable, since the other two rivers, bearing the same name, flowed at some distance from the territories of the Franks. As for the derivation of Sidonius, it appears to us quite childish, though perhaps not ill adapted to the present Franks, a leaping and dancing people. As for their manners, Vopiscus paints them as a most treacherous and faithless nation, accustomed to sport with the most solemn oaths and ties, and not deeming it at all dishonourable to break their word^f. Salvianus, mixing together their good and bad qualities, says, that they were greatly addicted to lying, but civil and kind to strangers^g. Procopius describes them as of all nations the most faithless, and regarding the least their word and oaths^h. But Agathias, who flourished soon after Procopius, extols them on account of the fidelity, justice, and concord, with which they lived among themselvesⁱ; and St. Bernard, in one of his epistles, tells us, that they observed their oaths with the greatest strictness.

and religion ; infomuch that they thought themselves bound by a public oath, even a when it was sinful to take it^k. This change the French writers ascribe to the christian religion ; but whether they may not still be taxed with their original want of faith in the observance of the most solemn oaths and treaties, let the world judge. They seem to have been always troublesome neighbours ; whence Egonbardus, chancellor to Charles the Great, used to say, I should chuse a Frank for a friend, but not for a neighbour : and truly, from the earliest accounts we have of that restless and ambitious nation, it appears, that they have ever incroached upon their neighbours, till they attained the power they now enjoy, which, however great, is not capable of satisfying their boundless ambition, and preventing their aspiring at a far greater power and grasping at universal monarchy.

As to their form of government, it was, without all doubt, monarchical, tho' authors have given us no account of their first kings. The Franks are first mentioned in history about the year 241. and yet Tyro Prosper tells us, that the most antient king of that nation, whose name occurred to him in searching the records of time, was Priam, who reigned about the year 382^l. After him reigned his two sons Marcomir and Sunno, and at the same time Genobald. Next to them came Theodomir or Theudemir, the son of Ricimer, who was consul in 384. Theodomir was succeeded by Pharamond the son of Marcomir, and grandson of Priam. It is however to be observed here, that as Fredigarius supposes Theodomir to have been the son and immediate successor of Clodio, and ascribes to the former whatever else is by other writers ascribed to the latter, the learned Usser concludes from thence, that Theodomir and Pharamond were one and the same person, and accordingly places the defeat and death of Pharamond in the year 428. when Clodio began his reign, and the Franks were by Aetius driven out of that part of Gaul, that bordered on the Rhine, as we read in Prosper. In the reign of Pharamond, or not long before, the Franks, passing the Rhine, which had been the boundary between them and the Romans for the space of near two hundred years, settled in Thongria, that is, in the territory of Tongres, where they were governed by as many kings as they had cities or cantons. These kings were chosen out of the most illustrious families among them, and distinguished from their subjects by the length of their hair^m. But whether Pharamond had any authority over the other princes, or was only a prince more powerful than the rest, is what we cannot gather from history. Bucherius is of opinion, that, in Pharamond's time, Honorius concluded a treaty with them, in virtue of which they were allowed to settle in the country bordering on the Rhine on the side of *Cologne*ⁿ. But what he writes is not vouched by any of the antients. Aetius obliged them, as we have hinted above, to repass the Rhine, having overcome them in battle, and slain their king Theodomir or Pharamond. However, Clodio, the successor of Pharamond, settled anew in Gaul ; for we are told by Grogory of Tours, that he resided in the castle of Disparg, supposed by Bucherius, and most geographers, to have stood in Brabant, on the borders of Thongria^o. Clodio was succeeded by Merovæus, Merovæus by Childeric, and he by Clodavæus or Clovis, the first christian king of the Franks, who drove the Goths out of Gaul, and fixed the royal seat at Paris, where it has continued ever since his time.

Tyro Prosper tells us, as we have observed above, that Priam, the father of Marcomir and Sunno, is the first king of the Franks, whose name he found recorded in history ; but it is certain, that, by the antients, other kings are mentioned long before his time, that is, before the year 382. when Tyro Prosper supposes him to have reigned. These are Atec, Genobald, Ascaric, Gaisus or Regaisus, Maloric, Mallobaudus or Mellobandus. Atec and Genobald seem to have reigned at the same time, but over different nations or tribes of the Franks ; for they are both named by Mamertin in his panegyric on Dioclesian, pronounced about the year 288. as reigning at that time. Atec, with his Franks, had plundered the coasts of Gaul ; but was obliged by Dioclesian to sue for peace, and make great submissions to that prince, in order to appease him, and be confirmed by him in his kingdom. Genobald likewise was forced to submit, says our panegyrist, which was the only means of his being restored to the quiet possession of his dominions^p. In the same panegyric, Mamertin speaks of a great victory gained by the generals of Dioclesian over a fickle and deceitful nation of barbarians ; which description suits no nation so well as that of the Franks. It was

- a perhaps upon this victory that the two above-mentioned kings were obliged to submit to the emperor, who, in all likelihood, took, on that occasion, the surname of Franciscus, which, in antient inscriptions, is given both to him and his colleague Maximian 9. Alcaric and Gaisicus of Ragaisus reigned over the Franks in the time of Constantius the son of Constantine the great, and were, by the latter, in the first year of his reign, that is, in 306. taken prisoners, and exposed to the wild beasts in the public sports 1. Malaric, who lived in the reigns of Constantius the son of Constantine, of Julian and Jovian, is called, by Marcellinus, only the governor, or chief of his countrymen, in the emperor's palace 2; but is, by Procopius, reckoned among their kings. Jovian, in the year 364. the first of his reign, appointed him general of the Roman troops in Gaul 3; but he declined that employment 4. Mallobaudus, or Mellobaudus, styled by Marcellinus king of the Franks 5, commanded under Gratian in 377. and the following year 378. gained a signal victory over the Alemans, of whom thirty thousand were killed upon the spot, and, among the rest, Triarius their king 6. Mallobaudus, though king of the Franks, served in the Roman army, and thought himself honoured with the employment of comes domesticorum to the emperor Gratian. Ricomer, Ricimer, or Richimer, who was comes domesticorum to the same emperor, general of the Roman horse, and consul in 384. is, by some, reckoned among the kings of the Franks. His son Theodomir reigned over the Franks in the time of Honorius, and was killed by the Romans, with his mother Ascla, according to an antient chronicle quoted by Gregory of Tours 7. Fredigarius supposes him to have been killed by count Castinus, who was sent against the Franks, by the emperor Honorius, about the year 421 8. at which time all other writers suppose Pharamond to have reigned. Usher, as we have hinted above, will have Theodomir and Pharamond to have been one and the same person. But why might not Theodomir and Pharamond have reigned at the same time? it being certain, that the Franks, in the time of Pharamond, had several other kings, nay, as many kings as they had cities or cantons, as we have observed above. 'Tis true, that Fredigarius makes Theodomir the father and immediate predecessor of Clodio, and says of him what is said by other writers of Pharamond. But Fredigarius, whom Valesius styles an impertinent writer 9, might have been, and probably was, therein mistaken; seeing all other writers suppose Pharamond the son of Marcomir, or of Sunno, as we read in Vitalis 10, to have succeeded Theodomir. Tyrs Propper is the only author that mentions Priam, according to him, the father of Marcomir and Sunno. His name perhaps gave rise to the romances of those writers, who derive the origin of the Franks from the Trojans, whose last king bore that name. Such romances were, in some degree, countenanced, not only by the name of Priam, but by an opinion, which obtained among most writers, as Gregory of Tours informs us 11, viz. that the Franks had dwelt in Pannonia before they settled on the banks of the Rhine. Having thus given the reader the best account we have been able to gather from the most authentic writers of the first kings of the Franks, without taking upon us to ascertain the order of their succession, or their descents, we shall now pass to their wars and exploits, from the time they are first mentioned in history to their settling in Gaul.
- c of the Franks, without taking upon us to ascertain the order of their succession, or their descents, we shall now pass to their wars and exploits, from the time they are first mentioned in history to their settling in Gaul.

THE first historian, by whom mention is made of the Franks, is Vopiscus, in the life of the emperor Aurelian; where that writer tells us, that the Franks made an irruption into Gaul, and, though few in number, committed there dreadful ravages. But Aurelian, then only tribune of the sixth legion, quartered at that time in Mentz, marching against them, killed seven hundred of them, took three hundred prisoners, whom he sold for slaves, and obliged the rest to quit their booty, and retire 12. This event is placed, by Valesius, in the year 254. the second of the emperor Valerian's reign 13; by Bucherius and Cointius 14, in 234. In which year it is certain, the Germans made an irruption into Gaul; and Aurelian, say they, born in 200. and then only thirty-four years old, might have attained to no higher post in the army than that of tribune. But as it appears from Vopiscus, that at the time Aurelian overcame the Franks, the emperor was preparing to march against the Persians, and Gordian

marched against them in 242. Vorburgus concludes from thence, that the Franks ^a were defeated by Aurelian the preceding year 241 8. But at what time soever this happened, it is agreed on all hands, that the Franks, who afterwards proved so troublesome neighbours to the Romans, and greatly contributed to the downfall of the western empire, are first mentioned in history on this occasion. In the year 256. the fourth of Valerian's reign, they broke anew into Gaul, with several other German nations, but were intirely defeated by Gallienus; whom Valerian had taken for his partner in the empire ^b. For this victory Gallienus took the surname of Germanicus, as appears from a medal struck in the latter end of the present year ^c. However, the Franks and other German nations returning soon after in far greater numbers, Gallienus, no longer able to repress them by force, offered advantageous terms to one of their ^b chiefs, who, readily accepting them, took upon him to guard the frontiers of the empire, which he did accordingly, often engaging the Franks, and other barbarians, attempting to break into the empire. Thus Zosimus ^d; but who this prince was, he has not thought fit to tell us: Vopiscus indeed informs us, that Gallienus lived in friendship with Attalus king of the Marcomans, to whom he yielded part of Upper Pannonia, taking his daughter, by name Pipa, or Pipara, as he pretended, for his wife; but by historians she is looked upon only as his concubine, he being already married to Solonina ^e, styled, in the antient inscriptions, Cornelia Solonina Augusta ^f. The following year 257. some Franks seem to have served in the Roman army against the Goths; for among the auxiliaries that marched with Aurelian into Thrace, which ^c province the Goths were then pillaging, mention is made of Hartoman, Haldegastus, Hildemon, and Carioviscus ^g, which names bear a great resemblance to others that frequently occur in history among the Franks; whence Vorburgus concludes them to be the names of some chief men of that nation, who came with a body of their countrymen to assist the Romans in this expedition ^h. Three years after, that is, in 260. the Franks, and other German nations, taking advantage of the confusion which the captivity of Valerian, taken prisoner by the Persians, had caused throughout the empire, broke into Gaul, and, having ravaged the most wealthy provinces there, made an irruption into Italy ⁱ. St. Jerom ^j and Orosius ^k add, that the Franks, crossing the Alps, and passing through Rætia and Lombardy, advanced to the neighbourhood ^d of Ravenna, laying waste the country, and committing every-where dreadful ravages. Zosimus writes, that this sudden irruption obliged Gallienus to take the field, in order to drive back the barbarians; but whether they were forced by him to retire, or withdrew of their own accord, he does not tell us. Five years after, they committed unheard-of ravages in Spain. Victor writes, that, after they had ravaged Gaul, they passed from thence into Spain ^l; but Valesius endeavours to prove, from the panegyric of Nazarius on Constantine, that they conveyed themselves thither by sea ^m; for that author writes, that they suffered themselves to be transported, by their warlike ardour, beyond the bounds of the ocean, and struck terror into the coasts of Spain itself ⁿ. They passed the bounds of the ocean, according to Valesius, by entering the Mediterranean, and landing in one of the Spanish provinces bordering on that sea. Be that as it will, they penetrated into a country, to use the expression of Eutropius, so far distant from their own, and made themselves masters of it, as we are told by St. Jerom ^o. Orosius writes, that they held, or rather pillaged, Spain for the space of twelve years ^p; and that they took by storm, plundered, and almost utterly destroyed, the city of Tarraco, which was then one of the chief cities of Spain, and the metropolis of several provinces; but for the space of a hundred and fifty years it bore the marks, adds the same author, of what it suffered on that occasion. Some of the Franks, having provided themselves with vessels, crossed over into Africa, with a design to enrich themselves with the spoils of that wealthy nation ^q; but what was the issue of that undertaking, we are not told. The same year 265. Posthumius, who had revolted in Gaul, and taken upon him the title of emperor, gained great advantages over the Franks, attempting to break into those provinces, drove them all beyond the Rhine, and even built some forts in their country; whence,

- a on his medals he is styled the restorer of Gaul, the defender of the empire^a. On the same medals frequent mention is made of his victories over the Franks, chiefly in the fifth year of his reign, that is, in 265. and on some he is styled Germanicus Maximus, the Franks being distinguished in those times, as Valesius well observes, by the name of Germans, from the Alemans, and other nations inhabiting Germany. That writer is of opinion, that the medals of Posthumius, on which Deuso, now Duitz, over-against Cologne, and Macusa, now Incuse, in north Holland, are mentioned, allude to the victories he gained over the Franks^b. However, they afterwards served under him against Gallienus, and supported him, to the utmost of their power, in the authority he had usurped^c. In the year 273. the fourth of the emperor Aurelian's reign, they made an irruption into Gaul; but were driven back with great slaughter by that prince, who, having taken several of them prisoners, led them, with the captives of several other nations, in triumph, when he made his public entry into Rome, which we have described at length in our Roman history^d. Aurelian dying two years after, the Franks, together with the Lyges, the Burgundians, and the Vandals, crossing the Rhine, entered Gaul, and, having reduced above seventy of the chief cities of that country in the space of two years, looked upon themselves as masters of all Gaul. But in the mean time Tacitus, who had succeeded Aurelian, dying, Probus, who was chosen in his room, marching in person against the Burgundians and Vandals, dispatched some of his best generals against the Franks, who gave them a total overthrow, and obliged them to abandon their booty, and return home^e. Probus himself was attended with the like success against the Burgundians and Vandals; so that all Gaul was, by his valour, delivered, to use the expression of St. Jerom, from the yoke of the barbarians. The emperor, not satisfied with driving them out of Gaul, pursued them cross the Rhine, laid waste their territories far and near, and even built some forts in their country; which struck the barbarians with such terror, that nine of their kings came in person to sue for peace, which Probus granted them, upon their promising to supply the Romans yearly with a certain quantity of corn, and other provisions, and to send sixteen thousand men to serve in the Roman army^f. These Probus divided into several companies of fifty or sixty men, distributing them among the Roman troops in different places^g. Some of the Franks, who had either submitted to Probus, or had been taken prisoners in this war, were sent by the emperor to the coast of the Euxine sea, where lands were allowed them to cultivate. There they continued for some time; but, growing weary in the end of living after the Roman manner in a country so far distant from their own, having seized on some ships, they put to sea, and, roaming about, pillaged first the coasts of Asia and Greece, and then, passing over into Africa, landed in several places there; but, being constantly repulsed by the Roman troops quartered in that province, they quitted Africa, and, steering their course to Sicily, landed in that island, took and plundered the city of Syracuse, and, having put most of the inhabitants to the sword, rebarqued with an immense booty. From Sicily they sailed for the streights of Gibraltar, and, entering the ocean, plundered the coasts of Gaul and Spain, and returned, in the end, loaded with booty, to their native country, at the mouth of the Rhine^h. This happened while Probus was making war on several tyrantsⁱ, that is, about the year 280. The same year, Proculus having revolted, and assumed the title of emperor at Cologne, the Franks at first espoused his cause, and promised to assist him to the utmost of their power; but as they scrupled no more, in those days, than they have done in later times, to break their word, they not only abandoned, but betrayed the usurper into the emperor's hands^k. From this time they continued quiet till the year 287. the fourth of Dioclesian's reign, when, in conjunction with the Saxon pirates, they plundered the coasts of Gaul, carrying off an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. But Carausius having, by the emperor's order, fitted out a fleet at Boulogne, and gained some advantages over them, they retired for a while to their respective countries^l. It was, no doubt, on account of these advantages, that Mamertinus, in his panegyric on Maximian, by whom Carausius had been sent against these pirates, calls him the conqueror of the Franks; and adds, that he put an end to the piratic war ^p. But as Carausius kept, and applied to his own use, the booty ^a he had taken from the barbarians, instead of returning it to the proprietors, Maximian, suspecting, that with this view he connived at their piracies, resolved to put him to death; but he, having timely notice of his design, passed over into Britain, with the fleet under his command, and there caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, as we have related elsewhere ^q. The following year, Maximian, crossing the Rhine, entered Germany, and, having laid waste the enemy's country far and near, returned to Gaul with an immense booty, and a great number of captives. The fame of his name struck such terror into the Franks, that two of their kings, Alec and Genobald, the first we find named in history, submitted to him, desiring him to confirm them in their respective kingdoms ^r. From an ancient inscription it appears, ^b that Dioclesian, as well as his colleague Maximian, took, probably on this occasion, the surnames of Francicus, Alemanicus, and Germanicus ^s.

THE following year, Maximian allowed lands, in the neighbourhood of Treves and Cambray, to great numbers of Franks and Letes, who had submitted to him, those territories being almost quite destitute of inhabitants ^t. The Letes were originally a Gaulish nation; but having afterwards left Gaul, and settled in Germany, they were reckoned among the German nations ^u. Their name often occurs in history, as appears from Valesius, who is of opinion, that the names of the river Lis in Flanders, and of the Abbey of Lieffis in Hainault, owe their origin to them ^v. Ammianus speaks of this nation as dwelling in Germany, on the banks of the Rhine, about the year 356 ^x. A few years after, the Franks made themselves masters of Batavia, and that part of Flanders which is watered by the river Escaut; but Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, marching against them soon after he was raised to the dignity of Cæsar, overcame them in battle, and, having obliged them to surrender at discretion, transplanted them, with their wives and children, into Gaul, where they were forced to cultivate the lands, which they themselves had wasted, to pay the usual tributes and taxes, as subjects of the empire, and to serve, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Upon their submitting, their arms were taken from them, nor were they allowed any in their new settlements, that they might, by degrees, forget their native fierceness and barbarity, and accustom themselves to live after the ^d Roman manner ^y. The emperor Julian, speaking of Maximian and Constantius, tells us, that they not only drove the barbarians out of the Roman territories, which they had long held, and cultivated as their own, but built several castles on the frontiers; by which means the country, no longer infested by the barbarians, enjoyed a profound tranquillity ^z. It was perhaps on account of the victory, which Constantius gained over the Franks, that the surname of Germanicus was given him on a monument erected to him by the city of Nicomedia, while he was consul, that is, in 294 ^a. From this time they continued quiet till the year 306. the first of Constantine's reign, when, that prince being employed in Britain, they laid hold of the opportunity to break into Gaul. But the emperor, returning soon after, fell upon them unexpectedly, while they were busied in plundering the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and having taken two of their kings prisoners, Arcaric and Gaisus, he exposed them to be devoured by the wild beasts, in the magnificent shews which he afterwards exhibited ^b. He thought himself obliged, says the panegyrist, to renew the rigour of the ancient Romans towards their captive kings, in order to restrain, by the fear of punishment, a perfidious nation, that made no account of the most sacred ties ^c. After this victory he crossed the Rhine, and, entering the country of the Bruclerians, who were one of the several nations then known by the name of Franks, he made a dreadful havock of that people, and took a great many prisoners, whom he likewise exposed to the wild beasts ^d. He repaired all the forts on the ^e Rhine, placed numerous garrisons in them, kept on that river a great number of vessels well armed and manned, and by that means put a stop, for some time, to the incursions of the Franks. In memory of the advantages he had gained over them, he instituted solemn sports, called, from them, ludi Francici, which were annually

However, two years after, that is, in 308. they began anew to assemble in considerable bodies, with a design; as was supposed, to make an irruption into Gaul; but Constantine marching against them upon the first news of their motions, they dispersed^e. In 310. all the nations known by the name of Franks, taking arms, approached the banks of the Rhine, and there dividing their army, which was very numerous, into several bodies, attempted to break into Gaul at different places. Constantine marched in person against them, and, not depending upon the relations of others, ventured, in disguise, into the midst of their army, pretending to be a deputy sent to them by the emperor. As he found that, not caring to put the whole to the issue of a general engagement, they designed to carry on the war in separate bodies, which would have rendered it more tedious, he assured them, that the emperor was not then with the army; which they no sooner understood, than they dismissed the pretended deputy, and, uniting all their forces, marched against the enemy. Constantine received them at the head of his army, put them to flight at the first onset, and made a dreadful havock of them in the pursuit^e. Eusebius writes, that he not only drove the barbarians out of Gaul, but utterly subdued those, who dwelt on the banks of the Rhine, and near the ocean^b, that is, the Franks. However, three years after, taking advantage of the emperor's absence, who was gone to Rome, they began to assemble anew on the banks of the Rhine; which Constantine no sooner understood, than, leaving Italy, he hastened into Gaul. The Franks, who had not yet passed the Rhine, withdrew at his approach; but Constantine, giving out that the Alemans too were ready to break into Gaul, left some troops concealed among the woods at a small distance from the river, and retired with the rest. The Franks no sooner heard of his departure, than they passed the Rhine; but the Romans, rising unexpectedly out of their ambuscade, fell upon them before they could draw up their forces, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to repass that river in the utmost confusion. Constantine followed them in person with his whole army, and, entering their country, laid waste their lands, burnt their habitations, and, having taken a great number of prisoners, exposed them all to be devoured by the wild beasts.
- ^d This severity towards a perfidious and faithless enemy is commended by his panegyrist; but it does not answer the character of a mild, generous, and good-natured prince, which is given to Constantine by most writers of those times. For this victory over the Franks, he took the title of Francicus^c. Notwithstanding this severity, the Franks were no sooner informed, that Constantine had left Gaul, with a design to visit Italy and Illyricum, than they crossed the Rhine in great numbers, and, entering Gaul, laid waste several provinces. But Crispus, the son of Constantine, marching against them, obliged them to quit their booty, and retire. Optatianus seems to insinuate, that he gained a great victory over them^k; but Nazarius only says, that he drove them out of Gaul, and obliged them to sue for peace; which he readily granted them^l. From some medals it appears, that the young prince gained a victory over the Alemans, who, in all likelihood, had invaded Gaul at the same time^m; but the Franks, it seems, quitting their booty, retired at his approachⁿ. This happened in 320. and no farther mention of the Franks is made in history till the year 341. the fourth of Constantius's reign, when they made an irruption into Gaul, committing every-where great ravages. Constans marched against them, and gave them battle; but as the loss was equal on both sides, the war was not ended till the ensuing year^o, when Constans either conquered or appeased them, as Idatius expresses it, that is, prevailed upon them, with presents and money, to retire, as may be gathered from Libanius, who tells us, though speaking as a panegyrist, that the Franks were not conquered by dint of arms^p. Be that as it will, it is certain they concluded a peace with Constans, and submitted to the princes he was pleased to appoint over them^q. As they were the most powerful nation in those parts, the peace they concluded with the emperor prevented the others from attempting any thing against the empire; so that Constans, having nothing to fear on that side, passed over into Britain, to oppose the Scots, who made frequent inroads into the Roman dominions *. Some years after, that is, in 355. the eighteenth of the reign of Constantius, Malaric, king of the Franks, held a chief employment in the emperor's court *. But the following year, those of his nation, no longer able to live in peace, entering into an alliance with the Alemans and Saxons, crossed the Rhine, took and pillaged above forty cities on the banks of that river, laid waste the neighbouring provinces, and carried off an incredible number of captives. The city of Cologne was on this occasion taken by them, and almost intirely ruined *. From thence they advanced as far as Autun, which city they besieged; but being vigorously repulsed by the veterans, who were quartered there, they abandoned the enterprize, and contented themselves with plundering the open places, roaming about without controul, and destroying with fire and sword what they could not carry off. Constantius, who was then in Italy, not thinking it adviseable to quit that country, raised his cousin Julian to the dignity of Cæsar, and at the same time appointed him governor of Gaul. Julian, without loss of time, set out for his government, and, arriving at Vienne, was received there with extraordinary marks of joy. As he arrived in that city in the depth of winter, he continued there the remaining part of that season, deliberating about the operations of the ensuing campaign; and, taking the field early in the spring, he marched, at the head of a small body, from Vienne to Autun, and from thence to Auxerre. On his march, he found himself surrounded on all sides by the enemy, who moved about in great bodies; but he put them to flight with a handful of men, and opened himself a way through the midst of the barbarians to Troies, and from thence to Rheims, where the main body of the army waited his arrival. Being joined there by all the Roman troops quartered in Gaul, he hastened from thence to Decempagi, now Dieuze on the Seille in Lorain, with a design to fall upon the Franks, who were busied in ravaging the country. But the enemy, receiving timely notice of his approach, took advantage of a dark and wet night to attack his rear unexpectedly, and would have cut off two legions, had not the rest of the army, alarmed at the sudden noise, turned back to their assistance. The Franks, encouraged with this success, attacked him anew a few days after; but were put to flight, though not with great loss. However, this small victory opened him a way to Cologne, which the enemy abandoned at his approach, after it had been ten months in their hands. During his stay at Cologne, one of the kings of the Franks, dreading his arms, sent deputies to him to sue for a peace; but Julian only granted him a short truce *. The following year, Julian gained a complete victory over the Franks, and other German nations, that had invaded Gaul, as we have related at length elsewhere , and took by storm two castles on the Meuse, in which some Franks had shut themselves up, after having ravaged the country about Rheims. They defended themselves with great bravery for the space of fifty-four days; but being in the end obliged to surrender, they were all sent to the emperor, who incorporated them among his troops *. After this, Julian put his troops into winter-quarters, and took up his own in Paris. But, in the mean time, the Salii, a nation of the Franks, breaking unexpectedly into Taxandria, now Brabant, settled there; but Julian, marching against them early in the spring, obliged them to abandon the country they had seized, though they offered themselves ready to guard the frontiers of the empire on that side, to supply the Romans with troops when required, and to pay the usual taxes and tributes. Zosimus tells us, that they had been driven out of their own country by the Saxons and Quadians, who were by Julian forced to restore it to the ancient proprietors; which so gained the Salian Franks, that, submitting to Julian, great numbers of them served in his army *.

THE Franks continued quiet the whole time Julian reigned; but they no sooner heard of his death, than, entering into an alliance with their neighbours the Saxons, they began to infest Gaul both by sea and land. But count Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name, being sent against them by Valentinian, obliged them to retire with great loss *. That commander is said to have overcome the Saxons, to have gained a victory over them off the Orcades, and to have defeated the enemies of the empire in Batavia, near the Rhine and the Vabal; which country was then held by the Franks *. From an inscription of 369. or 370. it appears, that Valentinian styled himself the

- a conqueror of the Franks c, no doubt on account of the advantages gained over that nation by count Theodosius. As it appears from a law dated the thirtieth of September d 368. that Valentinian was then at Cologne, some writers conclude from thence, that he marched in person against the Franks; but of this expedition no mention is made by any of the antients. At this time Mallobaudes was king of the Franks, and engaged in a war with the Alemans, who, having concluded a peace with the Romans, had entered, upon what provocation we know not, the territories of the Franks, destroying all with fire and sword. Mallobaudes met them at the head of a considerable army, and, pretending to avoid an engagement, drew them into an ambuscade, by which means he cut great numbers of them in pieces, and among the rest their king Macrianus, a warlike prince, who had long infested, with continual inroads, the Roman dominions e. Three years after, that is, in 377. Mallobaudes was raised by the emperor Gratian to the consulate, having the emperor himself for his colleague in that dignity f. The following year he was honoured by the same emperor with the post of comes domesticorum, and distinguished himself in a most eminent manner in the battle of Argentaria, in which above thirty thousand of the Lentineses, who had broken into the empire, were cut in pieces, with their king Triarius. This victory was chiefly owing to Mallobaudes, who, on this occasion, commanded the Roman troops, in conjunction with count Nennianus, as we have related in our Roman history g. He was consul the second time in 383. the eighth and last of Gratian's reign, and commanded the army, under that prince, against the usurper Maximus; but was not attended on that occasion with his usual success, for Gratian was put to flight, soon after taken prisoner, and put to death at Lions. All authors agree, that the unhappy prince was betrayed by his own people; and Prosper, in his chronicle, names Mallobaudes among those, who kept a private correspondence with the usurper h. But Baronius maintains, that Prosper was therein mistaken, and that Mallobaudes continued ever faithful to Gratian i. And truly Pacatus upbraids Maximus for hating Mallobaudes, and reducing him to the fatal necessity of laying violent hands on himself, for no other crime than that of an inviolable fidelity to Gratian, whose cause he had maintained to the last k. Three years after the death of Gratian, that is, in the year 388. we find the Franks ravaging Gaul with more fury than ever, perhaps to revenge on the usurper Maximus the death of Gratian, who had shewn a particular kindness to their nation. However that be, Gregory of Tours tells us, that they overran all Belgic Gaul, committing every-where unheard-of ravages, made the city of Cologne tremble, burnt several villages, and then returned home with their booty, leaving several parties in Gaul to pursue the ravages they had begun. These were defeated by Nannius and Quintinus, the two generals of Maximus, who cut great numbers of them in pieces in the province of Hainault. Quintinus, not satisfied with this advantage, passed the Rhine at Nuys, contrary to the opinion of Nannius, who refused to follow him, and, entering the enemy's country with the troops under his command, burnt several villages, which he found abandoned by the inhabitants. Encouraged with this success, he advanced far into the country; but being, on his return, cunningly drawn into marshes, woods, and unpassable places, by the enemy pretending to fly before him, he found himself on a sudden surrounded on all sides by great multitudes, who, falling upon his men while they were entangled in the woods and marshes, cut most of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to shelter themselves in the woods, where they perished with famine, only Quintinus, and a few more, having, with the utmost difficulty, found means to make their escape, and return to Gaul, after suffering unexpressible hardships in the enemy's country. The loss sustained by the Romans on this occasion was very great, and is, by some, compared to the disaster of Varus and his legions, in the time of Augustus l. This happened while the Franks were governed by Genobald, Marcomir, and Sunno, who, being elated with this victory, broke anew into Gaul the year following; which obliged Theodosius to send Valentinian to make head against them. Upon that prince's arrival in Gaul, Arbogastes, general of the troops in those provinces, advised him to march into the enemy's country, and force them to restore the booty they had carried off the year before, and deliver up the authors of the war m. Whether or no Valentinian followed his advice, we are not told. All we know is, that he had a conference with Marcomir and Sunno,^a who delivered up hostages; and that he afterwards retired to Treves, and there passed the winter^a.

THREE years after, that is, in 392. Arbogastes, having put Valentinian II. to death, persuaded Eugenius, whom he had raised to the empire in his room, to make war upon the Franks. Arbogastes, of whom we have spoken at length in our Roman history^o, was himself by nation a Frank; but, as he bore an old grudge to Marcomir and Sunno, he not only induced Eugenius to make war upon them, but, taking upon himself the whole management of it, he passed the Rhine near Cologne, in the depth of winter, and laid waste the countries of the Bructerians and Chamarrians, without meeting with the least opposition, Marcomir only shewing himself at a^b distance on the hills with some parties of the Answarii and Chatti. But, as to the issue of this war, historians only tell us, that Arbogastes, after having put many of his countrymen to the sword, concluded in the end a peace with them; and that Eugenius himself approached the Rhine to renew the antient treaty with the kings of the Franks and Alemans^p. From this account it appears, that the Franks had several kings at the same time, and that, under the name of Franks, were comprised several antient German nations. Great numbers of the Franks lifted themselves among the troops of Eugenius; for Orosius tells us, that he led against Theodosius an infinite number of Franks, and other barbarians^q. Two years after, Theodosius died, and, c by his last will, divided the empire between his two children, bequeathing the east to his eldest son Arcadius, and the west to Honorius. Stilicho, who was prime minister to the latter, advised him, in the first place, to renew the antient alliances with the Franks, and other German nations, which they had broken, by assisting the usurper Eugenius against Theodosius. This province Stilicho took upon himself, and, repairing to the banks of the Rhine, accomplished it in a very short time^r. However, Marcomir and Sunno attempting to raise new disturbances soon after the conclusion of the peace, one of them, says Claudian, was taken, and, after having been kept some time in prison, confined to Tuscany. The other was for revenging on the Romans the affront they had offered his brother; but his own people, unwilling to d engage in a war with the empire, put him to death. Claudian adds, that Honorius appointed other kings over the Franks in their room^s. An antient historian supposes Marcomir to have outlived Sunno, and consequently that it was he, who was banished into Tuscany^t. Marcomir, or, as the antients call him, Marcomer, is supposed to have been the father of Pharamond, the first in the catalogue of the French kings^u. In the year 406. the Franks, falling upon the Vandals, as they were attempting to break into Gaul with the Sueves and Alans, cut near twenty thousand of them in pieces, with their king Godigiseles; and would have put them all to the sword, had not the Alans come seasonably to their assistance. These two nations, together with the Sueves, opened themselves a way, in spite of the Franks, and, passing the Rhine, e entered Gaul^v. Great numbers of Franks followed them, to have some share in the spoils of those wealthy provinces; but far greater numbers of the same nation entered Gaul four years after, being invited thither by the usurper Constantine, of whose forces the commander in chief was one Edobac, a Frank by nation^w. In the year 413. they made an irruption into Gaul, and not only pillaged, but burnt, the city of Treves the second time, says Frigerid, an antient author quoted by Gregory of Tours^x. When this first irruption happened, we are no-where told; but that unhappy city was the third time plundered, and set on fire, by the Franks about the year 420. as Salvian informs us, who was an eye-witness of the deplorable condition, to which it was reduced on that occasion^y. Our author greatly complains of the inflexibility and hardness of heart, which he discovered in the inhabitants, who having lost all their effects, and with much-ado escaped with their lives, instead of applying themselves to works of piety, pressed the emperor to cause the sports of the circus to be exhibited among the ashes and ruins of their demolished city^z.

ABOUT this time Pharamond must have reigned over the Franks. He is said by Vitalis to have been the son of Sunno; but all other writers suppose him to have been

- a the son of Marcomir, the brother of Sunnio. Gregory of Tours, a very accurate writer, never once mentions this prince; which is very surprising. But both Aimoinus and Tyro Prosper speak of him, and place his reign at this time. In the chronicle of the latter, as published by Scaliger, at the twenty-fifth year of Honorius's reign, we read the following words; Pharamond reigns in France: then follows the year 26. with these words; This year there was an eclipse of the sun. If therefore Pharamond reigned in the year preceding the eclipse, he reigned in the year 417. for all authors agree, that there was an eclipse on Friday the 15th of July 418. Philostorgius writes, that the stars were then seen at two in the afternoon^b. The Alexandrian chronicle, and likewise the chronicles of count Marcellinus and Idatius, mention this eclipse; but
- b the latter, by mistake, supposes it to have happened on a Thursday; whereas, in 418. the 19th of July fell on a Friday. Tyro Prosper likewise was mistaken, in supposing the year 418. to have been the twenty-sixth of Honorius, that year being, according to the best chronologers, only the twenty-third or twenty-fourth of his reign. Father Le Cointe will have Pharamond to have begun his reign the same year in which the eclipse happened; others, and among the rest father Labbe in his chronology, maintain, that he began to reign in 420. and not before^c. But it is impossible to fix, with any certainty, the precise time, in which this prince began his reign, since Prosper's chronicle, on which we must chiefly depend, is full of mistakes, and differently read in this very place. It is even uncertain, whether it was in his reign, or some time before, that the Franks, passing the Rhine, first settled in Gaul. Bucherus is of opinion, that, about this time, Honorius, entering into a treaty with their chiefs, yielded to them the country bordering on the Rhine towards Cologne, and on the same side of that river, which country was afterwards called Ripuaris; but he alleges only a few conjectures to support his opinion^d. Gregory of Tours supposes them to have settled about this time in Tbongria, that is, in the territory of Toigres, where they were governed, as we have hinted above, by as many kings as they had cities or cantons^e. Pharamond, who reigned at this time, was one of the most powerful princes among them; but we are not told whether he had any authority over the rest. He is supposed to have reigned from the year 417. or 418. to the year 428. in which
- d Clodio, his son and successor, is said by Tyro Prosper to have reigned in France, that is, in the country of the Franks^f. In the year, in which he is supposed to have died, the famous Aetius made war upon the Franks in Gaul, and drove them from the country in which they had settled^g. Of this war Jornandes speaks without all doubt, where he tells us, that Aetius, with great slaughter, tamed the barbarity of the Franks, and forced them to submit to the empire^h. The learned Usher is of opinion, that, in this war, Pharamond was killedⁱ. Cbisetius, a learned antiquary, will have Pharamond to have made himself master of all Belgica Secunda, and to have died at Rheims, the metropolis of that province. He founds his opinion on the authority of an old manuscript genealogy lodged in the palace at Brussels, in which Pharamond
- e is said to have been buried at Rheims, according to the custom of the barbarians, without the city, towards Laudunum, on a little hill^k. But we can hardly believe, that all the antients would have passed over in silence the conquest of such an extensive country; for Belgica Secunda comprised Champagne, and all the countries lying between that province and the ocean. Some writers are of opinion, that the Salic laws were compiled by Pharamond, after his settling in Gaul, with the assistance of four sages, named Wifegast, Lesegast, Widegast, and Solegast; but Valesius thinks, that the Franks had no written laws till the time of Clovis, who, according to him, was their first legislator^l.

- Pharamond* was succeeded by his son Clodio in the year 428. the fourth of the reign of Valentinian III. Gregory of Tours calls him a most illustrious prince, and one to whom his people, whose interest he had at heart, were highly indebted^m. An historian, who flourished in the time of Charles Martel, and after him most other writers, suppose both Clodio, and his successor Merovæus, to have been the children of *Pharamond*ⁿ. Fredegarius, in his abridgment of Gregory of Tours, which he compiled in the time of Pepin, will have him to have been the son of Theodimir, who was killed by the Romans, as we have related above. The authority of Fredegarius is of no great weight; but as Gregory of Tours too mentions the death of Theodimir, some are of opinion, that Theodimir and Pharamond were one and the same person, as we have hinted above. As Gregory of Tours begins the history of the Franks with the reign of Clodio, (for he makes no mention of Pharamond) and derives from him the pedigree of the succeeding kings, several historians reckon him the first king of that nation ^a. And truly he ought to be deemed the founder of the French monarchy in the country we now call France, since he established his dominion so firmly there, that the Romans were never after able to drive him out, as they had done his predecessor Pharamond about the year 428. He is commonly surnamed the long-haired, as if he had been the first among the princes of his nation, who was distinguished ^b from his subjects by the length of his hair; whereas this mark of distinction is taken notice of by several historians, as common to the kings of the Franks before his time ^c. On this subject Bucherius makes a long descant, and to him we refer the reader. Sidonius, speaking of the Franks, describes their hair, their beard, their arms, and their whole attire; and from him it appears, that their hair was long before, and quite short behind. We know but very little from the antients of what happened in this prince's reign. Idatius tells us, that, in the year 431. Aetius was employed in an expedition in Gaul. This expedition was, without all doubt, undertaken against the Franks; for the same writer, who was then with Aetius, adds, that, in 432. he overcame the Franks in a combat. Majorianus, afterwards emperor, served, in all likelihood, under Aetius in this expedition; for Sidonius extols his exploits on the Rhine, the Vahel, and the Meuse; and adds, that nothing was performed by Aetius without him. Aetius, after having overcome the Franks, concluded a peace with them the same year; but upon what terms, we know not. Bucherius is of opinion, that Aetius, being obliged to march against the Visigoths, and other barbarians settled in Gaul, in order to keep the Franks quiet, restored to them the country from which he had driven them in 428. that is, the territory of Tongres. This, he thinks, may be gathered from the notitia; but the whole is founded upon a mere conjecture. Gregory of Tours, speaking of Clodio before the conquest of Cambray, supposes him to have resided in the castle of Dispard, commonly thought to be the present Doefburg, between Brussels and Lovain, in the antient diocese of Tongres, or on the confines of that country; which is agreeable to what that writer adds, viz. that the country, which the Romans still held, lay south of the territories possessed by Clodio residing at Dispard. In the year 435. the Franks made, it seems, an attempt upon Tours; for Sidonius tells us, that Majorianus defended that city against them. Not long after, the Franks made an irruption into the country of the Atrebatas, now Artois. But Aetius, marching against them with all possible expedition, fell upon them unexpectedly, while, without the least apprehension of danger, they were celebrating the nuptials of one of their chiefs, and cut great numbers of them in pieces. This action happened at a place called Vicus Helena, which some take to be the village now called Le Vieil Hesdin, and others the city of Lens on the Escaut. The latter opinion seems the most probable to such as have examined narrowly those places, and compared them with the description, which Sidonius gives of the spot, where the action happened. This was, without all doubt, the only advantage gained by the Romans in this war, since no other is mentioned by Sidonius in his panegyric on Majorianus, who commanded the Roman troops, in conjunction with Aetius, and distinguished himself in the above-mentioned action. Valesius, who supposes the battle of Lens to have been fought in the year 437. tells us from Gregory of Tours, that Clodio, having sent spies to reconnoitre and view the country as far as Cambray, upon their return, set out on his march, advanced, in spite of all opposition, to that city, and, having made himself master of it, fixed, for some time, his residence there ^d (D). From Cambray Valesius supposes him to have made the above-mentioned irruption

(D) The words of Gregory of Tours are: Clodio, upon their return, and, marching through the country which they had viewed, overthrew the Romans, (for so he calls him) having sent spies as far as Cambray to view the country, set out with his army, and made himself master of the city, in which residing

- a irruption into the Artois, and to have been surprised by Aetius and Majorianus at Lens. But, notwithstanding that overthrow, he extended his conquests as far as the Somme ^c. Some add, that he took Tournay, Amiens, and several other cities ^d. But we shall content ourselves with what we find in the best and most credible writers, among whom we do not reckon De Guise, the author of the annals of Hainault, tho' Bucherius has copied many things from him. Aetius is supposed to have afterwards concluded a peace with the Franks, and to have left them in possession, at least, of some part of the country they had conquered, since he granted the like favour to other nations, whom he dreaded less ^e. Priscus, who flourished in those days, tells us, that he saw at Rome the second son of the king of the Franks, who had been sent thither on an embassy, tho' a youth yet quite beardless. He takes notice of his long, yellow hair; and adds, that Aetius adopted him for his son, by presenting him with his armour, and treated him with the greatest marks imaginable of esteem, friendship, and affection ^f. Upon his leaving Rome, he was loaded with rich and valuable presents, sent him both by Aetius and Valentinian III. then emperor ^g. This young prince was, in all likelihood, Merovaeus, the successor of Clodio; for he lived in great friendship with Aetius, and joined him against Attila. He went, in all likelihood, to Rome in 439. for in that year Valentinian was there.
- Salvianus*, who wrote about the year 440. tells us, that the city of Treves had been the fourth time pillaged by the Franks, and utterly destroyed ^h. This must have happened about the year 477. during the war between him and the Roman, of which we have spoken above. The same writer adds, that the Franks made themselves masters of another city not yielding to Treves in grandeur, and standing at a small distance from it ⁱ. This city can be no other but Cologne, which was held by siding some time, he extended his conquests as far as the Somme (1). The author of the gests of the Franks adds, that Clodio, entering the Carbonarian forest, marched to the city of Tournay, which he took; and from thence advancing to Cambray, he likewise made himself master of that place, put the Roman garrison to the sword, and, in a short time, reduced the whole country between Cambray and the Somme (2). The Sylva Carbonaria was part of the Sylva Arduenna, which extended, as we read in Cæsar (3), from the Rhine to the Scheld, and the country of the Nervii, that is, to Tournay. Gregory of Tours supposes Clodio to have retired at Dispard or Diesburg before he set out on this expedition: and truly from that place, if situated in the country of Tongres, the shortest route he could take was through the Carbonarian forest (4). By the taking of Cambray and Tournay, the Franks became absolute masters of the whole country between these cities and the Rhine, and at the same time had a free communication with Tongria, with the Wahal, and consequently with the antient Francia; for the country between Tournay and the Wahal, which is now so well peopled and cultivated, was, even in the fifth century, almost quite destitute of inhabitants, and covered with woods and forests. It was under the successors of Clovis and Charlemagne that the cities of Bruges, Ghent, Antwerp, Brussels, Malines, Louvain, &c. were built, the country between the Artois, the ocean, and the Rhine, being, till their time, filled with woods and marshes. As therefore Tournay and Cambray were, in the days of Clodio, the only cities in that tract, by the reduction of them the Franks became masters of the whole country. This expedition is placed by Petavius in 445 (5). But by father Daniel before the year 428. in which year, Felix and Taurinus being consuls, the Franks were overcome by Aetius, as we read in Prosper, driven out of Gaul, and obliged to repass

the Rhine. But that writer is certainly mistaken; for Majorianus, afterwards emperor, who performed wonders in the battle of Lens or Hesdin, if Sidonius is to be credited, was still a young man in 458. since Sidonius, in the panegyric which he pronounced that year, styles him juvenis, a young man; and how could he be a young man then, if he had signalized himself in a battle fought at least thirty years before? Thus father Sirmond (6), who rightly observes, that, in 428. Aetius waged war with the Franks on the banks of the Rhine; whereas the battle mentioned by Sidonius was fought in Artois, near the village of Helena; which some take to be Lens, and others place on the Canche, where the ruins of it are still to be seen, and known by the name of Vieil-Hesdin. Father Daniel will have Clovis to have possessed nothing in Gaul when he came to the crown; and, to support this system, he places the irruption of the Franks under Clodio, the taking of Cambray, and the battle of Lens or Hesdin, before the year 428. in which the Franks were driven out of Gaul by Aetius, and obliged to repass the Rhine. That writer was well apprised, that he could not allow the above-mentioned events to have happened after the year 428. without allowing at the same time the countries, which Clodio seized in that irruption, to have been kept by him, since no mention is made in history of the Franks being driven out of Gaul after the year 428. But against father Daniel's system lie the above-mentioned, in our opinion, unanswerable objections, to which we shall add another, viz. that we find Clovis possessed of Tournay, without being told by any historian, that either he, or his predecessors Merovaeus and Childeric, reduced it; whence we conclude it to have been held by him, and the two princes who reigned before him, as the successors of Clodio, by whom the whole country between Cambray and the Rhine was reduced, in the manner we have related.

the Franks, as appears from that writer, in the year 440. The enemy entered the city while the chief inhabitants were feasting and revelling, without the least apprehension of danger^a. Several of Salvianus's relations were, on that occasion, taken by the Franks, and by them kept in slavery, and, among the rest, a holy widow, who, having ransomed herself, was reduced to such poverty, that she was obliged to earn her bread by working for the wives of the barbarians^b. The taking of Cologne happened, according to the best chronologers, in the reign of Clodio, about the year 438. or 439^c. 'Tis to be observed, that this town, in the time of Clovis, had a king of its own, but a Frank by nation^d. Father Le Cointe observes, that, till this time, Cologne is constantly called Agrippina, and seldom Colonia; whereas the latter name universally prevailed, and the former was quite laid aside, after the Franks became masters of the place, which induced Hincmar, and some others, to imagine, that the name of Colonia had been given it by them^e. As the Franks were still pagans, the church suffered much in the countries subject to them; and hence it is, that we find no bishops of Cologne, named in the ecclesiastic history, from the time of Levergilius, who is supposed to have died about the year 430. till the time of Aquilinus, who governed that church in the reign of Clovis^f. The churches of Tournay and Cambray fared no better; for they seem to have had no bishops from the year 407. when the Vandals broke into those countries, till the end of that century^g. Clodio reigned about twenty years, that is, from the year 428. to 448. when Tyro Prosper tells us, that Merovæus reigned in France^h, that is, in the countries subject to the Franks on either side the Rhine. From the words of Prosper some conclude, that the Franks held yet nothing in Gaul; for, by the word Francia, say they, is to be understood the country inhabited by the Franks on the German side of the Rhine. But they are therein certainly mistaken; since it is manifest from all the antients, that both Clodio and Merovæus were masters of several places in Gaul. There is a great disagreement among authors about Merovæus: according to the opinion which to us seems the most probable, he was the second son of Clodio, and him Priscus saw at Rome in 439. as we have hinted above, he being then about eighteen years old. Both he and his elder brother outlived their father Clodio; but Merovæus, by the assistance of Aetius and the Romans, carried the crown; for that there were great contests between them, is certain, the elder brother having called in Attila to his assistance; for this Attila himself alleged, among the other motives that had prompted him in 451. to enter Gaul. He had a considerable number of Franks in his army, those, without doubt, who had espoused the cause of the elder brother. But Merovæus, king of the Franks, fought for the Romans, and distinguished himself in the famous battle of Châlons, which to him secured the crown, and made his elder brother give over all hopes of ever wearing it; nay, Attila himself advised him, after the battle, to return homeⁱ. The elder brother's name is commonly thought to have been Claudebald, who, in an antient manuscript copy of the Salic law, is said to have been the son of Clude, or Clodio, the son of Pbaramond, and the brother of Cleno, of whom no farther mention is made^j. Valesius takes Claudebald to be the same person with Clodomir, who, in the life of St. Genulphus, is said to have reigned between Clodio and Merovæus^k. But that life was written long after those times, and is therefore of no great authority. Gregory of Tours only says of Merovæus, that he was the father of Childeric^l. However, he must have been a prince of no small renown, since the authors of the seventh and eighth century, and after them many others, have given the name of Merovingian to the kings who reigned after him till the time of Pepin the first king of the second race, as they style it^m, the first being called Merovingian from Merovæus. Rorico extols him greatly, but by elogiums couched in general termsⁿ; and besides, no great stress is to be laid on what that author writes. Of his exploits, Bucherius speaks at length; but all he says is founded upon conjecture^o. Valesius, from what we read of Childeric, concludes Merovæus to have extended his conquests from the Somme to the Seine, probably after the death of Aetius. All we know for certain is, that upon the news of the death of Valentinian III. the Franks, under the conduct of Merovæus, ravaged

(E) It is greatly disputed among authors, whether Merovæus was brother to his predecessor Clodio, only his kinsman, or even of a different family. Gregory of Tours only says, that by some it was held for certain, he was of the same race or family (1). It is past all doubt, that the king of the Franks, who died some time before the year 451. and could be no other but Clodio, had two sons, who, after his death, contended for the kingdom (2). If Merovæus was one of these princes, he was certainly the son of Clodio. But perhaps both Clodio's children lost what each of them strove to get, and a kinsman of theirs, or one who was no ways related to the family, possessed himself of the kingdom. Du Chesne seems to have been of this opinion (3). It is not unlikely, that Merovæus was the first of a new branch, since his successors were from him called Merovingians (4). But on the other hand, if we admit the authority of Tyro Prosper, we can hardly deny Merovæus to have reigned in 451. when Attila broke into Gaul, and consequently to have been one of the two sons of Clodio. For Priscus does not say, that a contest arose among three princes; but only, that the two brothers contended for the kingdom: and it is certain, that this contest was not ended in 451. for Attila came to make war on the Franks in favour of the elder brother (5). It appears from Priscus, that the king of the Franks, who sided with Attila against Attila in 451. fought at the same time against his brother, and the king of the Huns (6). The very expression used by Priscus, viz. that Attila came to make war on the Franks, in favour of the elder brother, shews, that the bulk of the nation acknowledged the younger; and, since Attila was obliged to retire, it is not at all likely, that the elder brother, supported by him, got the better of the younger, supported by the Romans, by whom Attila was overcome, and forced to abandon Gaul. The king of the Franks had, according to Gregory of Tours (7), a share in the victory; and in history we find no mention made of any but Merovæus, who in 451. could be styled king of the Franks. Gregory of Tours knew of no other king between him and Clodio, for which there is not the least foundation in history, or allow Merovæus to have been the son of Clodio. Father le Cointe allows Merovæus to have been the son of Clodio; but will have him to have been the elder brother, and adds, that he was acknowledged king; that the younger brother had recourse to the Romans, and to Attila; and that the Romans, hearing Attila was coming with a formidable army, abandoned the younger brother, and declared for the elder, who thereupon sided with the Romans against Attila (8). But is it at all probable, that Merovæus would have dared to abandon, nay, to betray Attila, at a time when all nations, the Romans not excepted, trembled at his name? Besides, it is certain, that Attila was assisted by the Franks, and that several of that nation served in his army (9). The above-mentioned writer could not persuade himself, that the younger son of Clodio, who was a beardless youth when he came to Rome, was the father of Childeric, who, as early as the year 456. had abandoned himself to all manner of lewdness and debauchery; and this is what induced him to embrace the aforesaid opinion. Some chronologers suppose the son of Clodio to have gone to Rome in 439. and others place his journey to that metropolis still later. It in 439. he was eighteen, he might have had Childeric in 440. Le Cointe places the beginning of the reign of Childeric in 456. and Valesius in 458. when that prince, then eighteen years old, might well have been guilty of all the debaucheries, which, by historians, are laid to his charge. Besides, we are not told, that he abandoned himself to a debauched life as soon as he ascended the throne: so that the chief argument with which Le Cointe strives to support his opinion is of no weight. The only proof of any strength, that can be alleged in favour of the opinion denying Merovæus to have been the son of Clodio, is the name of Merovingian, which was given to his successors; for if they were descended from Clodio, as well as from him, why did they take their name rather from him than from Clodio? But that name is not given by Gregory of Tours to the kings of his time, nor is it to be found in any writer till near two hundred years after Merovæus's time; and some authors will have it to have been common to the Franks in general. Those, who maintain Merovæus not to have been the son of Clodio, must at the same time suppose, with Du Chesne, that both the sons of Clodio were by him excluded from the throne; that this happened after the defeat of Attila, that is, after the year 451. and that the Romans suffered it, though they had espoused the cause of Merovæus, finding they could reap no advantage from a war with the usurper (10). As for the fables related by Fredegarius on the birth of Merovæus, it would be degrading our history to allow them a place in it (11); and with them are much of a piece those we read in the annals of Hainault, by de Guise, tho' Bucherius thinks them agreeable to what we find in Priscus. It is surprising, that a man of his learning and penetration should reason on that subject in the manner he does (12): he surely must never have perused the original Greek copy of Priscus.

tila, attempting to pass the Rhine, in order to enter Gaul, was opposed by Merovæus,^a at the head of the Franks who had espoused his cause against his competitor. Chil-deric no sooner ascended the throne, than he began to think of enlarging his domi-nions, the more, as Aetius, who had kept the barbarians in awe, was now dead. He is said to have extended his conquests as far as the Loire, and to have reduced the city of Paris, after a siege, according to some, of five, according to others, of ten years^f. In the year 470. he made himself master of Angers, after having killed count Paul the Roman governor of the place^g. Thus Gregory of Tours, without ac-quainting us how count Paul and Chil-deric came to fall out; for he had told us, a few lines before, that the Roman general, with the assistance of the Franks, had made war on the Goths, and gained some advantages over them. Bucherius thinks, that^b the Romans and Franks were overcome by the Goths; and founds his opinion upon the authority of Silvius, who writes, without marking any time, that the Franks were de-feated, and put to flight, by Euric king of the Goths^h. The same author adds, that Euric, after having overcome the Franks, entered into an alliance with themⁱ; and elsewhere, that he gave his daughter in marriage to one Sigismer, a barbarian prince^k, whom Valisius takes to have been a Frank^l. This alliance between the Goths and the Franks induced, in all likelihood, Chil-deric to turn his arms against the Romans, and seize on the city of Angers, at that time belonging to them. He likewise made himself master of Orleans, after having defeated one Odoacer, who came with a body of Saxons to the relief of the place^m. Gregory of Tours tells us,^c that Chil-deric, entering into an alliance with Odoacer king of Italy, marched against the Alemans, who had entered that country, and gave them a total overthrow. Soon after his return to Gaul, he died at Ternacum, now Tournay, where his remains were discovered in 1653. with many gold coins of the Roman emperors, and other things of great curiosity and value; among which was the king's signet, with the inscription Chil-derici regis, and his image engraved on it, with his long hair covering both his shoulders, and a dart in his right-hand. But of this discovery the curious reader will find a minute and learned account in the Anastasis Chil-derici, which Chiffletius wrote in 1655. by order of the archduke Leopold, at that time governor of the Low-coun-tries for Philip IV. king of *Spain*ⁿ. Chil-deric, in the beginning of his reign, aban-doned himself to all manner of lewdness, loading at the same time his subjects with exorbitant taxes and impositions, to supply his extravagant expences. Hereupon some of those, whose wives and daughters he had debauched, revolting, drove him from the throne. Gregory of Tours writes, that, foreseeing the storm, he prudently withdrew of his own accord, and retired into the territory of Tongres, where he con-tinued, till, his subjects returning to their duty, which was chiefly owing to his trusty friend Wiomald, he was recalled, and restored to the throne. During his absence, the Franks submitted to Ægidius, by nation a Gaul, but commander of the Roman troops in that country^o, whom, upon the return of Chil-deric, they easily drove out, and received their lawful sovereign with the greatest marks of joy imaginable (F).^e

(F) This event is thus related by Gregory of Tours: Chil-deric, by seducing the daughters of his subjects, provoked them to such a degree, that, fearing he should be assassinated by them, he thought it advise-able to abandon his kingdom, and retire. He there-fore withdrew into the country of the Thuringians; but left behind him a trusty friend to mollify the ex-ulcerated minds of his people, and dispose them to receive again their lawful sovereign. Upon his de-parture he cut in two a piece of gold, whereof he took one part with him, and left the other with his friend, to be sent to him, as a token, that he might return without the least apprehension of danger. After this he withdrew, and took refuge in Thurin-gia, living as a private person in the court of king Basinus, and queen Basina his wife. Chil-deric being thus withdrawn, the Franks with one consent chose Ægidius for their governor, who had been raised by the emperor to the post of magister militia, or commander in chief of the Roman forces in Gaul. While Ægidius was in the eighth year of his reign, Chil-deric's faithful friend, having privately and by degrees reconciled the minds of the Franks to his master, dispatched a messenger to him with the piece of gold, which he had kept. Chil-deric, understand-ing, from that token, that his subjects were ready to receive him, left Thuringia, and, returning home, was restored to the throne (13). Thus Gregory of Tours, who was born about sixty-three years after the death of Chil-deric, and consequently must have been acquainted with several persons who had con-versed, at least, with his contemporaries, and, prob-ably, knew some who had seen Chil-deric himself: so that it can hardly be supposed, that he was not well informed of such remarkable events as the de-position and restoration of the king of the Franks,

- a Fredegarius, in his epitome of the history of the Franks, tells us, that Childeric, being driven from the throne, fled to Constantinople, to implore the protection of the emperor Mauritius, and returned from thence by sea into Gaul. A strange anachronism! Mauritius having been raised to the imperial throne near a hundred years after the flight of Childeric. Wiltbomius, in his chronicle written in the year 810. reads Martianus instead of Mauritius; but, according to the best chronologers, Martian died in 457. whereas Childeric either fled, or was driven out, in the year 461. and restored eight years after. Besides, Gregory of Tours, who lived in the next age, takes no notice of his journey to Constantinople; and Aimonius expressly tells us, that he kept at a small distance from his own dominions, not doubting but Wiomald would, by some means or other, appease his subjects, and procure his return. He was received in and the chusing of Egidius to reign in his room. And yet father Daniel looks upon this account as altogether incredible and fabulous: he thinks, that the conduct of the Franks, had they chosen Egidius for their king, would have been no less unaccountable than that of the Turks in 1687. if, after deposing Mahomet IV. they had raised to the throne prince Charles of Lorrain, who then commanded the emperor's army in Hungary, and owed all his glory to the advantages he had gained over them. Is it at all likely, says he, that the Franks, who were barbarians and pagans, should chuse for their king a Roman, and one who professed the christian religion; and supposing they had to such a Roman offered the crown, would not he, thro' fear of incurring the emperor's indignation, have rejected their offer? But in those days we find several instances of pagans acknowledging and obeying christian princes, and of pagan princes ruling over those who professed the christian religion. As to the jealousy, which his accepting that dignity might have given to the emperor, Majorianus reposed an intire confidence in Egidius; and besides, the crown, which the Franks placed upon his head, was but a small addition to the power and honours he enjoyed before, as magister militia, which employment raised him above all the kings of the barbarians, whom he commanded accordingly in the field. The title of king was no great thing in those times, since it was given not only to all the chiefs of the barbarians, but to the different leaders of many tribes, into which each nation was divided. Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, who flourished in the fifth century, speaking of the army which Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths in Italy led against the barbarians, says, that the country, in which that prince encamped, could hardly supply with provisions so many soldiers as he had kings in his army (13). The title of king, therefore, which the Franks bestowed on Egidius, could give no jealousy to the emperor: it was far inferior to that of magister militia, which he bore already, and with which the greatest kings among the barbarians thought themselves greatly honoured. Nay, Majorianus, who reposed an intire confidence in Egidius, must have been highly pleased to hear, that the Franks had submitted to him, which, in effect, was submitting to the empire. The Franks did not then wage war with the Romans, but were their confederates, and had often served in their armies under the conduct of Egidius, whose probity and moderation could not, by that means, be unknown to them; so that every one must be well apprised of the wide difference between their chusing him, and the Turks chusing Charles of Lorrain, for their king. But the circumstances, adds father Daniel, attending the deposition of Childeric, and election of Egidius, are evidently fabulous. This we allow to be true, speaking of the circumstances that have been added to those events by later writers; but, in the account Gregory of

Tours gives us of them, nothing occurs that to us seems childish, to use rather Daniel's expression, or incredible. Gregory of Tours is not accountable, and much less are we, for the fables which later writers have been pleased to add to his relation. Is an event related, we may say, by a contemporary writer, to be deemed fabulous, because others, who wrote after, have added to it several fabulous circumstances? How many uncontested events have been thus figured, and turned into fables? As for the silence of the contemporary writers, on which father Daniel lays great stress, there flourished at that time but two, viz. Idatius and Apollinaris Sidonius, of whom the former, who wrote in Spain, at that time overrun by the barbarians, was not perhaps informed of what passed among the Franks in Gaul, or, if he was, he did not think proper to insert in his chronicle an event that no-ways concerned his countrymen; for, in the affairs of Gaul, he is so concise, as to give, in one line, an account of the most memorable battles and sieges that happened there. As for Sidonius, he did not write the history of those times, but only speaks of some events occasionally; and his subject did not lead him to mention the deposing of Childeric by the Franks, and their chusing Egidius in his room. The only objection of any weight, that can be brought against the account of Gregory of Tours, is in point of chronology. It is certain, that Egidius was magister militia when he was chosen by the Franks for their king; that Majorianus was then acknowledged emperor in Gaul; and that he was not acknowledged there before the latter-end of the year 458. On the other hand it is no less certain, that Childeric was restored before the death of Egidius; and that Egidius died in 461. the fifth year after the deposition of Childeric. Gregory of Tours therefore was certainly mistaken, in supposing Egidius to have reigned eight years over the Franks. This mistake in point of chronology has induced father Daniel to question the whole account Gregory of Tours gives us of the deposition of Childeric, and election of Egidius. But might not this mistake have crept into the text of our historian through the ignorance or carelessness of the transcribers? It is owned by all the critics, that in several other passages the numbers have been altered by the transcribers; and this they cannot help owning, without supposing Gregory of Tours to have contradicted himself. Why then may not the mistake as to the years of Childeric's exile be likewise charged upon the transcribers? the more, as in all the ancient manuscript copies the numbers are written in arithmetical figures, which are very liable to be altered. But allowing Gregory of Tours to have been mistaken as to the years Egidius reigned, can we infer from thence, that he did not reign at all? Are not the best historians sometimes grossly mistaken in point of chronology?

his own territories by the inhabitants of Barrum, who went out to meet him, and were, on that account, exempted from all tribute, which immunity they enjoyed for many years. This Barrum Franchett will have to be Barrum ducis, or Bar le duc; Belleforest to be Bar on the Seine; while Uredius and Chiffetius take it to be a place in Brabant, or Holland; for they are of opinion, that Childeric took shelter, not in Tungria, but in Thuringia, as we read it in Gregory of Tours; but that writer, or his transcriber, often confounds these two countries (G). Whatever place he came from, he was soon followed by Basina the wife of king Basinus, by whom he had been entertained during his exile. Some French historians would make us believe, that she abandoned her husband to follow Childeric, being taken with his good qualities. But the answer she gave to Childeric, when asked by him for what reason she had left her husband to follow him, seems to insinuate, though related by Gregory of Tours in the most modest terms, that she was not so much taken with his good qualities, as with the abilities of another kind, which she had discovered in him (H). Be that as it will, Childeric married her, and had by her Clodoveus, who succeeded him in the kingdom.

Clodoveus, called also Hludovicus, Ludovicus, Ludicis, and Clovis, was no sooner raised to the throne, than he began to think of enlarging his dominions, which, according to the best writers, extended only from the Wahal to the city of Tournay. That Childeric was, at his death, master of Tournay, cannot be questioned, since he was interred there; and, on the other hand, we know for certain, that Clovis resided at Tournay during the first years of his reign. The kingdom, therefore, to which he succeeded, was bounded on the north by the Wahal; on the east by the city of Tongres, which belonged to another tribe of Franks, and was not reduced by Clovis till the tenth year of his reign, as Gregory of Tours tells us in express terms; on the south by the kingdom of Ragnacharius, who held Cambray; on the west by the kingdom of Chararic, commonly placed between the Escault and the ocean. Ragnacharius and Chararic were likewise kings of the Franks, but ruled over different tribes, and were quite independent of Clovis, as well as of each other. The other provinces of Gaul were held by the Romans, by the Visigoths, and by the Burgundians, who all lord edit over the unhappy natives. Clovis, resolved to enlarge his dominions, and perhaps, as his ambition knew no bounds, he being then but in the twentieth year of his age, aspiring at nothing less than the monarchy of all Gaul, thought it advisable to begin with the Romans, who, by the downfall of the western empire, were reduced to the lowest ebb of power. Syagrius, the son of Aegidius, of whom we have spoken above, held the city of Soissons. He had succeeded his father in the government of that city, and perhaps had made himself absolute master of it during the anarchy which had prevailed in Gaul, upon the downfall of the western empire, since he is, by Gregory of Tours, distinguished with the title of king. However that be, Clovis, being resolved to reduce that city, invited Chararic and Ragnacharius to assist him in the enterprize, which the latter readily did; but Chararic declined

(G) A modern critic (14) is of opinion, that the words Tungria and Thuringia were used, by those who transcribed the history of Gregory of Tours, as synonymous terms to express one and the same country, viz. that of Tongres. Morel, who in 1761 published the second edition of the history of Gregory of Tours, writes, that in an ancient manuscript of that historian he found the following words: Disparpum, which stands on the borders of the Tungrians & Thuringians; and father Ruhnart, a most accurate writer, quotes two manuscript copies of the history of Gregory of Tours, viz. that which was made use of by the first editor of that history, and another lodged in the abbey of Reims, in both which the Franks are said to have settled in Thuringia after they had passed the Rhine; which evidently proves, that by Thuringia was meant Tungria, or the country of Tongres, lying on the Roman side of the Rhine; for there they settled after having crossed that river.

(H) The words of Gregory of Tours are: Hic ergo

*regnantibus stant; Basina illa, quam supra memoravimus, relicto viro suo, ad Childericum venit. Qui cum feliciter interrogaret, qua de causa vel viam illam a regione venisset, respondisse fertur: Novus, inquit, viritatem tuam, quam sic valde strenuus; idcirco enim, ut habitem decem. Nam nobilis, si in transmarinis praevidet aliquem cognovissent insidiosis te, expectissimamque cohabitationem esse. At ille gaudens tam fidei conjugio copularet. Is not the meaning of these words, novi viritatem tuam, &c. as plain as a trodder writer could well make it, and very different from that which Dubos, in his critical history of the French monarchy, would obtrude upon us? viz. Because I know you are a man of honour; of courage, and worthy of my attention: had there been a more deserving man in the world, I should have crossed the sea in quest of him. &c. (15). In this speech consistent with the character of a woman who had broken her conjugal faith, and abandoned her husband to cohabit with another man?*

- a being any-way concerned in that war, with a design, says Gregory of Tours, to join the prince who should prevail over the other ^k. Clovis was no sooner joined by Nagatharius, whom our historian calls his kinsman, than he set out on his march for Soissons, and, arriving with his army in the neighbourhood of that city, he sent a messenger to Syagrius, offering him battle. Syagrius, accepting the challenge, marched into a neighbouring plain, where the two armies engaged. The combat lasted some time; but the Romans being in the end put to flight, Syagrius, from the field of battle, fled to Toulouse, and there took refuge at the court of Alaric king of the Visigoths; which Clovis no sooner understood, than he dispatched ambassadors to Alaric, threatening to make war upon him, if he did not forthwith deliver the fugitive Roman into his hands. Alaric, unwilling to provoke the king of the Franks, ordered Syagrius to be immediately delivered up to the ambassadors; upon whose return he was, by Clovis's order, kept under close confinement till that prince had reduced Soissons, and then privately beheaded ^l. Clovis, now master of Soissons, transferred his royal seat from Tournay to that city ^m. He afterwards waged several wars, says Gregory of Tours; and in the tenth year of his reign subdued the Thuringians, meaning, without all doubt, the Tongrians; for Thuringia lay on the other side of the Rhine, at a great distance from his dominions, and separated from them by the countries which the Alemans held on one side of that river, and the Franks, called Ripuarians, on the other, who had a king of their own. It is therefore passed all doubt, that the country, said by our historian to have been subdued by Clovis, in the tenth year of his reign, was the city of Tongres, and its territory, which bordered on the territory of Tournay, and opened a free communication between his dominions and those of Sigebert king of the Ripuarians, and his kinsman; for the Ripuarians held Cologne, and were masters of the country between the Lower Rhine and the Lower Meuse. Tongria, when reduced by Clovis, was held, according to the most probable opinion, by another tribe of Franks, who had settled there some time before. The same year, Clovis married Clotildis, or Chrottebildis, as she is called by Gregory of Tours, the daughter of Gilderic, king of the Burgundians, who had been murdered some years before by his brother Gundebald, as we shall relate in the history of that nation. Of this marriage, Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: The ambassadors, whom Clovis had often occasion to send to the court of the king of the Burgundians, during their abode there, took particular notice of a young woman named Chrottebildis, and, being charmed with her beauty, her wisdom, and her engaging behaviour, and at the same time informed, that she was of the blood royal, upon their return home, they gave the king an high idea of her good qualities, which made so deep an impression on his mind, that, soon after, he sent ambassadors to king Gundebald, asking her in marriage. Gundebald, afraid to disoblige the king of the Franks, granted him his request, delivering the young princess to his ambassadors, who immediately conveyed her to their master. The king was so taken with her beauty and amiable qualities, that he immediately married her, tho' he had already, by a concubine, a son named Theodoric ⁿ. Thus Gregory of Tours: but the epitomiser of the history of the Franks, and the author of the Gests of the Franks, add several circumstances which seem to have been unknown to our historian. The account they give us is as follows: Clovis, desiring to marry Clotildis, often sent ambassadors to the court of the king of the Burgundians; but these finding no opportunity to speak to her, he charged a Roman, by name Aurelian, to wait upon her, and, by conversing with her, to discover her real sentiments, delivering to him one of his rings by way of credentials. Aurelian, the better to execute his commission, went in the disguise of a beggar to Genoa, where Clotildis then resided with her sister.
- f The two young princesses, who spent most of their time in acts of charity and hospitality, entertaining all the poor who came to the place, received Aurelian among the rest, and conducted him to the place where they used to wash the feet of the poor pilgrims and beggars, according to a custom which then prevailed, as it still does in some places of Italy. This gave Aurelian an opportunity of speaking to Clotildis, and letting her know, that he had been sent by the king of the Franks, who, being informed of her good qualities by his ambassadors, begged she would give him leave to ask her in marriage. At the same time he delivered to her the ring as a ser-

tain token of his embassy. The young princess received the ring with great joy, ^a and returning thanks to the king for the good opinion he entertained of her, and the honour he designed her, readily consented to the proposal; but at the same time desired Aurelian to acquaint his master, that unless the whole was concluded before the return of Aridius, who had been sent to Constantinople by her uncle Gundebald, he would leave no stone unturned to put a stop to their intended marriage. In taking her leave of the ambassador, she pulled off her ring, and, delivering it to him, desired him to present it, in her name, to the king, as a token of the affection and esteem she had for so great a prince. Aurelian, returning without delay to Soissons, delivered the ring to Clovis, acquainting him at the same time with the answer Clotildis had given him. Hereupon the king immediately dispatched ambassadors to Gundebald, demanding his niece in marriage. The king of the Burgundians was not inclined to the match, but nevertheless, through fear of disobliging so powerful a prince, granted him his request; so that Clotildis was immediately betrothed to Clovis, and, after that ceremony was over, delivered to the ambassadors, to be conveyed by them to their master. The ambassadors set out without loss of time; but were scarce gone, when news was brought, that Aridius was landed at Marseilles. Hereupon Clotildis, quitting her chariot, mounted on horseback, and, pursuing her journey with all possible expedition, arrived at the place where Clovis waited for her. In the mean time Aridius, who, on his landing, had been informed of the marriage, ^c flew to court, and, by remonstrating to the king the dangerous consequences of such a match, viz. that Clotildis, mindful of the murder of her father and brothers, would, one day or other, prevail upon her husband to revenge their death, persuaded Gundebald, by whose orders they had been assassinated, to dispatch immediately a body of troops, with orders to bring back Clotildis. But she had already reached Villers, a place in the territory of Troyes, and in that city Clovis waited for his royal bride. However, the soldiers sent by Gundebald seized on her chariot and equipage. Thus the epitomizer of the history of the Franks, with whom the author of the Gests of the Franks agrees in the main; but as Gregory of Tours, whom we may call a contemporary writer, takes no notice of the particulars related by them, we cannot ^d help looking upon them as doubtful, if not fabulous.

He overthrew
the Alemans.

A few years after, the Alemans, one of the most powerful nations in Germany, having passed the Rhine, broke unexpectedly into Germania Secunda, held at that time by the Franks called Ripuarians, who had Sigebert for their king. That prince drew together what forces he could; but not finding himself in a condition to make head against so numerous an army with his own troops, he had recourse to Clovis, who readily joined him, being glad to lay hold of every opportunity that offered to signalize himself, and inure his men to the fatigues and dangers of war. The two kings, after their conjunction, marched against the Alemans, and engaged them at a village called Tolbiacum, thought to be the present Zulpick, about twelve miles from Cologne. The battle proved very bloody, both parties exerting their utmost efforts; but in the end, king Sigebert receiving a wound in his leg, of which he ever after continued lame, the Franks began to give ground; which Clovis no sooner perceived, than, lifting up his eyes to heaven, says Gregory of Tours, he implored the assistance of Jesus Christ, who, Clotildis had often told him, was the Son of God, and never failed to assist those in distress who put their confidence in him, promising at the same time to believe in him, and be baptized, if, by granting him a victory, he convinced him of his divine power. He had scarce made this promise, when the Alemans, notwithstanding the advantage they had gained, betook themselves to a precipitous flight. In this battle their king was killed, and with him most of their chief men; which so disheartened them, that they submitted to Clovis, and acknowledged him for their king. Thus Gregory of Tours; whose words have induced some to believe, that the whole nation of the Alemans submitted to the king of the Franks. But that writer must be understood only of such of that nation as had been formerly allowed to continue in the places of Gaul which they had seized. For it is certain, that numbers of them had recourse to Theodoric king of Italy, who took them under his protection, and permitted them to settle in Rbatia and Noricum, then subject to him. Nay, that prince wrote to the inhabitants of Noricum, injoining them to supply such of the Alemans, as were not willing to continue there, with

- a fresh oxen to draw their waggons, taking, in exchange, their oxen fatigued with so long a march ⁹. This letter has been transmitted to us by Cassiodorus, with another which Theodoric wrote to Clovis, exhorting him to give over pursuing the flying Alemans, especially those who had taken refuge in his dominions¹. In this letter, after congratulating the king of the Franks on the victory he had gained over so numerous and warlike a nation, and intreating him to spare the remains of that unhappy people, he tells him, that he had sent ambassadors to impart to him, by word of mouth, several affairs of the greatest importance, and disclose to him some secrets, which it greatly concerned him to know. These secrets perhaps related to the conditions of the treaty, which about this time the king of the Burgundians concluded
- b with the emperor Anastasius; and it is not improbable, that Theodoric, who was at variance with the emperor, should propose now that offensive alliance against the Burgundians, which they concluded three years after, as we shall relate anon. Clovis, it seems, at the request of Theodoric, who had married his sister Audefreda, gave over pursuing the Alemans; of whom part settled in the provinces of Rhætia and Noricum, and part was, by Theodoric, transplanted into Italy, as appears from the panegyric of Ennodius on that prince, where he tells us, that, under Theodoric, Italy was guarded by the Alemans, who had formerly plundered it; and that unhappy nation, after having lost their king, and been driven from their native country, were become the subjects of a generous and good-natured prince, who had given them a far better country than that which they had been forced to abandon². Such of the Alemans, as settled in Rhætia and Noricum, continued subject to the kings of Italy, till the Ostrogots yielded to the children of Clovis whatever they held out of that country. From what we have said, it appears, that the Alemans received a total overthrow at Tolbiac, since, after the battle, they were quite driven out of their country by the two confederate kings of the Franks. The Alemans in Gaul, masters of a considerable part of the present Switzerland, submitted to Clovis, as we have hinted above, and acknowledged him for their king. Some of that nation had likewise settled in Alsace, and of that country too Clovis made himself master on this occasion, and likewise of the city of Basle; for, among the bishops who subscribed to the first council of Orleans, held by order of Clovis in 511. we find the name of Adelphius bishop of Basle; and it is well known, that bishops were not allowed, in those days, to assist at councils that met in places not subject to their prince.
- c Clovis no sooner returned from pursuing the fugitives, than he acquainted the queen with the vow or promise he had made, acknowledging at the same time, that the victory he had acquired was owing to it. Hereupon Clothildis, without loss of time, dispatched a messenger to Remigius bishop of Rheims, acquainting him with what had happened, and intreating him to hasten to court, in order to instruct the king in the mysteries of the christian religion. Clovis received the holy prelate with the greatest marks of respect and esteem; but being informed, in the several private conferences
- d he had with him, that he must, in the first place, renounce the worship of the gods he had till then adored, he told the bishop, that he was ready to comply with his instructions, but being afraid, lest the Franks, attached to the religion of their forefathers, might thence be prompted to revolt, he begged leave to acquaint them first with his design, and to try, whether the arguments, that had convinced him, might not be of equal weight with them. Having therefore, with this view, assembled the Franks, he no sooner began to speak, than they all cried out, with one voice, We renounce the worship of the false gods, and are ready to acknowledge the God whom the bishop of Rheims preaches. Hereupon the holy prelate, transported with joy, ordered every thing to be got ready for the baptizing of the king, and the ceremony was performed with the greatest pomp and solemnity. When the bishop was upon the point of administering the sacrament, he addressed the king thus: Bow your head with humility, O Sicambrian; adore what you formerly burnt, and burn what you formerly adored. Remigius, adds Gregory of Tours, from whom we have copied this whole account, was, by all his contemporaries, held in great veneration for the holiness of his life; nay, he was even said to have raised one from the dead³. With Clovis were baptized, according to the same writer, three thousand of his subjects able to bear arms, and one of his sisters, named Albofleda. At the same time, another sister, by name Lantildis, renounced the errors of Arius, and was received into the church. Albofleda died a few days after she had been baptized; and upon her death Remigius wrote a consolatory letter to the king, whereof the beginning has been transmitted to us by Gregory of Tours^w, and some fragments of it gathered from other writers by Du Chesne^w, to whom we refer the reader. Clovis was not baptized during the solemnity of Easter, as Hincmar^x and Flodoard have written; but in that of Christmas, as is evident from the letter which Alcimus Avitus bishop of Vienne wrote to Clovis, congratulating him upon his conversion. The epitomizer of the history of the Franks tells us, that Remigius having preached to Clovis, and those who had been baptized with him, a sermon on the passion of our Saviour, the king, in hearing him, could not forbear crying out, If I had been there with my Franks, that should not have happened^y. Before his conversion, he had two sons by Clothildis, of whom the eldest, named Ingomer, was baptized, by the care of his pious mother, but died a few days after; which greatly provoked the king, who ascribed his death to his being offered to the God of Clothildis, and not to those of his forefathers. However, the zealous queen caused the other likewise, by name Clodomire, to be baptized, who soon after was seized with a dangerous distemper, which incensed the king anew against his consort; but the child recovered, and the queen never ceased to preach to her husband the true God, whom she adored, till, with the miraculous assistance of Heaven, she brought about his conversion^z. From the whole account of the conversion and baptism of Clovis, which we have copied from Gregory of Tours, the reader must conclude him to have been, in religious matters, a very credulous writer; but, credulous as he is, he makes no mention of the holy phial said to have been sent from heaven, wherein is kept the oil with which the French kings are still anointed at their coronation. Of this phial Hincmar gives us the following account: Clovis and St. Remigius were no sooner entered into the baptistery, than all the avenues to it were so filled with the croud, that the ecclesiastic, who carried the holy oil, and was not gone in with them, could by no means find a way through the multitude. Hereupon the holy prelate, not finding the oil when he was to use it, had recourse to heaven, begging with a short, but fervent prayer, that the want of what was necessary to accomplish the ceremony might be supplied by some means or other. He had scarce done, when a dove, exceeding the very snow in whiteness, was seen carrying a phial filled with oil; which the bishop had no sooner received, than the dove disappeared, and was never afterwards seen. With this oil, Remigius anointed the king; and the odour it spread was sweet beyond imagination or expression^b. Of all this, not a word in Gregory of Tours, tho' a great believer of miracles; which plainly shews, that in his time this fable was not yet invented. It is to be observed, that Clovis was at this time the only catholic prince in the Roman world. Anastasius, emperor of the east, was greatly inclined to the doctrine of Arius. Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, Alaric, king of the Visigoths, master of almost all Spain, and of the third part of Gaul, the king of the Burgundians, and the king of the Vandals in Africa, were avowed and zealous followers of that heresiarch: as for the other kings of the Franks settled in Gaul, they were still pagans. No wonder therefore, that not only Anastasius II. then bishop of Rome, but several other bishops, though subject to different princes, wrote to the king of the Franks, congratulating him on his conversion, and testifying their joy for so happy an event^c.

BUT to return to the military achievements of Clovis: the year after his conversion, the Armorici, that is, the people dwelling on the coast of the ocean between the Loire and the Seine, who had shaken off the Roman yoke, and formed themselves into a republic, submitted of their own accord to Clovis, and became one nation with the Franks^d. Hereupon the Roman troops, that were still in Gaul, finding themselves surrounded on all sides by the enemies of the empire, and not caring to serve under the Arians, says Procopius, that is, the Burgundians and Visigoths, capitulated with the Franks and Armorici, and, surrendering to them the places they held, entered into their service. These, adds Procopius, still observe, both in their attire, and manner of marching and fighting, the antient customs and discipline of the Romans^e. Thus ended the dominion of the Romans in Gaul, after they had been masters of

- a that country for the space of five hundred years and upwards, which was now held by three different nations, viz. the Franks, the Visigoths, and the Burgundians. To the above-mentioned union of the Armorici with the Franks, Procopius, who flourished soon after, ascribes the great power which the Franks had already attained in his time (H). The year after the union of the Armorici with the Franks, Theodoric, king of Italy, being resolved to make war on the Burgundians, in order to recover that part of Gaul which was held by them, and had been formerly subject to Rome, entered into an offensive alliance with Clovis, at that time the most powerful prince in Gaul. In virtue of this treaty, they were to fall upon the king of the Burgundians at the same time, and, if attended with success, divide his dominions between them :
- b if either of them should fail to take the field at the time appointed, and the other, by that means, be obliged to fight alone against the king of the Burgundians, he, who had not fulfilled his engagement, should pay to the other a certain sum, and not receive any share of the conquered king's dominions, till he had paid it^f. Of this war Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: At this time Gundebald and his brother Godegiselus reigned over the Burgundians who were masters of the countries lying on the Rhône, and the Saône, and of the province of Marseilles. Both princes were Arians, as well as their subjects. However, as the two brothers were at variance, Godegiselus privately concluded an alliance with Clovis, whose troops were in great repute. The articles of this treaty were: that Godegiselus should, by some means or other, get the whole power into his hands, and thereupon pay an annual tribute to the king of the Franks. Pursuant to this agreement, Clovis took the field, and in an hostile manner entered the dominions of Gundebald, who immediately dispatched a messenger to his brother, of whom he did not entertain the least jealousy or suspicion, intreating him to march without delay to his assistance, which Godegiselus promised to do; but, when the two armies joined battle, instead of affording him the promised assistance, he fell unexpectedly upon his brother's troops, who, finding themselves attacked at the same time in the front and the rear, betook themselves, after a faint opposition, to a precipitous flight. This battle was fought at Divio, now Dijon, on the Ouse; and from thence Gundebald, upon the defeat of his army, fled to Avenio, now Avignon, and shut himself up in that city. Upon his flight Godegiselus seized on his dominions, and caused himself to be acknowledged at Vienna, the capital of his brother's kingdom^g. Clovis pursued the fugitive king to Avignon, and laid close siege to that city, with a design to take him prisoner, and afterwards dispose of him as he and Godegiselus should think proper. But in the mean time Aredius, or Aridius, one of Gundebald's ministers, a person of extraordinary

(H) The union of the Armorici with the Franks is founded chiefly on the authority of Procopius; but, in the text of that writer, the people, who submitted to the Franks, are called Arborici. However, all those, who have had occasion to speak of this event, read, as we have done, Armorici instead of Arborici (1); except father Daniel, who, contrary to the opinion of all those who wrote before him, maintains, that in the reign of Clovis there was a people in Gaul called Arborici. But, in the first place, that nation was utterly unknown to Cluverius, who, speaking of them, expresses himself thus: Who these Arborici were, no writer has been yet able to discover (2). Father Daniel, in the map which he has prefixed to his history, places them between the Meuse, the ocean, and the Escaut. But he is therein certainly mistaken; for in none of the notices, or descriptions of Gaul, which have reached our times, and were composed under the last emperors, mention is made of the Arborici, who must have been a very numerous people, though all the other nations inhabiting Gaul, and Belgica Secunda, are there minutely described. Apollinaris Sidonius, Salvianus, and Avisius, frequently enumerate the various nations that, in the fifth century, were settled in Gaul; but no mention is made of the Arborici by any of them. Besides, if the Arborici had dwelt in the country allotted them, by father Daniel, on the most distant borders of Belgica Secunda, how could their joining the Franks oblige, as we read in Procopius, the Roman troops, who guarded the Loire, to capitulate with Clovis? For these reasons, all those who have had occasion to speak of the Armorici, even after father Daniel published the first volume of his history, have read Armorici instead of Arborici; nay, Hertius (3), Eccard (4), and father Lobineau (5), cannot help expressing great surprise, that such an able writer as father Daniel should be guilty of so gross a mistake. Had he read Procopius, says Eccard, with more attention, he would himself have been convinced of his error. In the same passage we find, in the text of Procopius, Eridianus instead of Rhodanus, which mistake, as well as that of Arborici instead of Marmorici, ought to be charged upon the transcribers, and not to the author, who had lived too long in Italy not to know, that the Po was a river of that country, and not of Gaul.

parts, and greatly attached to his master's interest, pretending to have abandoned him upon some disgust, went over to Clovis, and, being received by him with the greatest marks of esteem, he prevailed upon him by degrees, with arguments drawn from the uncertainty of fortune, to raise the siege of a place which he said was impregnable, and content himself with a yearly tribute, which Gundebald readily agreed to pay him. Clovis was no sooner returned to his dominions, than Gundebald, having assembled what forces he could, marched with all possible expedition to Vienne, where Godegiselus then resided, and, having got into the town, with a chosen body of men, through an aqueduct, at his first appearing, struck the king and the garrison with such terror, that, believing the enemy master of the city, they only thought of saving themselves in the churches. But Godegiselus was, by his brother's orders, killed in his asylum, with a bishop who had there taken refuge with him. A small body of Franks, who had remained with Godegiselus, withdrew into a tower, with a design to defend themselves there; but being in the end forced to submit, Gundebald only disarmed them, and sent them thus disarmed to Alaric king of the Visigoths. But as for the senators, and chief men, who had declared for Godegiselus, he ordered them all to be put to death. Gundebald, continues our historian, being, by the death of his brother, become master of the whole country now known by the name of Burgundy, published a new code, containing several laws in favour of his Roman subjects, that they might be no longer oppressed by the Burgundians^b.

Gregory of Tours, in his account of this war, has omitted, as the reader must have observed, such events as belonged to the history of the Ostrogoths; and, on the other hand, Procopius takes very little notice of those that belonged to the history of the Franks. The former writer thought, perhaps, an account of what the Ostrogoths performed in, or acquired by this war, foreign to his purpose; and the latter contented himself with a detail of those events in which the Ostrogoths were chiefly concerned; since, in this war, they made themselves masters of several cities in Gaul, which they still held, when Justinian, whose wars with them he describes, undertook to subdue them. The account he gives, after the conclusion of the above-mentioned treaty between the Franks and the Ostrogoths, is as follows: Pursuant to this treaty, the king of the Franks took the field with a numerous army, and entered the territories of the Burgundians in an hostile manner. Theodoric, on the contrary, pretending to hasten his warlike preparations, ordered them privately to be carried on slowly, with a design to wait the issue of the first engagement between his ally and the king of the Burgundians. When the troops were, in the end, ready to take the field, he gave private orders to his generals to advance with slow marches till such time as they had received certain intelligence of the success that had attended the Franks. If the Franks had defeated the Burgundians, the Ostrogoths were to advance with all possible expedition; but, to halt, and wait for further orders, if the Burgundians had gained the advantage. While the Ostrogoths, therefore, were yet on their march, the Franks alone engaged and put to flight the common enemy, pursuing them to the farthest borders of their country, where they had several strongholds, in which they shut themselves up, abandoning the rest of their territories to the conquerors. Upon the first news of this victory, Theodoric's army marched, with all possible expedition, to join the Franks, and, alleging the badness of the roads as an excuse for their coming so late, offered to the king of the Franks the sum, which, agreeable to the treaty, they had forfeited by their delay. Clovis accepted the offer, and, upon his receiving the money, divided with the Ostrogoths, pursuant to the same treaty, the country he had conquered. The conduct of Theodoric on this occasion, continues our historian, was a strong proof of his wisdom and prudence, since, without exposing the lives of his subjects, and only by paying a small sum, he acquired one half of his enemy's country^c, viz. the city of Marseilles, and its territory, with all the countries lying between the Durance, the Alps, the Mediterranean, and the Lower Rhône.

SOME writers are of opinion, that Gregory of Tours and Procopius speak of different wars. Clovis, according to them, waged war with the Burgundians at two different times. In the first of these wars he had Godegiselus, the brother of Gundebald, for his ally, and, in the second, Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths. But this does not at all agree with what we read in Marius Aventicensis, a contemporary writer, who,

- a speaking of the war in the year 500. in which Gundebald was defeated in the neighbourhood of Dijon, that is, of the war described by Gregory of Tours, concludes thus: Gundebald, therefore, having recovered, upon the death of his brother, his own dominions, and likewise made himself master of those that had belonged to Godegiselus, governed them with great prosperity to the day of his death^k. This we cannot persuade ourselves the bishop of Avanches would have written, had Gundebald, after his restoration in 500. been engaged in such an unsuccessful war as that of which Procopius speaks. However, we cannot help thinking it very strange, that Procopius should not mention the alliance of the Franks with Godegiselus, nor Gregory of Tours that of the Ostrogoths with the Franks. 'Tis true, both historians agree in some particulars; viz. that in the very beginning of this war a decisive battle was fought, in which the Burgundians were utterly defeated by the Franks; and that, after their defeat, they took refuge in their fortified towns, situated on the most distant borders of their country. Besides, it appears, from the acts of a conference held at Lions on religious matters, in the year 499. that Clovis, who was then preparing to make war on the Burgundians, had already entered into an alliance with a prince who was then at war with them. This ally could neither be Godegiselus nor Alaric king of the Visigoths; for the alliance of the former with the king of the Franks was kept secret till the battle of Dijon, fought, according to the bishop of Avanches^l, and the best chronologers, the following year 500. As for Alaric, he was not at war with the Burgundians; since their king sent, as we have related above, the Franks, whom he had taken at Vienne, to be kept by him. As it appears, therefore, from hence, that Clovis had Theodoric for his ally in the war which he waged with the Burgundians in 500. we may well suppose Procopius to have spoken of this war without recurring to a second. To conclude; if Gregory of Tours and Procopius speak of different wars, they are both highly to blame, the former for taking no notice of the second war, and the latter for being quite silent as to the first. Clovis was so far from revenging the death of Godegiselus his friend and ally, that, on the contrary, he restored to Gundebald, no doubt in virtue of some treaty unknown to us, that part of his dominions which had fallen to his share. As for Theodoric, he kept the city of Marseilles, and some adjacent places, which Gundebald perhaps yielded to him, in virtue of a treaty of marriage concluded this year between Sigismund the son of Gundebald, and Ostrogotha one of Theodoric's daughters.

- Clovis* had scarce concluded a peace with the Burgundians, when, some differences arising between him and Alaric king of the Visigoths, both princes began to prepare for war; which Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, no sooner understood, than he interposed his good offices, and offered his mediation, sending both to them, and to the kings of the Burgundians, the Heruli, the Varni, and the Thuringians, letters on that subject, which are still to be seen in Cassiodore^m. He advises Alaric not to be too confident on the reputation of his Visigoths, for the great things formerly achieved by them; but bids him consider what an alteration long peace and idleness may have wrought in them: he tells him, that passion is a bad counsellor, and not only prompts men to take pernicious resolutions, but to make choice of the worst means to put them in execution; that war ought to be looked upon as the last resource, and never ought to be entered into by princes, till all other methods of obtaining what is due to them in justice have proved unsuccessful: he therefore exhorts him to forbear all hostilities against the king of the Franks till the return of the ambassadors, whom he designed to send to that prince with an offer of his mediation, in order to prevent either of the two princes, so nearly allied to him, from aggrandizing himself at the expence of the other. He closes his letter thus: It is not to revenge the blood of your fathers, or to recover part of your dominions unjustly seized and detained by either of you, that you take arms against each other, but only on account of some unguarded words; so that your differences may be easily composed, if not heightened by unseasonable hostilities. Give me leave, therefore, to acquaint Clovis, before you come to an open rupture, that he shall have me too for his enemy, if he makes war upon you. When justice speaks to princes with a sword in her hand, they readily hearken to her. We have therefore dispatched ambassadors to you, who will farther acquaint you, by word of mouth, with our intention. We have ordered them to repair afterwards to the courts of the king of the Burgundians, and of such other princes as you shall think proper, and to act there pursuant to the instructions they shall receive from you. Above all things, take care you be not the first in committing hostilities; lest you should incur the hatred which all men bear to the violators of treaties. Persuade yourself, that we are so far from sowing the seeds of discord among our neighbours, in order to take advantage of their misfortunes, that we shall look upon those, who fall upon you, as a common enemy, and act accordingly^a. In his letter to Luduin, for so he calls Clovis, he tells that prince, that he cannot but wonder he should be so easily provoked, and, upon so slight an occasion, make war upon Alaric, being uncle to his wife Theodegotha; that their common enemies wished for nothing so much as to see the Franks and Visigoths weakening and destroying each other: he bids him consider, they are both kings of powerful nations, and in the flower of their age; and therefore that they ought the more to be upon their guard against evil counsellors, lest they should, by rashly entering into a war, bring their kingdoms to the brink of ruin. He proposes the mediation of the neighbouring princes, and advises him to sheath his sword, which he could not in honour see drawn by either of them: he concludes by threatening to make war upon the first, whether Luduin or Alaric, who should commit hostilities against the other; and by assuring both, that the advice he gave them proceeded from the most sincere friendship, since none but a true friend, who was far from envying their prosperity, would advise them as he had done. In his letter to Gundebald, he tells that prince, that he thinks himself bound in duty to moderate the ardour of two young princes, whose conduct is condemned by all men of experience and prudence; that they ought to hearken to those, who, by their age and experience, are intitled to advise them; that he cannot suffer two princes, who are both nearly allied to him, to destroy each other, and therefore is resolved to declare against him, who shall first commit hostilities: he adds, that he has dispatched ambassadors to him, with orders to repair afterwards to the court of the king of the Franks, with the deputies of the other princes his friends and allies, to negotiate an accommodation between the contending parties. He closes his letter with advising the king of the Burgundians to act in concert with him, and do all that lies in his power to prevent a war, which, should they be remiss in their good offices, the world will believe to have been under-hand kindled by them. In these letters Theodoric pretends to stand quite neuter, and to have taken no other resolution, but that of declaring against the aggressor, whether Clovis or Alaric; but in the letter he wrote to the three brothers, Hermanafred, Baderic, and Bertbier, who at that time reigned jointly over the Heruli, the Varni, and the Thuringians, he betrays great partiality for Alaric, and no small prejudice against Clovis. It was couched in the following terms: The proud are detested by Heaven, and it is incumbent upon every man to curb their arrogance. He who seeks to oppress a people, whom every nation would be glad to have for neighbours, shews but too plainly, that he only wants an opportunity of treating all other princes in the like manner. A prince, who pays no regard to the laws of equity, thinks every thing lawful when he has been once attended with success in an unjust attempt: such a prince ought to be abhorred by all mankind. It behoves therefore you, whose valour is capable of stemming the most unbounded ambition, to prevent the execution of such iniquitous projects. Begin with joining your ambassadors to those whom king Gundebald and we have have dispatched to the king of the Franks, in order to divert him from falling upon the Visigoths, and persuade him to pay due regard to the laws of equity, and right of nations. If he refuses to submit to the arbitration of so many powerful princes, let him be deemed the common enemy of mankind. And truly what else can a prince, who is actuated by good principles, wish for, than to have such mediators, who readily take upon them to see justice done him, if he has been wronged? To speak my sentiments openly; a prince, who pays no regard to the law of nations, must necessarily be hatching dangerous projects, which may end in the ruin of other states. Let us therefore stem the torrent at its source, and cover the countries that are exposed to his ravages, lest they should feel, before they are aware, the direful effects of his fury. You remember, without all doubt, the many favours you have received at the hands of Euric, the father of Alaric, the magnificent presents he often sent you, the efforts he made, and the vast charge he was at, to prevent the neighbouring nations from

- a making incursions into your territories. It is now time to repay to the son the good offices of the father. If the king of the Franks is suffered to aggrandize himself at the expence of his neighbours, the most distant nations will be no longer safe. These are the motives that have induced us to dispatch ambassadors to you, who will farther inform you of our sentiments by word of mouth, and to whom, after seeing their credentials, you may give intire credit. We exhort you therefore to enter into the measures we have taken to secure the public tranquillity, and to concern yourselves in what passes in the neighbouring countries, that you may not have a war in your own^o. From these letters it appears, that Theodoric entertained no small jealousy of Clovis, and was greatly prejudiced against him. But the king of the Franks, not thinking it advisable to break with the Visigoths at this juncture, forbore all hostilities till five years after, that is, till the year 507. and in the mean time, probably, consented to that interview with Alaric which Gregory of Tours speaks of: for, according to that historian, Alaric, alarmed at the conquests Clovis was daily making, dispatched ambassadors to him, inviting him to an interview. With this invitation Clovis readily complied; so that the two princes met in an island formed by the Loire, over-against Amboise, a place in the territory of Tours. There they conferred, and, having dined together, they parted, promising to live in friendship and amity with each other^p. This is all we find in Gregory of Tours concerning this interview. But to his account historians, who came after him, have added several particulars, which we look upon as fabulous, since they have not been mentioned by him; namely, that Alaric laid snares for Clovis, which he happily escaped; a circumstance that seems to have been invented to justify the war which Clovis made a few years after on Alaric, that is, in 507.

An interview
and Alaric.

- OF this war Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: In those days most people in Gaul were desirous of living under the dominion of the Franks, and, among the rest, Quintianus bishop of Rhodés; which the Visigoths being well apprised of, they resolved to dispatch him, lest he should betray that city to them. But the holy prelate, receiving timely notice of their design, made his escape in the night, and retired into Auvergne. When Clovis heard of the treatment Quintianus had met with from the Visigoths, It grieves me, said he, turning to his people, that these Arians should hold any thing in Gaul: let us march against them, and, with the assistance of Heaven, make ourselves masters of the fine country they possess. His speech being received by all with loud acclamations, he began his march without loss of time, bending his route to Poitiers, where Alaric then was. On his arrival at the Vienne he found the enemy encamped on the opposite bank, and that river so swelled with the heavy rains that had fallen for several days together, that it was not then fordable, nor could he attempt to lay bridges over it, or convey his men in boats to the opposite bank, without exposing them to the greatest and almost inevitable dangers, the other side of the river being all along lined with the enemy's troops. This gave Clovis great uneasiness, who thereupon continued all night in prayer; and the next morning a hind of an extraordinary size was seen by the whole army to enter the river, and ford it, as if sent by Heaven on purpose to point out to the Franks the place where the Vienne, notwithstanding the depth of its waters, was fordable. The whole army followed their guide, and, having crossed the river without the loss of a man, encamped in sight of Poitiers. While he lay there, he observed, one night, a globe of fire over the church of St. Hilarius, in the city of Poitiers, darting rays towards his camp, and, as it were, inviting him to engage, without loss of time, the king of the Visigoths, who had his head-quarters in that city. Accordingly Clovis immediately set out anew on his march, and, coming up with the enemy in the plain of Vouglé, about ten miles from Poitiers, he gave them a total overthrow. In this battle most part of the enemy's troops were cut off, and the rest obliged to take refuge in their strong-holds and fortified towns. Clovis distinguished himself on this occasion in a most eminent manner, and killed, as all writers agree, the king of the Visigoths with his own hand; but was himself in the utmost danger, two of Alaric's guards having attacked him while he was engaged with their king; but his breast-plate being proof against their lances, he happily escaped^q. Gregory of Tours does not mention the number of the dead; but only tells us, that most of the inhabitants of Auvergne, who, under the conduct of Apollinaris, came to the assistance of Alaric, were cut off, and that among the dead there were many senators and persons of distinction (I). Of this battle Procopius gives us a very succinct account. That writer, after relating what we have inserted above of the war which Clovis and Theodoric made jointly on the Burgundians in the year 500. continues thus: The power of the Franks being considerably increased, they no longer paid any regard to Theodoric, but, free from all fear, made war upon Alaric king of the Visigoths. That prince was no sooner acquainted with their design, than he had recourse to Theodoric, who immediately put himself at the head of his army, and marched to the assistance of his son-in-law. In the mean time the Visigoths, upon intelligence that the enemy began to appear on the frontiers of Poitou, posted themselves under the walls of Poitiers, and kept some days within their trenches, waiting the arrival of the Ostrogoths. This highly affronted the Visigoths, who, thinking themselves a match for the Franks without the assistance of any other nation, forced Alaric in the end to engage the enemy before he was joined by Theodoric. But the Visigoths were defeated, and great numbers of them killed on the spot, and, among the rest, their king¹. We are told by several writers, who lived in those times, or soon after, that Clovis had for his ally in this war Gundebald king of the *Burgundians*²; and from Gregory of Tours it appears, that a body of Ripuarian Franks joined him before the battle, under the conduct of Chloderic, the eldest son of Sigebert king of that tribe³. The battle of Vouglé was fought in the year 507. the emperor Anastasius being consul the third time in the east, and Venantius Decius in the west. As Clovis was chiefly prompted by his zeal for the catholic faith to make war upon Alaric an Arian prince, no wonder that Gregory of Tours, an ecclesiastic and credulous writer, should believe and gravely relate the miracles that were said to have been wrought by Heaven in his favour, but were utterly unknown to Procopius.

Clovis, taking advantage of the consternation the Visigoths were in on the defeat of their army, and the death of the king, dispatched his son Theodoric, with part of his forces, to reduce the Aibigeois, Rovergne, and Auvergne; which he did accordingly, making himself master of all the places in that tract between the confines of the Visigoths and those of the *Burgundians*⁴. Clovis, with the rest of the army, advanced to Carcaffone, and laid close siege to that place; but being informed, that Theodoric was drawing near at the head of his Ostrogoths, he thought it adviseable to retire. However, he made himself master of that part of Gaul which lies between the Rhône and the ocean, that is, of the two *Aquitains*⁵. After this he took up his winter-quarters in Bordeaux, whither he caused great part of the treasures of Alaric to be conveyed from Toulouse. Early in the spring he took the field, and laid siege to Engouleme, which he soon reduced. Our credulous historian tells us, that the walls of that city fell as soon as Clovis appeared before them, and that thereupon the Visigoths evacuated that place, and the inhabitants, with great joy, took the oath of allegiance to the king of the *Franks*⁶. From Engouleme the Franks and the Burgundians, their allies in this war, advanced to the city of Arles, which it was of the utmost importance for them to reduce; since, by the reduction of it, all communication would be cut off between the province which the Ostrogoths possessed in Gaul, and that part of the province of Narbonne, which was still held by the Visigoths. The Franks, upon their arrival before the place, attempted to make themselves masters of a bridge on the Rhône, and, by that means, of an island named Camargue, which is formed by the Rhône, on which Arles stands, dividing itself there into two arms. The Visigoths made a vigorous resistance, and in the end obliged the Franks to retire, who thereupon crossed the river in boats, and joined the Burgundians encamped on the opposite bank. The siege, of which we know but very few particulars, must have lasted some time; for, from several antient records and letters, it appears, that the inhabitants suffered greatly by famine, and that the city was reduced to the utmost extremity⁷. But in the end the Franks were obliged, by the troops which Theodoric sent

(I) Apollinaris, who commanded the troops of Auvergne, was the son of the celebrated Apollinaris Simonius by Papianilla daughter to the emperor Avitus. Most of his men were killed in the battle of Vouglé; but he had the good luck to escape the general slaughter. He was a few years after chosen bishop of Auvergne, but lived only three months after his election.

- a to the relief of the place, to abandon the enterprize, and retire. Of this event Cassiodore speaks thus: In the consulship of Venantius the younger and Celer, our sovereign Theodoric sent an army into Gaul, where the depredations of the Franks had occasioned great confusion. By this army the enemy was defeated, and put to flight, and great part of the country reduced^a. From the life of Casarius, at that time bishop of Arles, which was written soon after the siege, it appears, that the Franks and Burgundians were closely pursued in their retreat by the Ostrogoths, who cut many of them in pieces, and took an incredible number of captives^a. In this war, Theodoric made himself master of Avignon, and some other places belonging to the Burgundians^b. But no mention is made by any of the antients of his making himself master
- b of any town or country subject to the Franks.

THE following year 509. Hilba, one of Theodoric's generals, gained a memorable victory over the Franks, of whom thirty thousand, if Jornandes is to be credited^c, were killed upon the spot. Soon after, a peace was concluded between Theodoric and Clovis, whereof one of the articles was, that the Franks should keep the countries, which they had taken from the Visigoths^d; which inclines us to question the truth of what Jornandes writes concerning the memorable victory of the Ostrogoths over the Franks, the more as no mention is made of it by Procopius; nay, that writer tells us in exprefs terms, that Theodoric yielded to the Franks the countries they had seized, after he had attempted in vain to drive them out of them. Amalaric, the grandson of Theodoric, was, at this time, king of the Visigoths; but, as he was yet under age, Theodoric, who was his guardian, exercised the same authority in the young prince's dominions, as he did in his own. By this peace, the power of the Visigoths was greatly impaired; for nothing now remained to them in Gaul but the city of Narbonne, and five or six other cities within the district of that metropolis. As for the Ostrogoths, they continued masters of the province they held before, lying between the Alps, the Mediterranean, the Rhone, and the Durance, and appropriated to themselves the city of Arles, for the charges they had been at in this war. A peace being thus concluded, Clovis repaired to Tours, and there received the ambassadors, who had been sent to him by the emperor Anastasius, with the ensigns and ornaments of the consulship; for that prince, hearing of his great exploits, thought it adviseable, by such a kind of empty respect, to gain his favour, the rather as Theodoric and the emperor were, at this time, at variance; for the Ostrogoths had seized on Pannonia, and the Romans, under the conduct of Romanus, were ravaging the coasts of Italy. Clovis, having received the presents sent him by the emperor, and the rescript of his election, appeared first in the great church of St. Martin, with the tunica trabeata, the chlamys, and the other ensigns of his new dignity, and from thence rode, with a diadem on his head, to the cathedral, throwing gold and silver to the populace, who, in great crouds, attended him. From that time forwards he was acknowledged, concludes Gregory of Tours, as consul and emperor^e. From which words as consul, and from his name not being found in the fasti, some authors conclude, not the real and ordinary, but only the titular and honorary consulship to have been conferred upon him. In all the fasti, that have been transmitted to us, Boetius alone is marked as consul of the year 510. Boetius was one of Theodoric's ministers, and is no less known by his writings, than by his misfortunes. To this objection some answer, that, in Gaul, all the public registers were kept at Arles, at that time subject to Theodoric, who, envying the king of the Franks his new dignity, would not suffer his name to be registered in the fasti. But this answer is of no weight, since the name of Boetius alone is to be found, not only in the fasti written in Gaul, but in all others. Baronius is of opinion, that only the titular or honorary consulship was offered him by Anastasius; and that he, thinking it below him to accept of such a dignity, refused the emperor's offer. But this opinion evidently contradicts Gregory of Tours, who lived soon after Clovis, and must have been acquainted with several persons, who had seen that prince. Besides, even the honorary consulship was often conferred on the kings of the barbarians, and other very deserving and eminent persons, as is manifest from innumerable instances in history. From Tours, where Clovis had taken the ensigns of consul, he repaired to Paris, which city he chose for the usual place of his residence, and fixed the royal seat there^f. This metropolis was deemed of such importance, that the grandchildren of Clovis, in dividing his dominions among them, ^a agreed, that it should not be comprised in any lot, but remain common to all; and that none of them should enter it without the express consent of the rest, on pain of forfeiting his whole share. Paris has been the seat of the French monarchy ever since the time of Clovis, who first resided there. The kingdoms, over which his grandchildren reigned, after the division of his dominions, had each its particular metropolis; but Paris still continued to be the metropolis of the whole monarchy.

Sigebert and his son Chloderic to be murdered*

Clovis had hitherto greatly enlarged his dominions at the expence of the Visigoths, as we have related above; but now he formed a design of causing himself to be acknowledged king by the other tribes of the Franks, who were governed by their own princes, and, by adding their dominions and forces to his own, establish his ^b kingdom so firmly in Gaul, that it should be out of the power of any other prince to overturn it. This he accomplished, and in the following manner, which no-ways redounds to his glory, though related by Gregory of Tours, his panegyrist rather than historian. While he resided at Paris, says that writer, by his emissaries he represented to Chloderic, the son of Sigebert, that his father was now stricken in years, and moreover lame of the wound he had received at the battle of Tolbiac, assuring him at the same time, that he was resolved to espouse his cause, and maintain him on the throne after the death of his father. Chloderic, depending upon the promises of Clovis, suffered himself to be so blinded by his ambition, as to commit a parricide; for one day, while Sigebert, who had passed the Rhine to take the air in the forest of Buckovia, was sleeping after dinner, he was dispatched by two assassins hired for that purpose by his son. ^c A few days after, Chloderic was overtaken by the like fate; for having acquainted Clovis with the death of his father, and desired him at the same time to send proper persons to take possession of the deceased prince's treasures, which were at his disposal, one of those, who were sent to view the treasures, (for Clovis declared he did not want them) bid Chloderic thrust down his hand, and search one of the deepest chests to the bottom; but the prince had no sooner inclined his body, in compliance with his request, than, with his battle-ax, he gave him a blow on the head, which dashed out his brains. Clovis, upon the news of his death, flew to the place, where the murder had been committed; and having assembled the subjects ^d of Sigebert, he assured them, that he was no-ways privy to the death either of the father or the son; but that the father had been barbarously assassinated by the son, and the inhuman parricide, by a just punishment from Heaven, put to death by persons to him utterly unknown. He concluded his harangue by advising them, since they were destitute of a prince and leader, to chuse him for their king, assuring them, that he was ready to defend them against all their enemies at the expence of his own life. His speech was received with loud shouts of joy; and he had scarce done, when he was, with one voice, proclaimed by the multitude king of their tribe. ^e Thus Clovis made himself master of the dominions and treasures of Sigebert, adding the subjects of that unfortunate prince to his own. Gregory of Tours closes his account of the murder of Sigebert, and his son Chloderic, with the following words: Thus were the enemies of Clovis delivered daily up into his hands by Providence, because his intention was upright, and his conduct pleasing to Heaven. ^f Some writers, to excuse Clovis, and indeed Gregory of Tours for speaking thus of a prince guilty of such enormities, suppose Sigebert, and his son Chloderic, to have been the aggressors, and to have made some attempt upon the life of Clovis; but of this not a word in Gregory of Tours, who would not, as we conceive, have passed over in silence such an attempt, since it might, in some degree, have extenuated, in the eyes of the world, the guilt of Clovis, in whose favour that writer was greatly prejudiced. Besides, let the provocation be ever so great, the stirring up a son to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father, must be highly criminal. We cannot therefore conceive what could induce our historian, after relating the murder of the father by the son at the instigation of Clovis, and of the son by the emissaries of that prince, to add what we have inserted above, viz. that Providence delivered his enemies into his hands, because his intention was upright, and his conduct pleasing to Heaven. By his upright intention the bishop meant perhaps his intention of gaining the Riparian Franks over to the christian religion; for both they, and the two princes, were still pagans, whereas Clovis was a zealous professor of the catholic faith. This alone, as we appre-

- a hend, could excuse, and, in the opinion of our historian, even sanctify, the most inhuman and unnatural murders. Be that as it will, Clovis, by the death of those two princes, became master of the whole country held by the Ripuarian Franks, which, according to the most probable opinion, extended west of the Rhine as far as the river Fuld, and on the east to the city of Chalons on the Marne, having Cologne for its metropolis. The country, lying west of the Rhine, was part of ancient France, which the Ripuarians had defended against the efforts of the Thuringians, attempting to drive them from thence. Some time before the invasion of Attila, they crossed the Rhine, and, being allowed to settle in the parts of Gaul bordering on that river, they extended, by degrees, their territories to Chalons. In the life of St. Mesmin, b the second abbot of Mici, in the diocese of Orleans, and contemporary with Clovis, which was written soon after his death, and likewise in a chronicle of the twelfth century, by one Hugo, we find a long account of the siege and reduction of Verdun by Clovis, which, according to the best chronologers, happened at this time, the inhabitants of that city, who were highly provoked at the treacherous murder of their princes, refusing to acknowledge him for their king, as we read in the above-mentioned chronicle. However, they were in the end obliged to submit, as were several other cities, which had belonged to Sigebert, and were unwilling to receive Clovis for their kingⁱ. The Ripuarian Franks seem to have been, next to the Salians, the most powerful of all the tribes of that nation settled in Gaul; for, even after they
 c had acknowledged Clovis for their king, they continued a distinct tribe, separated from that of the Salians, had their own code of laws, and lived according to them, even under the kings of the second race. But all the other tribes, after they had submitted to Clovis, were incorporated, and became one people, with the tribe of the Salians, of which Clovis was king, no further mention being made in history of the Cbatti, Cbamavi, Ampsivarii, &c. whose names so often occur in the historians, who wrote before that time.

- BUT to resume the thread of our history: Gregory of Tours, after relating in what manner Clovis united the dominions of Sigebert to his own, gives us an account of the d opinion, had settled in the country comprising the present dioceses of Bologne, St. Omers, Bruges, and Ghent. Clovis, says our historian, marched afterwards against Cbararic, who, refusing to join him against Syagrius, had waited the issue of the battle, in order to side with the conqueror. Cbararic, and his son, fell into the snare, which Clovis had laid for them, who, having got them into his power, after ordering their hair to be cut, caused the father to be ordained priest, and the son deacon. As Cbararic was one day bewailing his hard fate, the son, to alleviate the grief of his disconsolate father; In stripping us of our dignity, says he, and bereaving us of the ensigns of majesty, they have only stripped a green tree of its leaves, which will soon bud anew. May our enemy perish as soon as our hair will grow! Clovis, being informed of e this discourse, and not doubting but they intended to let their hair grow, which was a mark of royalty, and, by hiring assassins to murder him, attempt the recovery of their kingdom, resolved to be before-hand with them, and accordingly ordered them both to be put to death. The two princes being thus dispatched, he seized on their treasures, made himself master of their country, and obliged their subjects, both Romans and Franks, to acknowledge him for their king^k.

- Ragnacharius*, king of Cambray, was now the only prince among the Franks, of whom Clovis entertained the least jealousy. He therefore resolved, in the next place, to fall upon him, being well apprised, that, if he were once removed, the kings of the other tribes would be no-ways in a condition to make head against him, even with f their united forces. Ragnacharius, as Gregory of Tours takes care to tell us, was a most wicked prince, abandoned to all manner of lewdness, not sparing his own relations, and intirely governed by a favourite minister named Faro, whom he treated rather as his equal than his servant. His debauched life, and the exorbitant power he allowed to his wicked favourite, who was the object of the public hatred, raised an universal discontent among his subjects. This Clovis resolved to improve to his advantage, and, in order to gain over the discontented party, he sent to the leading men among them bracelets of gilt brags, pretending they were of pure gold. When he found he could depend upon those, who had received his presents, he entered unexpectedly the dominions of Ragnacharius at the head of a powerful army; which a Ragnacharius no sooner understood, than he took the field with what troops he could assemble, in order to oppose the attempts of his rival. When Clovis drew near the place where he was encamped, he sent out some parties to reconnoitre the enemy; but these, being gained over by Clovis, assured him on their return, that the troops he discovered at a distance were his own subjects, coming, pursuant to his orders, to join him. In the mean time Clovis advanced, and, falling upon Ragnacharius before he could draw up the few troops he had with him, put him to flight. The unhappy prince attempted to make his escape; but was taken, together with his brother Richarius, by the traitors he had about him, and both delivered up, with their hands tied behind their backs, to Clovis, who thus addressed Ragnacharius: It was base and b scandalous in you to suffer one of our illustrious race to be thus bound, like a public malefactor. You ought to have avoided, at the expence of a thousand lives, such an ignominious treatment. He had scarce uttered these words, when, with a blow of his battle-ax, he cleaved his head, and laid him dead at his feet. In the same manner he treated Richarius, after upbraiding him with cowardice, for not defending his brother with that courage and resolution, which became one of his blood. In the mean time those, who had betrayed Ragnacharius, discovering that their bracelets were not of gold, complained thereof to Clovis, who is said to have returned them the following answer: You well know what you have done, and therefore ought not to complain, but deem it a great favour, that I suffer you to live. Clovis, continues our historian, was nearly c related to Ragnacharius and Richarius, who had another brother named Regnomer, king of the Franks settled at Mans; and him too Clovis caused to be murdered, making himself master of the dominions and treasures of the three brothers. By the murder of these, and several other princes, of whom, as they were his kinsmen, he entertained some jealousy, he extended his dominion all over Gaul. Having thus dispatched all the princes, who were any-ways related to him, he one day, in the presence of his nobles, bemoaned his condition, saying, That he was, in a manner, a stranger among his own people, having no kinsman to stand by him, in case he wanted his assistance. But this he said, not because he was concerned for their death, but to try whether any one would own himself for his relation, that he might d dispatch him, as he had done the others¹. This is the account Gregory of Tours gives us of the manner, in which Clovis caused himself to be acknowledged king of all the tribes of the Franks settled in Gaul. Whether his intention could be upright, as that writer is pleased to express himself, and his conduct pleasing to Heaven, we leave our readers to judge.

Clovis did not long enjoy his new conquests; for he died soon after the reduction of the several tribes of Franks settled in Gaul. Clovis, says Gregory of Tours, having transacted these things, that is, having forced all the tribes of the Franks in Gaul to acknowledge him for their king, died soon after at Paris, and was buried there in the church of the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, which had been built by him and e queen Clotildes, or, as our historian styles her, Crotbildes. He died in the forty-fifth year of his age, five years after the battle of Vouglé, having reigned thirty years. After his death, Clotildes retired into Touraine, and there passed the remaining part of her life at St. Martin's tomb^m. This is all we find in Gregory of Tours concerning the death of Clovis. He left four sons behind him, viz. Theodoric, Clodomir, Cbildebert, and Clotharius. The three last he had by Clotildes, and the eldest by a concubine before his marriage with that princess. Theodoric, at his father's death, had already a son named Theodebert, a youth of great expectationⁿ. As to the age of the other three, all we know is, that Clodomir the eldest was born before the battle of Tolbiac in 496. so that, at the time of his father's death, he must have been about f seventeen. The four brothers divided their father's dominions equally among them. Theodoric reigned at Metz; Clodomir at Orleans; Clotharius at Soissons; and Cbildebert at Paris. Though these four kingdoms were rather members of one and the same monarchy, than four different monarchies, yet the princes were quite independent of each other, in the same manner as the kings of the different tribes had been of Clovis.

The antient state of the Burgundians, Alemans, Heruli, Gepidæ, &c.

- a THE Burgundians, who, upon the decline of the empire, seized on a considerable portion of Gaul, and founded a new kingdom there, were, according to *Am-mianus Marcellinus, originally descended from the Romans. Orosius, who wrote about the year 420. was of the same opinion: We are told, says that writer, that Drusus Nero, and his brother Tiberius, the adopted sons of Cæsar Augustus, having subdued the inner parts of Germany, left several camps in the country, and part of their army, to keep the neighbouring people in subjection. From the Roman soldiers, who were on this occasion left to guard the camps, are descended the Burgundians. The castles and strong-holds, built for the defence of a country, are by the Germans called burgs; and hence the Romans who guarded them, and their descendants, were styled Burgundians. Their conquests in Gaul, continues our historian, speak them both a numerous and warlike nation. As they have embraced the catholic faith, our ecclesiastics, whose spiritual jurisdiction they acknowledge, have rendered them mild and tractable; for, in the countries where they have settled, they treat the natives, not as strangers whom they have subdued, but as brothers in Christ. Thus Orosius, who, had he lived thirty years longer, would not have commended the Burgundians on account of their gentle treatment of the natives; for, upon their embracing the tenets of Arius, which happened about the year 450. the natives, who professed the catholic faith, were treated by them more like slaves than brethren. But to return to their origin: Pliny the elder supposes them to be a German nation, descended from the Vindili, whom most writers take to be the same people with the Vandals†. Valesius distinguishes the Burgundians of Germany from those of the same name, who dwelt more to the east, on the banks of the Danube‡. The Burgundians of Germany were sometimes in alliance, and sometimes at war, with the empire; but never had the reputation of a warlike nation: for the writers, who flourished in those times, speak of them as far inferior in courage and bravery to the other Germans, and observe, that the Burgundians dwelt in castles and fortified places, whereas the other German nations scorned any other fence but their arms: and truly most of them were mechanics, and, before they settled in Gaul, they used in great numbers to flock into that country, to earn a livelihood by their respective professions. As to their government, they were divided into several tribes, each governed by their own chief or king, whose authority was so far from being hereditary, that it was not even during life. The kings of this nation, whom we find mentioned in history, are Gundicar, Gundiac, Bilimer, Gundebald, Sigismund, and Godemar. These princes reigned after the Burgundians had entered Gaul, that is, after the year 407. but they had, without all doubt, kings or chiefs long before that time, though not named by the historians, whose works have reached us. The kings of the Burgundians, as well as those of the other barbarians, did not think it below them to serve in the Roman armies, to discharge some of the chief offices of the empire, and to receive, at the hands of the emperors, such dignities as they used to confer on their subjects. Thus Gundiac was, in the reign of Anthemius, magister militiæ, or general of the Roman armies; and Gundebald his eldest son patrician. Chilperic, the brother of Gundebald, had been likewise magister militiæ, and was afterwards created patrician†. His son Sigismund, who succeeded him in the kingdom, received from Anastasius the same dignity of patrician, on which occasion he wrote to the emperor the following letter: My predecessors and I have been ever so attached to the Roman empire, as to think ourselves more honoured by the dignities the emperors have conferred on us, than by the titles which have been transmitted to us by our ancestors. We command at home, but think it a greater honour to serve abroad in your armies‡. The use of legal duels, or duels ordered by the magistrates or judges, to discover, from the event, the truth of contested facts, was first introduced into Gaul, where it long obtained, by the Burgundians. Gundebald was the first, who established by law this maxim, that the best champion is the best man, and ought to be believed; a maxim which has so often proved fatal a to innocence! This unjust and sanguinary law was couched in the following words: Being fully convinced, that many of our subjects suffer themselves to be corrupted by their avarice, or hurried on by their obstinacy, so as to attest by oath what they know not, nay, and what they know to be false; to put a stop to such scandalous practices, when two Burgundians are at law, if the defendant shall swear, that he owes not what is demanded of him, or that he is not guilty of the crime that is laid to his charge; and the plaintiff, on the other hand, not satisfied therewith, shall declare, that he is ready to maintain, sword in hand, the truth of what he advances; if the defendant does not acquiesce, it shall be lawful for them to decide the controversy by dint of sword. This is to be likewise understood of the witnesses of either party, it b being just, that every man should be ready to defend with his sword the truth which he attests, and to submit himself to the judgment of Heaven. If one of the plaintiff's witnesses shall be killed, all the others shall be condemned to pay immediately three hundred solidi. If the defendant is overcome, the plaintiff shall receive three times the sum which he demanded. It is our will and pleasure, that this law be strictly observed and executed, that our subjects may conceive an utter aversion to the detestable sin of perjury. Given at Lions the twenty-seventh of June, Avienus being consul, that is, in 501^a. This law was no sooner published, than Avitus, bishop of Vienne, wrote a letter to the king, remonstrating, with equal zeal and learning, the injustice of it; but could, by no means, prevail upon that prince to repeal it; c nay, however unjust and sanguinary, it prevailed, by degrees, among the Franks, and all the other nations dwelling in Gaul.

The Burgundians break in to Gaul; but are driven out by Probus. Year after Christ 275.

As to the history of the Burgundians, we find nothing worthy of notice concerning them till the year 275. the first of the emperor Tacitus's reign, when, in conjunction with the Lugians, the Franks, and the Vandals, they crossed the Rhine, over-ran all Gaul, and made themselves masters of seventy cities and upwards in that country, which they held for the space of almost two years^w. But in the mean time Tacitus being murdered, Probus, who was chosen in his room, marched against them, and, having gained a complete victory over the Burgundians and Vandals on the banks of the Rhine, obliged them to sue for peace; which was granted them, upon their promising to restore the booty, and set at liberty the prisoners they had taken. But, as they did not faithfully comply with this condition, Probus fell upon them in their retreat, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and took many prisoners, whom he afterwards sent into Britain, where they proved very serviceable to the Romans in all seditions and insurrections^x. In the year 287. the fourth of the emperor Dioclesian, they broke into Gaul anew with the Heruli, the Alemans, and the Chabions or Cavions, a people on no other occasion mentioned in history, and of whom all we know is, that their country, as well as that of the Heruli, lay at a great distance from Gaul^y.

They are defeated anew in Gaul by Maximian. Year after Christ 287.

We are told, that the Alemans and Burgundians were destroyed by their own numbers, which occasioned a famine, that was followed by a plague; so that they were easily overcome by Maximian, whom Dioclesian had taken for his partner in the empire, and dispatched against them. We are told, that, of such vast multitudes of barbarians, a very small number returned home, the rest being swept off by the plague, or cut in pieces by the Romans^z. For the advantages gained over the barbarians on this occasion, the two emperors were decreed a triumph, as appears from a medal of this year^a. Some years after, that is, in the year 291. a war broke out between the Burgundians and Alemans, in which the former seem to have gained considerable advantages over the latter; for we are told, that they reduced great part of their country, and that the Alemans were striving to recover what they had lost^b: and this is all we know of that war. In the year 370. the seventh of Valentinian I. the Burgundians appeared on the banks of the Rhine, to the number of eighty thousand fighting men, being invited thither by Valentinian, who maintained a private intelligence with their chiefs, and had promised to pass the Rhine, and, in conjunction with them, fall upon Macrian king of the Alemans, with whom they were then at variance. But the emperor, who was then busied in building forts on the Rhine, not caring to interrupt the work, and join them, as he had promised to do, they returned home, highly incensed against Valentinian, by whom they had f

- a been thus disappointed and deluded^c; but we do not find they committed any hostilities against the empire. In the year 407. they followed the Vandals, Sueves, and Alans, who had entered Gaul the last day of the preceding year, in order to share with them the spoils of those wealthy provinces; but they did not settle, it seems, in that country till the year 413. for in that year, Prosper tells us, they obtained that part of Gaul, which borders on the Rhine, that is, according to Bucherius, the present Alsace, and the remaining part of Germania Prima, which, in the opinion of that writer, were yielded to them by Honorius, not able, by any other means, to put a stop to their ravages^d. Such was the beginning of the kingdom of the Burgundians in Gaul. They continued quiet in the seats allotted them till the year 435. when, in conjunction with the Heruli, the Hunns, and the Franks, they entered Belgic Gaul, committing every-where dreadful ravages, though they had, upon their first settling in Gaul, promised to assist the Romans, and serve in their armies as subjects of the empire. Hereupon Aetius marched against them, and, having overcome them with great slaughter in a pitched battle, reduced them to such streights, that Gundicarius their king was obliged to sue for peace; which, in the end, he obtained, but did not long enjoy, being, in the beginning of the following year 436. attacked by the Hunns, perhaps at the instigation of Aetius, and cut off, with twenty thousand of his subjects^e. Socrates tells us, that the Hunns made frequent irruptions into their territories, putting all to fire and sword; that the Burgundians, no longer able to withstand them, had recourse to Heaven, and, repairing to a city in Gaul, embraced there the christian religion, and received the sacrament of baptism; which ceremony was no sooner over, than, full of courage and confidence, they marched against the enemy, and, finding them without a leader, (for we are told, that Uptar their king died suddenly the night before) cut ten thousand of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous flight, though the Burgundians were in all but three thousand men. Thus Socrates^f. But Orosius, who wrote in 417. assures us, that they had, at that time, already embraced the christian religion^g. They continued on the banks of the Rhine till the year 438. or, as others will have it, 443. when they were removed from thence by Aetius to the present duchy of Savoy. During their abode there, Gundiac, who succeeded Gundicar, and is thought to have been his son, joining Theodoric king of the Visigoths about the year 456. against the Sueves, marched with him into Spain, and signalized himself in the battle, that was fought that very year on the banks of the Orbegua, in which the Sueves were utterly defeated, and their king Recharius wounded, and afterwards taken prisoner^h. Gundiac, upon his return from Spain, seized on part of Gaul, dividing, according to an ancient chronologist, the lands with the Roman senatorsⁱ. Valesius is of opinion, that he made himself then master of the city of Lions^k. In 463. Gundiac wrote to Hilarius bishop of Rome concerning an affair of Dié in Dauphiny^l; whence we may conclude, that he was then in possession of that city. Some are of opinion, that both Dié and Vienne were yielded to him by the emperor Avitus, whose cause he had espoused^m. Others think, that Gundiac, taking advantage of the disturbances, that were occasioned by the deposition of Avitus, enlarged his dominions, and seized on the above-mentioned citiesⁿ. It is certain, that, in the war between the Romans and Visigoths about the year 470. the Burgundians, under the conduct of their king Gundiac, and his son Cbilperic, fought for the Romans; for we are told, that they defended the province of Auvergne against Euric king of the Visigoths, being jealous of the growing power of that prince^o. Besides, both Gundiac and Cbilperic were at that time magistri militie, and commanded the Roman troops^p; whence it is probable, that the Romans either yielded to them the above-mentioned countries, or suffered them to seize them, not caring to quarrel at the same time with the Visigoths and Burgundians. Before the year 490. the Burgundians were masters of all Lugdunensis Prima, which Sidonius styles Germanica Lugdunensis, saying, it was then subject to Cbilperic the son of Gundiac q. The same writer tells us elsewhere, that, when he left Lions, and retired to Auvergne, a Burgundian king resided in that city with his queen^r. Sidonius withdrew from Lions about the year 470. finding himself obnoxious to the Burgundians, who suspected him of privately favouring the Franks. Chilperic was likewise master of the country, in which stood the abby of St. Claudius^a, that is, of the country of the Sequani. When Sidonius died, Aprunculus, bishop of Langres, finding the Burgundians suspected him as if he maintained a private correspondence with the Franks, made his escape from the castle of Dijon, and withdrew to Auvergne^b. In 494. Epiphanus, bishop of Pavia, went to the court of Gundebald at Lions, and to that of Godigiseles at Geneva^c; so that the Burgundians were then masters of all these places. On the other hand, we do not find they made war upon the Romans; nay, on the contrary, they assisted them against the Visigoths, and are styled, by the writers of those times, the friends and allies of the empire. We may therefore conclude, that they thus enlarged their dominion with the consent, or at least with the connivance, of the emperors, willing to yield to them, or to wink at their seizing, part of the country, which they could not maintain without them. Chilperic, who is often mentioned by Sidonius, and styled by him a valorous prince^d, was not, as some have imagined, the brother, but the son, of Gundiac, and grandson of Gundicar; for Gundiac married the sister of the famous Ricimer, whom we have had frequent occasion to mention in our Roman history, and had by her Gundebald, Godigiseles, Chilperic, called also Hilperic, and Godemar^e. They divided, in all likelihood, among them the countries then subject to the Burgundians; for Chilperic is styled by Sidonius tetrarch^f, and by Jornandes king^g. Sidonius, speaking elsewhere of these four princes, calls them tirannopotes, intimating thereby, that they acted more like tyrants than kings. Father Sirmond tells us, that Chilperic and Godemar, joining against Gundebald, drove him out, and seized on his dominions; but that Gundebald, having in the end recovered his dominions, found means to dispatch his two brothers, with their issue male^h. But this is vouched only by the chronicle of Burgundy written by Vigner, to which we do not give intire credit. Gundebald was in Italy in 472. and there raised by the emperor Olybrius to the rank of patrician. However, he might have returned from thence to Gaul, and there caused his brother Chilperic to be put to death, and his wife to be drowned, as we read in *Gregory of Tours*ⁱ. Sidonius styles her a Tanaquil, either on account of her prudence, or because she had a great ascendant over her husband^j; for she is said to have tempered, with her address and engaging behaviour, the severity to which her husband was naturally inclined, and to have saved the lives of several persons unjustly accused^k. Chilperic left two daughters behind him, who were both banished by Gundebald, or rather kept under confinement in a castle at some distance from the court^l. Mucruna the eldest embraced the state of virginity; the other was Clotildes, who was married to Clovis king of the Franks, as we have related in the foregoing section. In the year 473. Gundebald was at Ravenna; for he is said to have induced Glycerius to take upon him the title of emperor in that city^m. After the deposition of Glycerius, Gundebald espoused the cause of Nepos, who was raised to the empire in his room, joining the Romans in Gaul against the Visigoths, who, under the conduct of Euric their king, attempted to make themselves masters of *Auvergne*ⁿ. In the year 480. Odoacer king of Italy having yielded Provence to the Visigoths, Gundebald, jealous of the growing power of that nation, claimed part of the country that had been granted them. This gave rise to a war between the two nations, in which the Burgundians were subdued, says Jornandes^o, by the Visigoths, who made themselves masters of all Gaul. But that writer was certainly mistaken, since the Burgundians were, in the year 517. and 528. still masters of above twenty-eight cities, and, among the rest, of Lions, Vienne, Besançon, and Embrun, as appears from the acts of the councils of Agde and Epaune held in those times^p. In the year 490. the Burgundians, under the conduct of Gundebald, entering Italy, with a design, as they pretended, to assist Odoacer against Theodoric the Ostrogoth, committed unheard-of ravages in Liguria, putting all to fire and sword, and carrying off with them, upon their return home, such numbers of captives, that, in most places, there were not left sufficient hands to till the ground. They met with no opposition, the Romans, who had always looked upon them as their friends and protectors, being no-ways upon their guard against them^q. Gundebald

a afterwards declared, that he had acted as an open enemy, to be revenged on the king of Italy, who had deceived him by a false alliance¹; but whether he meant Theodoric, or Odoacer, is uncertain. Authors observe, that, on this occasion, bishops began first to fortify their mansions, that, on any sudden irruption of barbarians, they might serve as places of refuge for those who dwelt in the country^m. About this time Gundebald sent one Laurentius, a person of great distinction among the Burgundians, with the character of ambassador to the emperor Anastasius at *Constantinople*ⁿ; but with what commission he was charged, we are no-where told. Two letters have reached us, both written in 497. the one by the emperor Anastasius to Clovis, intreating him to prevail upon Gundebald to allow one of Laurentius's sons to repair to his father at Constantinople; the other by Clovis to Gundebald, who readily complied with the emperor's request and his^o. In the history of the Franks, we have spoken of the war which Gundebald waged with Clovis, and his brother Godegisces, whom in the end he overcame, and put to death. Being restored to his dominions, he reigned, without disturbing his neighbours, or being disturbed by them, till his death, which happened in the year 516^p. Some years before his death, he was for renouncing privately the errors of Arius; but could, by no means, be prevailed upon, says Gregory of Tours, to acknowledge publicly the mystery of the holy trinity^q.

Gundebald was succeeded by his son Sigismund, who had no sooner taken possession of his father's dominions, than he dispatched ambassadors to the emperor Anastasius at Constantinople, acquainting him with his accession to the crown. In the letter he wrote on this occasion to the emperor, he styles his father one of Anastasius's most faithful subjects; and adds, that the nation, which he governed, had ever acknowledged Anastasius for their liege lord; that he himself deemed it a greater honour to obey his commands, than to be obeyed by a whole nation; that these sentiments were hereditary in his family; that his ancestors had ever had a heart truly Roman, thinking themselves more honoured by the titles, which the emperors had been pleased to confer upon them, than by those, however specious, which they had received by birth; that the country, which it was now his lot to govern, though lying at a great distance from the capital of the empire, was not, on that account, less subject to the imperial crown, than those that lay near it, &c. He closes the letter thus: The east is governed by your presence, the west under your auspices. By this letter therefore I offer my duty to the greatest of princes, and wait, with submission, your august commands^r. From this letter it is manifest, that the princes of the barbarians, who reigned in Gaul, acknowledged themselves subjects of the empire. Theodoric, king of Italy, refused a passage through his dominions to the ambassadors, who were dispatched with these letters. However, Anastasius wrote to Sigismund, without waiting till he received letters from him, confirming to him the dignities, which he had conferred upon him in his father's life-time, and adding to them the patriciate^s. Sigismund wrote a second letter to Anastasius, returning him thanks for the honours to which he had raised him, and acquainting him, that, upon his father's death, he had immediately written to him; but that his ambassadors had been stopped on their way to Constantinople. In this letter, as well as in the former, and in a third, which he wrote to the emperor Justin, he owns himself a subject of the empire, and uses all along the language of a subject to his sovereign. There was, without all doubt, at this time a misunderstanding between Theodoric and Sigismund, which however did not come to an open rupture. Sigismund, in the sixth year of his reign, caused his son Sigeric to be inhumanly murdered. Of this murder Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: Sigismund, says our historian, had to his first wife the daughter of Theodoric king of Italy, and by her a son named Sigeric. Upon the death of that princess, he married one of her household, who, looking upon Sigeric with the eyes of a step-mother, did all that lay in her power to incense his father against him. The young prince indeed, with his haughty and contemptuous behaviour, heightened the aversion, which the new queen bore him as a step mother; for the queen having one day appeared in the robes of his mother, he publicly upbraided her for presuming to shew herself in the apparel of one, whose menial servant she had been. This bitter reproach galled her to such a degree, that, transported with rage, she resolved at all events to make Sigeric pay dear for it. Accordingly, as she had a great ascendant over her husband, she persuaded him, that the young prince had formed a design of ^a assassinating him, and joining his dominions to those of his grandfather Theodoric. Sigismund gave intire credit to these false and malicious insinuations, and, without further inquiry, to be before hand with his son, caused him to be strangled, while he was reposing after dinner. He was scarce dead, when Sigismund, stung with the remorse of so heinous a crime, threw himself upon the dead body, and, bathing it in tears, called himself of all men the most unhappy; which one of his servants hearing, You have but too much reason, said he, to bewail your own fate; but as for your son, he died free from all guilt, and is now happy. Thus Gregory of Tours ^a. A few days after, Sigismund retired to the monastery of St. Mauritius in Valais, to do penance for the crime he had committed, and there founded what is called by our historian laus perennis, ^b that is, a service to be celebrated night and day without intermission, by several ecclesiastics relieving one another. After a short stay in the above-mentioned monastery, he returned to Lions, and there married a daughter, which he had by his first wife Ostrogotha, to king Theodoric or Tbierri, the eldest son of Clowis. As the Ostrogoths, and their king Theodoric, were highly provoked against Sigismund for the murder of his son, whom they looked upon as a prince of their own blood, lotbildis thought this a favourable conjuncture to be revenged on the posterity of Gundebald, since he was no more, for the death of her father Cbilperic, of her mother, and her brothers, all massacred by that prince's order. Having therefore first put the three kings, her children, Clodomire, Childebert, and Clotharius, in mind of the cruel and ^c inhuman treatment, which her father and mother had met with at the hands of Gundebald, she exhorted them not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of revenging it on his posterity. As this advice was intirely agreeable to the ambitious views of the young princes, they readily hearkened to it, and began to make the necessary preparations. They pressed Theodoric, whom their father Clowis had by a concubine, as we have related above, to join them in the enterprize; but, as he had married the daughter of Sigismund, and had not been any-ways injured either by him or his ancestors, he declared, that he would take no part in a war between his brothers and father-in-law, but observe a strict neutrality. The three princes therefore, finding ^d they could not prevail upon him to join them, took the field without him, and, entering the dominions of Sigismund, began to lay them waste. Hereupon Sigismund, having drawn together what troops he could, marched out against them; but, in the battle that ensued, he was utterly defeated, and obliged to take refuge in a monastery, where he lay some time concealed in the habit of a monk; but his own subjects, by whom he was abhorred, on account of the murder of his son, discovered him to the Franks, who immediately seized him, and delivered him to Clodomir, who had already in his power his wife and children. Clodomir sent both the prince, and his unfortunate family, to the city of Orleans, where they were kept under close confinement. Upon the news of his captivity, the far greater part of the country, which he held, submitted to the Franks ^e. This happened, according to the bishop of Avanches, in the year 523. In the consulship of Maximus, says that writer in his chronicle ^f, Sigismund was by the Burgundians delivered up to the Franks, who carried him away in the habit of a monk, in which they had found him, and afterwards threw him, with his wife and children, into a deep well, where they were all drowned. Maximus was consul, as appears from all the antient chronologers, in the above-mentioned year. What our chronologer relates of the unhappy end of Sigismund and his family, did not happen till the following year, when the Franks retiring to their own country, the Burgundians, who had submitted to them, revolting, proclaimed Godemar, the brother of Sigismund; and, in order to induce the Ostrogoths to assist them, at least under-hand, yielded to them four cities, viz. Carpentras, ^f Cavaillon, Tricastinum, now St. Paul-trois-chateaux, and Apt. No mention indeed is made of any succours sent them by the Ostrogoths. It is not however to be doubted, but that Theodoric, then king of that nation, and greatly alarmed at the growing power of the Franks, assisted them so far as he could, without openly declaring in their favour. News was no sooner brought to the three princes of the Franks, that Godemar had been proclaimed king of the Burgundians, and acknowledged even in those countries, which had submitted to them, than they resolved to take the field anew. But Clodomir, before he set out on his march, ordered Sigismund, with his

- a wife and children, to be put to death in the city of Orleans, in the manner we have related above, notwithstanding the remonstrances and threats of Avitus, abbot of Mici, a person highly esteemed and revered all over Gaul for the sanctity of his life. Gundebald had caused the father, mother, and brother, of Clothildis to be thrown into a well, as we have related above; and in the same manner, by way of retaliation, Clodomir ordered Sigismund to be dispatched, with his wife and children. Soon after, Clodomir led his troops against Godemar; and the two armies meeting at Veseronce in the territory of Vienne, not far from the city of Belley, a bloody battle ensued, in which the Burgundians, after a long and obstinate resistance, were in the end put to flight. But Clodomir, pursuing the enemy with more ardour than caution, was surrounded by them, and cut in pieces^a. The Burgundians, says Agathias, concluding from Clodomir's long hair, which covered his shoulders, that he was one of the kings of the Franks, struck off his head, and, carrying it upon the point of a spear, returned to the charge; but were repulsed by the Franks, and a second time put to the rout^a. However, the Franks being destitute of a leader, (for the children of Clodomir were yet very young) they readily concluded a peace with the Burgundians, whereof one of the articles was, that they should restore to Godemar all the countries they had seized during the war^b; which they did accordingly. Gregory of Tours writes, that Godemar, having raised a new army, pursued the war with great vigour, and in the end recovered the kingdom of his ancestors^c. According to the chronicle of the bishop of Avanches, the battle of Veseronce was fought the same year, in which Godemar had been proclaimed king, that is, in 524.

- THE peace concluded between the Franks and Burgundians lasted for the space of eight years, that is, till the year 532. when the two surviving brothers Cbildebert and Clotharius broke anew into the dominions of Godemar. What gave rise to this new war, we are not told; but, so far as we can conjecture from Procopius, they were prompted merely by their ambition, and that lust of conquests, which seems hereditary to the princes of that restless nation, to invade a kingdom, which, they were well apprised, they could easily reduce; for a few years after the conquest of Burgundy by the Franks, an ambassador from the emperor Justinian to the Ostrogoths, with whom the Franks were at that time negotiating an alliance, addressed them thus, as we read in Procopius: The Franks pique themselves upon standing faithfully to their engagements; but, to say nothing at present of the manner, in which they have observed the treaties concluded with the Thuringians and Burgundians, you cannot have forgot the little account they have ever made of the most solemn engagements they have, from time to time, entered into even with you^d. Of this war, which ended in the ruin of the kingdom of the Burgundians, Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: Cbildebert and Clotharius, having made the necessary preparations to invade the kingdom of Burgundy, solicited their brother Theodoric to join them in the enterprize; but he openly declared, that he would take no part in that war. This gave great offence to the Franks, who were subject to him; nay, they were displeased with his conduct to such a degree, that they openly threatened to revolt from him, and acknowledge the other two princes, if he did not assist them with all his forces, and look upon their cause as the common cause of the Franks. Theodoric, to quiet his mutinous subjects, told them, that, without him, his brothers were well able to cope with the king of the Burgundians; that however he would not fail to join them, if they should stand in need of his assistance; but that, in the mean time, he designed to lead them against the inhabitants of Auvergne, who, during the war he had lately made on the Thuringians, had given strong proofs of their disaffection to his person and government; that he designed to lay waste their country; and that those, who followed him thither, should have free quarters, and be at full liberty to plunder, and carry off what slaves, cattle, money, furniture, &c. they thought fit. The subjects of Theodoric, allured by these promises, gave over all thoughts of joining the other two princes in their expedition against the Burgundians. Cbildebert therefore and Clotharius, hoping to compass their design without the assistance of Theodoric, took the field, and, entering the territories of the Burgundians, laid siege to Augustodunum, now Autun, obliged Godemar to save himself by flight, and made themselves masters of his kingdom^e. Thus, in a few words, Gregory of Tours gives us an account of the reduction of the kingdom of the Burgundians, one of the most remarkable events in the history of the Franks. And Marius Aventiensis is no less ^a concise in relating the same events: In the consulship of Paulinus the younger, says that writer, Childebert, Clotharius, and Theodebert, kings of the Franks, reduced Burgundy, and, having put Godemar to flight, divided his kingdom among them^f. From this writer it appears, that the war lasted two years, that is, from 532. to 534. and that Theodoric dying in the mean time, his son Theodebert joined the other two princes. From other writers we learn, that, in this war, the Burgundians were assisted both by the Ostrogoths and Visigoths^g; that, in several encounters, the Franks were defeated by those two nations^h; but that, upon the death of Albalaric, the Ostrogoths having withdrawn their troops, the Burgundians were in the end obliged to submit to the conquerorsⁱ. Procopius tells us, that Godemar was taken prisoner by ^b the Franks, who kept him under close confinement in one of their castles; that, upon his captivity, the Burgundians agreed to serve the Franks in their wars, and to pay them a yearly tribute, with such taxes and customs, as they had paid to Godemar and his predecessors. One of the conditions, on which they submitted to the Franks, was, though not mentioned by Procopius, that they should live according to their own laws; which they actually did to the reign of Lewis surnamed the Debonnair, as we shall relate in a more proper place. Thus the Franks, prompted by their boundless ambition, extended their dominions, at the expence of their neighbours, till they became masters of all Gaul.

THE Alemans, a nation, which, in process of time, became so famous in history, ^a made their first appearance about the year 214. the fourth of the emperor Caracalla's reign¹. Agathias, upon the authority of Asinius Quadratus, a Roman historian, who wrote in the reign of the emperor Philip, about the year 247. tells us, that the Alemans were originally a motley multitude, consisting of several nations, as appears, adds that writer, from their very name^m; so that, according to Asinius Quadratus, the Alemans were so called, because they consisted of all men, that is, of men of all nations. Some German writers, displeased with this etymology, derive the name of Alemans from the word Atelman, signifying a *man of distinction*ⁿ. But the other derivation is both more natural, and better grounded. The Alemans, according to the most common opinion, consisted chiefly of Sueves, who, in process ^d of time, were joined by several other German nations, and some Gauls; for we are told by Tacitus, that a considerable number of Gauls, abandoning their own country, went to settle beyond the Rhine, in the country which had formerly belonged to the Sueves^o. The Alemans are placed by Aurelius Victor, St. Jerom ^p, and other writers, between the Danube, the Upper Rhine, and the Mein, that is, in the present duchy of Wirttemberg. They were a numerous and warlike nation, and are chiefly commended for fighting with great skill and dexterity on horseback^q. They had such an aversion to slavery, that even their women, some of whom were taken prisoners by Caracalla, chose rather to die, than to be sold for slaves. Caracalla however ordered them to be sold; but, preferring death to slavery, they laid violent hands on them- ^e selves, some of them having first dispatched their children^r. Their government was monarchical; for we find several of their kings mentioned in history, of whom we shall have occasion to speak anon. As to their religion, they worshipped the same deities as the other German nations. We shall now acquaint the reader with what we have been able to gather from the antients concerning this nation. In the year 214. Caracalla is said to have made war upon the Cenni, or, as some read it, the Chatti, the Alemans, and other German nations. The Alemans, it seems, had joined the Chatti or Catti; and Caracalla, under pretence of succouring another nation, with whom they were at variance, made war upon them, and is said to have defeated the Alemans on the banks of the Mein^s. He afterwards concluded a peace with them, ^f

- a distributed large sums among them, lifted great numbers of them in his army, and even among his guards, chusing rather to trust his life to them, than to the Romans. Aurelius Victor adds, that he often appeared in the dress peculiar to those barbarians, wearing false hair of the same colour with theirs^a. For the victory he gained over the Alemans, he took the surname of Alemannicus^w. In the year 234. the thirteenth of the emperor Severus Alexander, the Alemans, and other German nations, having passed the Rhine, made themselves masters of the forts built on the banks of that river, and, entering Gaul, committed dreadful ravages there. Alexander, who was just then returned from Persia, where he had gained great advantages over Artaxerxes the Persian king, upon the news of this irruption, hastened into Gaul, and advanced,
- b without loss of time, to the banks of the Rhine. But the enemy having repassed that river upon the news of his approach, he ordered a bridge to be laid over it, with a design to attack them in their own country, as soon as the season would allow him to take the field. But he being in the mean time assassinated by the mutinous soldiery, Maximinus, who had stirred them up, and was chosen in his room, entered Germany early in the spring, at the head of a mighty army, ravaged the country far and wide, burnt the enemy's habitations, carried off their corn and cattle, and took an incredible number of prisoners. We are told, that several battles were fought in the woods and marshes, in each of which the emperor killed many of the enemy with his own hand^x. For the signal advantages he gained in this expedition over the
- c Alemans, and other German nations, the senate decreed both to him and his son the title of Germanicus, which is still to be seen on several of his medals^y. The Alemans continued quiet from this time to the year 256. the fourth of Valerian's reign, when, breaking unexpectedly into Gaul, they laid waste that country, while the Jutbongians, that is, the Alemans who dwelt on the banks of the Danube, made an irruption into Italy. In Gaul they were defeated, and obliged to repass the Rhine, by Posthumius, governor of those provinces. In Italy they advanced as far as Milan, destroying all with fire and sword; but their numerous army, consisting of three hundred thousand men, was defeated in the neighbourhood of that city, if Zonaras is to be credited, by Gallienus, with a body only of ten thousand men^z. But of this victory
- d no mention is made either by Pollio or Vopiscus; and Zosimus writes, that the Alemans, and other barbarous nations, having ravaged Illyricum, and great part of Italy, returned home, without meeting with the least opposition^a. Eutropius^b, St. Jerom^c, and Orosius^d, suppose the Alemans to have first ravaged Gaul, and from thence passing through Rætia, to have entered Italy. We find no further mention made of them till the year 268. the first of the emperor Claudius, when the Jutbongians, breaking into Italy, advanced without opposition as far as the lake Benacus, now Lago di Garda near Verona. Claudius had no sooner suppressed the rebellion of Aureolus, who had assumed the purple, than he marched against them, defeated them in a pitched battle, and, having cut great numbers of them in pieces, obliged the rest to quit their booty, and save themselves by a precipitous flight into their own country^e. This victory was not known, it seems, to Pollio, since he does not mention it; but it is confirmed by several medals, on which the title of Germanicus is given to Claudius, before that of Gothicus, which he took the year after, that is, in 269^f. Notwithstanding this overthrow, they no sooner heard of the death of Claudius, than joining the Marcomans, they resolved to invade Italy anew. But Aurelian, who succeeded Claudius, having timely notice of their march, left Pannonia, where he then was, and meeting them with the flower of his army in Vindelicia, which comprehended all the present Bavaria, and a great part of Swabia, gave them a total overthrow, and, pursuing them close, cut off great numbers of them, as they attempted to pass the Danube. Hereupon they sent ambassadors to the emperor, offering to renew their antient alliance with the empire, provided they were allowed to return unmolested to their own country; for Aurelian had cut off their retreat, and detached part of his army to guard the banks of the Danube. But the emperor refusing to hearken to any terms, the Alemans, by this means reduced to despair, after various debates and consultations, resolved at length to enter Italy, since they could not return to their own country; and accordingly, finding the passes unguarded (for the emperor thought only of cutting off their retreat) they advanced as far as Placentia before Aurelian could come up with them; committing every where unheard-of ravages. As the emperor drew near, they concealed themselves in the neighbouring woods; whence falling out upon him in the night, they gained a complete victory; which threw all Italy, and Rome itself, into the utmost consternation: The books of the Sibyls were consulted on this occasion by the emperor's orders, and several ceremonies performed to avert the impending storm, which, they apprehended, might be attended with the total ruin of the empire: But in the mean time Aurelian, having received strong reinforcements from Illyrium, came unexpectedly upon the enemy in the neighbourhood of Fanum Fortuna, now Pano, and gave them a dreadful overthrow: Such of them as escaped from this first battle were slain in two others, one of which was fought in the neighbourhood of Placentia, and the other in the plains of Ticinum, or Pavia. Thus was the whole multitude cut off to a man. About four years after, the Alemans, who dwelt near the Rhine, made an irruption into Gaul; but were forced by Probus, who was afterwards emperor, and then commanded in those parts, to repass that river, and return home. They continued afterwards quiet, without molesting either their neighbours or the Romans, for the space of eleven years, that is, till the year 285. the third of Dioclesian's reign; when they attempted, it seems, to break into the empire; for Dioclesian is said to have made war upon them, and to have gained some advantages over them. In 287. they broke into Gaul anew, with the Burgundians, Heruli, Cavians, and several other barbarous nations; but were most of them cut off by Maximian, or destroyed by famine. For the great advantages gained over them by Maximian, a triumph was decreed by the senate both to him and Dioclesian, as appears from a medal of this very year 287. The following year Maximian passed the Rhine at the head of a numerous army, and, entering the country of the Alemans, laid it waste far and near, destroying all with fire and sword. He took in this expedition an incredible number of captives, and reduced, if Mamertin his panegyrist is to be credited, great part of Germany. At the same time Dioclesian entered Germany through Rætia, and is said to have extended the confines of the empire to the source of the Danube. In the year 291. the Burgundians seized on part of the country belonging to the Alemans, which gave rise to a war between those two nations; but as to the issue of this war, we are quite in the dark. In the year 301. Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, gained a signal victory over the Alemans, who, breaking into Gaul with a numerous army, came upon him unexpectedly, while he had but a small body of troops with him; which obliged him at first to retire, and shelter himself within the walls of Langres. But his army arriving a few hours after he had entered that city, he marched out at the head of the detachment he had with him, joined his other forces, and, engaging the enemy, gained a complete victory. In this battle the Alemans lost sixty thousand men, as appears from Eutropius 9, St. Jerom 1, Orosius 1, and even from Zonaras 1, and not six thousand only, as we read it in the Greek text of Eusebius. The Alemans, disheartened with so great a loss, did not offer to disturb the peace of the empire during the remaining part of the reign of Constantius. But, in the first of his son Constantine, that is, in 306. they began anew to make inroads into Gaul; which provoked that prince to such a degree, that, having taken some of their kings prisoners, he exposed them to be devoured by the wild beasts in the magnificent shews which he exhibited. However, a few years after, that is, in 310. the Alemans, in conjunction with the Bructerians, Cherusians, and Chamavians, having crossed the Rhine, laid waste the neighbouring provinces; but Constantine, marching against them, overcame them in a pitched battle, and obliged them to quit their booty, and repass the Rhine. For this victory he is supposed to have taken the title of Maximus, which we find on his coins of this year. From this time no mention is made of the Alemans till the year 355. the eighteenth of Constantius's reign, when they attempted to break into Italy; which obliged the emperor to march against them: but as he drew near the enemy, who were advanced as far as the lake of Constance, he detached Arbetio with the flower of the army against them. Arbetio,

- a falling into an ambuscade, was defeated with great loss. But some of the officers, who commanded under him, engaging the enemy a few days after, without his orders, put the Alemanni to flight; and Constantius, satisfied with this small advantage, returned to Milan. The same year, another body of Alemanni, breaking into Gaul, with the Franks and Saxons, took and plundered above forty towns on the banks of the Rhine, and, among the rest, the city of Cologne, which they almost intirely ruined. Hereupon Constantius, unwilling to leave Italy, and march against the barbarians in person, raised Julian to the dignity of Cæsar, and sent him to head the Roman forces in Gaul. Julian, soon after his arrival, led what forces he had against the Alemanni, who had advanced as far as Lyon, with a design to surprise that city; but the enemy retiring upon his approach, he waited for them in the passes, through which they were to return to their own country, and there cut most of them in pieces. Only a small number, who took their rout through the present Switzerland, had the good luck to make their escape, being suffered to pass unmolested by Barbatio, another Roman general, who was encamped at Basle, and is supposed to have had private orders from Constantius to thwart all the designs of Julian. Be that as it will, Julian, having thus driven the Alemanni out of Gaul, undertook the rebuilding of the Tres Tabernæ, a fort near Argentoratum, now Strasbourg, known at present by the name of Saverne, which the enemy had demolished. As it was so situated as to curb the nations beyond the Rhine, and prevent their irruptions into Gaul, Julian not only repaired the ancient fortifications, but added new works to them, stored them with provisions for a whole year, and left a numerous garrison in the place, to keep the neighbouring country in awe. In the mean time a large body of Alemanni, falling upon Barbatio while he was busied in laying a bridge of boats over the Rhine, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, took most of his baggage, laid waste the neighbouring country, and returned home loaded with booty. Elated with this victory, they assembled in great numbers under the banners of Chnodomarius, and six other kings, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Strasbourg. Being informed there by a deserter, that Julian's army was only thirteen thousand strong, Chnodomarius had the arrogance to send a messenger to him, commanding him to quit a country, which the Alemanni had acquired by their courage and valour. Libanius adds, that the messenger produced letters from Constantius, in which he yielded to them that country. Julian however, paying no regard to them, detained the messenger as a spy, and pushed the works he had begun at Saverne, till he received intelligence, that the enemy, having passed the Rhine, were advanced within twenty miles of his camp. Hereupon, interrupting the work, he marched directly against them, and engaging the same day, though his men were tired with their long march, gained a complete victory over them. They were thirty-five thousand strong, headed by seven kings, ten princes, and several other persons of great distinction. The victory continued long doubtful; the Roman cavalry even gave way, nor could Julian, with all his oratory, prevail upon them to return to the charge; but the vigorous resistance made by the foot so disheartened the barbarians, that, despairing to be able to break them, they began to abate much of their impetuosity; which the Romans perceiving, made a last effort, and charging the barbarians, already quite spent, put them in the end to flight, and pursued them with great slaughter. Vast numbers of them were drowned in the Rhine, in attempting to cross that river. Chnodomarius himself was taken prisoner, and presented to Julian, who sent him to Constantius, by whose orders he was conveyed to Rome, where he died soon after a natural death. In this battle Julian lost only four tribunes, and two hundred and forty-three private men.
- f Of the Alemanni six, or, as some write, eight thousand men were killed in the field; but a great many dead bodies were seen floating on the river. Zosimus writes, that sixty thousand of the enemy were killed upon the spot, and an equal number drowned; but he must certainly have been mistaken. Julian himself styles the battle of Strasbourg a successful action, which restored Gaul to its ancient liberty. Mamertinus says, that, by this single battle, the war was ended, and Germany ruined. It is at least certain, that the barbarians were intirely driven out of Gaul. Julian, from the field of battle, returned to Saverne, and, having finished the works there, advanced with his whole army to Mayence, where he built a bridge over the river, and, entering a Germany, continued ravaging the countries of the Alemans, and their allies, till after the equinox, when the snow preventing him from advancing farther, he returned to Gaul, after having repaired the castle of Trajan, which stood at a small distance from the present city of Frankfort, and granted to the Alemans, and their allies, a truce for ten months, upon their promising to store with provisions the fort that was building in their country^b. The truce no sooner expired, than Julian, passing the Rhine on a bridge of boats, entered anew the country of the Alemans, and obliged two of their kings, Suomarius and Hortarius, to sue for peace; which he granted them, upon their sending back all the Roman captives, and furnishing timber, iron, and other materials, to repair the cities which they had ruined^c. We are told by Zosimus; ^b that, in this expedition, Julian got two thousand Romans set at liberty^k.

the Alemans to

THE following year 359. Julian, passing unexpectedly the Rhine, advanced to the most distant borders of the Alemans and Burgundians, destroying all with fire and sword. Hereupon two of the kings of the Alemans, Macrianus and Hariobaldus, dispatched ambassadors to him, suing for peace. At the same time Vadomarius king of the Alemans, whose country lay towards Basle, came in person to wait on Julian, who, at his earnest request, restored to him his son, whom he had given as an hostage; but at the same time he declared, that he would treat him as an enemy; if he did not set at liberty the Romans, whom, to the number of three thousand, he kept in captivity. As Vadomarius put off from time to time the sending back the captives, ^c Julian, leaving Spire, where he then was, marched directly to Basle, and, arriving unexpectedly in the neighbourhood of that city, struck Vadomarius and his people with such terror, that the captives were immediately set at liberty. Hereupon Julian received the king of the Alemans as his friend and ally, ordering his men to forbear all hostilities^l. We are told, that the emperor himself wrote to Julian in favour of Vadomarius, being induced thereunto by some Alemans, who were in great employments at court, viz. by Latinus, at that time comes domesticorum; by Agilo the tribunus stabuli, or master of the horse; and by Agilo, who had a chief command in the army^m. Soon after, three other kings of the Alemans, viz. Urias, Ursicinus, and Vestralphus, sent deputies suing for peace; which Julian granted them, upon their ^d setting at liberty the Roman captivesⁿ. Julian, having thus concluded a peace with the princes of the Alemans, left Germany, and, putting his troops into winter-quarters, as the season was already far advanced, retired himself to Paris^o. Two years after, that is, in 361. the Alemans, those chiefly who were subject to Vadomarius, broke anew into Gaul on the side of Rhetia, and committed dreadful ravages there. Vadomarius pretended to be much concerned for the hostilities committed by his countrymen, and to have the greatest respect imaginable for Julian. But in the mean time he wrote a letter to the emperor Constantius, filled with bitter invectives against him. Julian, having intercepted the letter, found means to have him arrested at a banquet, and banished him into Spain^p. He had already sent Ibano, one of his ^e generals, with a strong detachment against the Alemans; but he being killed, and his men put to the rout near Sanctio, thought to be the present Seckingen, in the neighbourhood of Basle, Julian advanced in person against them, passed the Rhine, and, coming upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to restore the booty they had taken, and sue for peace; which he granted them upon his own terms^q.

THE Alemans continued quiet the remaining part of Julian's reign; but they no sooner heard of his death, than they renewed their ravages in Rhetia and Gaul. Hereupon Valentinian I. then emperor, dispatched Dagalaiphus, one of his best generals, against them, and, leaving Italy, hastened in person into Gaul, in order to make head against the numerous forces, which the Alemans, and other barbarous nations, were said to be raising with a design to invade Gaul. The emperor advanced as far as Rheims; but the Alemans retiring at his approach, he returned back, and took up his winter-quarters at Paris^r. In the mean time the Alemans having, in the depth of winter, passed the Rhine on the ice, defeated in a pitched battle the Romans, who attempted to oppose them, took the standards of the Batavians and Heruli,

- a killed count Charietto, who commanded in both Germanies, and wounded count Severianus, who had the command of a body of troops *. Zosimus supposes Valentinian himself to have been present at this battle. But it is plain from Ammianus, that he was then at Paris; whence, upon the first news of the defeat of his troops, he dispatched Dagalaiphus, to prevent the evil consequences, that were likely to attend the late overthrow. Dagalaiphus, pretending he had not sufficient strength to engage the enemy, who were roving about the country in several great bodies, did not so much as offer to restrain them. Hereupon he was recalled, and Jovinus, general of the horse, sent in his room, who defeated the Alemans in three battles, whereof the first was fought at a place called Scarponna, now Charpeigne, between Toul and Metz; the second in the neighbourhood of the Moselle; and the third near Chalons on the Marne. In the last of these three engagements, the enemy fought with great resolution and intrepidity, and the Romans were once in great danger of being utterly defeated, the sudden flight of a tribune having disanimated the troops under his command. However, Jovinus, inspiring them with fresh courage, led them on to the charge, while they were ready to turn their backs; and, pressing with great resolution and intrepidity upon the enemy, obliged them to give ground, and in the end to betake themselves to a precipitous flight. On the enemy's side, six thousand were killed on the spot, and four thousand wounded; and of the Romans only two hundred killed, and as many wounded †. The enemy withdrew in the night-time; but were intercepted in their retreat by several parties sent out by Jovinus for that purpose; infomuch that few of them had the good luck to make their escape. One of their kings was taken prisoner, and immediately hanged by those who took him; which base action provoked Jovinus to such a degree, that he would have punished with death the tribune who commanded the party, had he not found, upon a strict inquiry, that he had done all that lay in his power to restrain the fury of the incensed soldiery *. Of this victory Idatius must, without all doubt, be understood, where he writes, that the Alemans were utterly defeated by Valentinian *. In the close of the following year 367. the Alemans, notwithstanding the loss they had sustained the year before, passed unexpectedly the Rhine, and, having taken and plundered the city of Mentz, while the emperor was employed, says Ammianus, in some other expedition, committed dreadful ravages in the neighbouring provinces, under the conduct of Rhando, one of their princes. The Romans, to be revenged on the Alemans, had recourse to treachery, and caused Vitricabius, a prince of the same nation, to be assassinated by one of his own people, whom they had gained over by their emissaries. Vitricabius was the son of Vadomarius, and a prince of great address, intrepidity, and resolution †. Valentinian, having spent the following winter at Treves in making vast preparations, with a design to attack the Alemans in their own country, took the field on the seventeenth of June, and, having assembled all his troops, crossed the Rhine, entered the enemy's country, and advanced, without the least opposition, to a place called Solicinium, which the modern geographers take to be the city of Sultz on the Neckar. The Alemans had posted themselves there on a high and steep mountain; but the Romans, notwithstanding their advantageous situation, attacked them with great intrepidity, and, tho' several times repulsed, dislodged them in the end, and pursued them with great slaughter. Some of the enemy made their escape by favour of the night; but the far greater part were put to the sword, their retreat being cut off by count Sebastian, at the head of a strong detachment. After this battle, which was fought at a small distance from the head of the Neckar, in the present duchy of Wirtemberg, the emperor returned to Treves, as the season was already far advanced, and there gave audience to the ambassadors of the Alemans suing for peace; which, it seems, he granted them †, but, upon what terms, we are not told. This peace however was not long-lived; for two years after, that is, in 370. there appeared on the banks of the Rhine eighty thousand Burgundians, whom Valentinian had invited to join him against Macrianus king of the Alemans. But the emperor being then busied in fortifying the banks of the Rhine, and unwilling to interrupt that work, the Burgundians returned home, without offering to molest the Alemans. However, Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name, taking advantage of the consternation the Alemans were in, made an irruption into their country, and returned with a considerable number of prisoners, to whom the emperor allowed lands and settlements on the banks of the Po^a. The following year Valentinian broke unexpectedly into the country of the Alemans, hoping to surprize Macrianus their king, whom he chiefly dreaded; but Macrianus, having received timely notice of his approach, saved himself by flight; and the emperor returned to Treves, after having laid waste the country round Mentz belonging to the Alemans called Bucinobantes, to whom he gave one of their own nation, named Fraomarius, for king. But the country being intirely ruined, Fraomarius was glad to quit his new dignity for the command of a body of his countrymen then quartered in Britain^a. The following year, Valentinian, passing the Rhine in the beginning of the summer, committed some ravages in the country of the Alemans, and undertook the building of a fort in the neighbourhood of Basle, to serve as a curb upon the Alemans on that side. But in the mean time the Sarmatians and Quadians having broken into Pannonia, and cut in pieces two Roman legions there, the emperor resolved to march against them in person. As he could not leave Gaul without concluding a peace with the Alemans, who, he was well apprised, would not fail to break into those provinces upon his departure, he invited Macrianus to an interview in the neighbourhood of Mentz. The king of the Alemans readily complied with the invitation; and though at first he betrayed a great deal of haughtiness in seeing his friendship thus courted by the Roman emperor, yet, in the end, he accepted the advantageous terms that were offered him, and ever after continued a faithful friend to the Romans^b. Some years after, a war being kindled between the Alemans and Franks, Macrianus, having invaded the enemy's country, was killed in an ambuscade by Mellobaudes, a warlike prince of that nation.

In the year 378. the Goths, who had been admitted by Valens into the empire, having revolted, and defeated several Roman armies sent against them, Gratian, alarmed at the danger that threatened the eastern provinces, resolved to march in person to the assistance of his uncle, as soon as the season would permit; and in the mean time ordered part of his forces to set out on their march from Gaul, where he then was, to Illyricum. Of this notice being immediately given to the Alemans, called Lentienses, by a countryman of theirs, who was in some employment at the court of Gratian, without the least regard to the treaty they had concluded with Valentinian, they passed the Rhine, and began to lay waste the neighbouring provinces. They were repulsed at first by the Roman troops quartered in those parts; but returning soon after, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, Gratian was obliged to recal the troops that were already on their march into Illyricum, and to send them, reinforced with those that were left in Gaul, under the conduct of count Nannianus, and Mellobaudes king of the Franks, to oppose the attempts of the enemy, and to oblige them to repass the Rhine. The two generals gave them battle at a place called Argentaria, now, as is commonly believed, Colmar, and, tho' greatly inferior in number, gained a complete victory, thirty thousand of the enemy being killed on the spot, and the rest either slain in the pursuit, or taken prisoners. Their king Triarius, and several other persons of great distinction, were in the number of the dead^d. After this victory, Gratian passed the Rhine at the head of his army, and, entering the enemy's country, obliged them to take refuge among their barren mountains, where he kept them shut up, till they were forced by famine to submit to such terms as the conqueror thought fit to impose upon them, one of which was, that they should deliver up their youth to serve in the Roman army; which they did accordingly^e. Of the Alemans no further mention is made in history till the year 388. when we are told by Orosius^f, that, dreading the arms of Maximus, who had usurped the empire in Gaul, they submitted to him of their own accord, paying him a yearly tribute, and supplying his army with such quantities of corn and other provisions, as he thought fit to demand. In the reign of Honorius, which began in 395. a colony of the Alemans was allowed to settle in that part of the present Switzerland, which is separated by mount Jura from the Franche Comté, and by the lake of Geneva and the Rhône from the present Savoy and province of Vienne^g. Servius, who wrote his comment upon Virgil about the year 411. tells us, that, in his time, the country bordering on the lake Lemanus, or lake of Geneva, was inhabited by the Alemans^h. We find no farther mention made of the Alemans till the year 477. when Audoacrius king

- a of the Saxons, and Cbilderic king of the Franks, marching against those of that nation who had settled among the Alps, and made frequent inroads both into Gaul and Italy, put great numbers of them to the sword, and stripped them of the booty, which they had a little before brought with them from *Italy*¹. Upon the downfall of the western empire, the Alemans made themselves masters of that part of Gaul, which is now known by the name of Alsace, and settled there². These Alemans, being joined by their countrymen in Germany, and those who dwelt between mount Jura and the lake of Geneva, in the year 496. entered Germania Secunda, which then belonged to the Ripuarian Franks, putting all to fire and sword. Hereupon Sigibert, king of the country, not able to make head against them with his own forces alone,
- b had recourse to Clovis king of the Salian Franks; who immediately joined him. The two kings, after their conjunction, engaged the Alemans, and gained a complete victory over them at Tolbiac, thought to be the present Zulpick, about four leagues from Cologne. After this defeat, such of the Alemans as had settled in Alsace, and in the neighbourhood of the lake of Geneva, acknowledged Clovis for their king. Others took refuge in Rætia and Noricum, being allowed to settle there by Theodoric king of Italy, as we have related above³. The same prince transplanted great numbers of them into Italy, and suffered the rest to settle in the countries between the Alps and the Danube, which were subject to him. From this time the Alemans had no king of their own (for their last king was killed in the above-mentioned battle); but continued, as they were dispersed in several countries, subject partly to the Ostrogoths, who were masters of Italy, and partly to the Franks, who were lords of Gaul. When the Ostrogoths yielded to the children of Clovis whatever they held out of Italy, all the Alemans, except those whom Theodoric had transplanted into that country, submitted to the Franks, as we shall relate in our history of the modern nations.

The Gepidæ.

- d THE Gepidæ were, without all doubt, a Gothic nation. Jornandes, speaking of them, gives us the following account of their name and origin: The Goths, says that writer, leaving Scandinavia under the conduct of king Berith, put to sea with three ships only. One of these, sailing slower than the other two, was thence called Gepanta, signifying in the Gothic tongue slow; and hence the name of Gepantæ and Gepidæ, which was first given to that people by way of reproach^m. Procopius likewise tells us in express terms, that the Goths, the Vandals, the Visigoths, and the Gepidæ, were originally one and the same nation; that they had the same customs, manners, religion, and language; and that they only differed in names, borrowed perhaps, says he, from their different leadersⁿ: and Paulus Diaconus; The Goths, the Gepidæ,
- e the Vandals, says he, agree in language, manners, and religion, and differ only in name^o. They entered Scythia, according to Jornandes, with the other Goths, and settled in the neighbourhood of the Tanais, and Palus Meotis p. There they continued till the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, when their numbers being greatly increased, they approached the Danube, and, having some time after crossed that river, they settled in the neighbourhood of Singidunum and Sirmium, about the year 400. where they still were when Procopius wrote his history q. They had kings of their own, and formed a separate and distinct nation both from the Ostrogoths and Visigoths; but perhaps not from the Lombards, who were afterwards masters of Italy^r. As for what we find of them in the antient writers, Jornandes tells us, that, under the conduct of their king Fastida, they gained a complete victory over the Burgundians about the year 245^s. The Burgundians whom they overcame, and almost utterly extirpated, were, according to Valesius, as we have observed above, a different nation from the Burgundians who afterwards settled in Gaul. Be that as it will, Fastida, elated with his success against the Burgundians, dispatched a messenger to Ostrogotha king of the Goths, acquainting him, that as the Gepidæ were greatly streightened for want of room, he must either grant them lands, or prepare for war. Ostrogotha answered, a That he should be very unwilling to make war upon his kinsmen; but was determined to part with no land. Hereupon Fasida, entering the territories of the Goths, began to lay them waste; which Ostrogotha no sooner understood, than, leaving Mæsia, which he was then ravaging, he hastened back to the defence of his own country, and, meeting Fasida, gave him a total overthrow; but, contenting himself with the victory, did not so much as pursue the flying Gepidæ, looking upon them rather as his kinsmen, than an enemy^c. The Gepidæ joined the Goths, and other northern nations, in the famous irruption which they made with their united forces into the empire in 269. the second of the reign of Claudius; but they were defeated by that prince with great slaughter, as we have related at length elsewhere^a. In the year 279. the emperor Probus granted to them, and likewise to the Juthungians, Vandals, and Franks, lands in Thrace, upon their promising to live as the other subjects of the empire. But while the emperor was engaged in war with Saturninus, who had revolted in the east, they laid hold of that opportunity to ravage the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Probus, having successfully ended his other wars, marched against them in person, and, in several encounters, cut such numbers of them in pieces, that only a small body of Franks had the good luck to escape the general slaughter, and return home^w. In 291. a war broke out between them and the Goths, in which the Gepidæ were assisted by the Vandals; and the Goths by the Taisalæ, another Gothic nation. But all we know of this war is, that both parties were greatly weakened, and put out of a condition of disturbing, for some years, the peace of the empire^e. The Gepidæ are mentioned by St. Jerom among the other nations of barbarians, that in 407. broke into Gaul, and over-ran those provinces^v. They were afterwards subdued, with the other northern nations, by Attila, and in 451. served under him in his famous expedition into Gaul; on which occasion the Franks and they meeting in the dark, both parties engaged with such fury, that above fifteen thousand were left dead on the spot^z. Upon the death of Attila, the Gepidæ shook off the yoke under the conduct of their king Ardaric; which occasioned a bloody war between them and the Hunns. But at length Ardaric having gained a complete victory over the Hunns, of whom thirty thousand were killed on the spot, with their king Ellac, the Gepidæ not only recovered their ancient liberty, but the country whence they had been driven by Attila, that is, all ancient Dacia, lying north of the Danube^x. This memorable battle, which, in a manner, put an end to the empire of the Hunns, was fought on the banks of the Netad in Pannonia, about the year 480^b. The Gepidæ, thus settled in Dacia, entered into an alliance with the Romans, who agreed to pay them an annual pension. Dacia beyond the Danube was thenceforth called, from its new inhabitants, Gepidia, as we read in Jornandes^c. Some years after, part of Illyricum was likewise granted them, with the city of Sirmium; whence their kings are by Theophanes styled kings of Sirmium^d. There they continued quiet till the year 537. when, joining the Heruli, they began to plunder the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Justinian, then emperor, having ended the war in Italy with the Goths, dispatched his best generals against them, who, having overcome them in several encounters, obliged them to abandon what they held in Illyricum, and content themselves with North Dacia, or Dacia beyond the Danube^e. In the year 550. a contest arose between the Gepidæ, and the Lombards descended from them, says Paulus Diaconus^f, about their confines; for the Lombards held part of Dacia beyond the Danube, having been allowed to settle there by the Roman emperors, who indeed had abandoned that province, but claimed a right of disposing of it to whom they pleased. Both the Gepidæ and Lombards, before they came to an open rupture, dispatched ambassadors to Justinian, soliciting succours, in virtue of their alliance with the empire. The emperor, after hearing the ambassadors of both nations, declared, that, in case of a war, he was determined not to suffer the Lombards to be oppressed by their encroaching neighbours, ordering at the same time ten thousand horse, and fifteen hundred foot, to march to their assistance, under the command of Constantianus, Buzes, Aratius, and other generals; which the Gepidæ no sooner

- a understood, than they concluded a peace with the Lombards. But the Roman troops were scarce returned home, when the Gepidæ, refusing to stand to the articles of the treaty, took the field anew, under the conduct of their king Tborisfinus. Auduinus, then king of the Lombards, having drawn together what troops he could, went out to meet the enemy; but both armies, seized with a panic while they were ready to engage, betook themselves at the same time to a precipitous flight; which both kings looking upon as a prodigy, they concluded a two years truce; which was no sooner expired, than the Gepidæ, calling in the Heruli to their assistance, broke unexpectedly into the territories of the Lombards, destroying all with fire and sword. But the Lombards, receiving a timely reinforcement from Justinian, fell upon the Gepidæ, and gave them a total overthrow¹. We are told, that Justinian had promised to observe a strict neutrality in this war; and that his promise was confirmed by the oath of twelve senators: but nevertheless, as the Gepidæ had not kept their word with him, he did not think himself bound, either by his own promise, or the oaths of the senators, who had sworn in his name². This defeat was followed by a peace between the two nations, which was concluded by the mediation of Justinian, unwilling that either should aggrandize themselves at the expence of the other. Tborisfinus was at this time king of the Gepidæ, and Auduinus of the Lombards; but neither had any right to the crown he wore. The lawful heir to Elemund the late king of the Gepidæ was Ustrogotbus, that prince's only son; but Elemund dying while he was yet under age, Tborisfinus had caused himself to be acknowledged in his room. In the same manner Auduinus, king of the Lombards, had excluded Ildigesal the lawful heir from the crown, and placed it upon his own head. The above-mentioned peace between the two nations was scarce concluded, when Ildigesal took refuge among the Gepidæ, and Ustrogotbus among the Lombards. Both princes were demanded with great earnestness and threats by their respective nations; but neither caring to comply with the request of the other, they both began to prepare for war. However, the two kings, or rather usurpers, before hostilities were committed on either side, agreed to dispatch each other's rival; which they did accordingly, deeming it less dishonourable to assassinate than betray those, who had put themselves under their protection³. Not long after, the two kings dying, Tborisfinus was succeeded by Cunimundus, and Auduinus by Alboinus. Cunimundus had scarce ascended the throne, when, reviving some antient claims upon the Lombards, which they refused to comply with, he took the field at the head of a very numerous army, and, entering the country of the Lombards, committed there unheard-of ravages. On the other hand, Alboinus, having drawn together a no less numerous army, resolved to put the whole to the issue of a battle; which Cunimundus not declining, the two armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed. The victory continued long doubtful; but, in the end, the Gepidæ were put to flight, and pursued by the victorious Lombards with such slaughter, that scarce one was left alive of so numerous a multitude. Alboinus killed Cunimundus with his own hand, and, cutting off his head, turned his skull into a cup called by the Lombards, says Paulus Diaconus, scbala, and by the Latins palera. This scbala or cup he ever afterwards used at all public banquets and entertainments. After this victory, the Lombards seized on all Dacia, obliging the Gepidæ either to submit to them, or retire elsewhere. Thenceforth they had no king of their own, but lived in subjection either to the Lombards, who were masters of their country, or to the princes of the neighbouring nations, especially of the Hunns settled in *Pannonia*⁴. Thus Paulus Diaconus in his history of the Lombards. Lazius adds, that, among the present Hungarians, the descendants of the Gepidæ are easily distinguished from those who are sprung from the *Hunns*⁵. The ruin of the kingdom of the Gepidæ is placed by Pagi in 553. while Justinian was still living; but by others more rightly in the year 572. Justin, the successor of Justinian, being then emperor; for we are told, that the treasures of the deceased king were conveyed to Justin at Constantinople by Traffaicus an Arian bishop, and by Reptilanes, the late king's grandson⁶. Alboinus afterwards married Rosimund the daughter of Cunimundus; which made the Gepidæ bear the yoke more patiently⁷. Theodebert, one of the kings of the Franks, reproaches the emperor Justinian for assuming the title of Gepidicus, to which he had no claim, since that nation was never overcome or conquered by him⁸.

Some writers think, that the king of the Franks was therein mistaken, since the surname of Gepidicus is not to be found on any of the almost innumerable monuments and coins of Justinian, which have reached our times. Others are of opinion, that Justinian took the surname of Gepidicus, not on account of his conquering that nation, but because the Gepidæ, by putting themselves, as they did, under his protection, were deemed his subjects, which, say they, intitled him to the surname of Gepidicus. It is certain, that he took, and, according to the most probable opinion, on this account, the title of Francicus, before he had gained any advantages over that nation, nay, several years before he made war upon them.

The Heruli.

The Heruli.

Their origin.

ment, manners,

THE Heruli, by Zosimus called *Eruli, by Synellus Aairuli†; but commonly b
Heruli, were originally, according to Jornandes and Procopius, a Gothic nation. The former writer tells us, that they first dwelt in Scandinavia, and that, being driven from thence by the Dani, they wandered eastward as far as the Palus Maotis, and settled in that neighbourhood‡. Procopius speaks of them as inhabiting, in ancient times, the countries lying beyond the Danube§, agreeing therein with Jornandes. There they continued, making frequent irruptions into the empire, till the reign of the emperor Anastasius, who succeeded Zeno in 491. when great numbers of them were cut off by the Lombards, and the rest driven from their ancient habitations. Some of them, after having long roved about from one country to another, settled in that of the Rugians, the present Pomerania, which they found uninhabited, the c ancient proprietors being gone with the Goths into Italy. Some time after, they removed from thence into North Dacia, or Dacia beyond the Danube, being allowed by the Gepidæ, then masters of that country, to settle among them. But being oppressed and ill used by the Gepidæ, they had recourse to the emperor Anastasius, who in 511. allowed them to pass the Danube, and settle in Thrace, upon their promising to serve with fidelity in the Roman armies, when required¶. Great numbers of them, upon their being driven out of their own country by the Lombards, as we have mentioned above, under the conduct of several princes of the blood royal, took their route westward, and passing without opposition thro' several barbarous nations, came to the ocean, and, embarking there, set sail for Thule, where they settled‡. By d Thule Procopius meant, without all doubt, the peninsula of Scandinavia, which he calls ten times as big as Britain; and adds, that great part of it was destitute of inhabitants, but in that, which was inhabited, were seated thirteen populous nations, each of them being governed by their own kings and laws‡. The Heruli had kings of their own; but their kings, says Procopius, were such only by name; for they scarce had any authority, and were almost upon a level with every private man‡. Hence some think they were called Heruli, from the ancient Gothic word herra, signifying free. But others, and, among the rest, Ablavius, as quoted by Jornandes, will have them to have been called Heruli, from the Greek word hele, signifying marshy grounds, such as those were in the neighbourhood of the Palus Maotis, where they dwelt‡. c
The Heruli had some laws peculiar to themselves, and differing from those of all other nations; for, among them, when men were grown old or infirm, they were not to live, but intreat their relations to dispatch them; which they did accordingly, by placing them on a pile of wood, where they were put to death by one, who was a stranger to them in blood, and their bodies reduced to ashes, it being the duty of the nearest relation to set fire to the pile. When the husband died, the wife was to strangle herself on her husband's tomb, on pain of being deemed infamous, and looked upon as one, who had no value for her husband. They were given to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, and not ashamed of the most unnatural practices. They adored the same gods as the other Gothic nations, and used, on some extraor- f dinary occasions, to appease them with human sacrifices‡. They were a warlike people, and are chiefly commended by the antients for their swiftness and agility, all other nations chusing their light-armed soldiers out of them. The Heruli began first to invade the empire about the year 526. the fourth of the emperor Valerian's reign;

- a but were soon driven back by Gallienus, the son of Valerian, and his colleague in the empire^c. Eleven years after, the Heruli, passing from the Palus Mæotis into the Euxine sea with five hundred vessels, under the conduct of one of their chiefs named Naulebat, landed at Byzantium and Chrysopolis, now Scutari. At the latter place they were met and defeated by Menecianus, who was himself killed in the engagement. The Heruli, somewhat discouraged with the loss they had sustained, re-embarked, and began to retire to the mouth of the Euxine sea; but the very next day, the wind proving favourable, they returned anew before Byzantium, and, having crossed the Bosphorus, surprised and plundered the city of Corinthus, with great part of Asia, and the islands of Lemnos and Seyros in the Archipelago. Thence they steered their course towards Greece, and, landing there, besieged and burnt Athens, Corinth, Sparta, and Argos, without meeting with the least opposition, till the Athenians, under the conduct of Damippus the historian, waiting for them in the straits, and, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. However, in their retreat they committed great devastations in Boeotia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Thrace. In the mean time Gallienus, returning from Gaul, hastened into Illyricum, hoping to meet the Heruli there on their return home. He met them accordingly, and, coming upon them unexpectedly, gave them a total overthrow, pursued them with great slaughter as far as the Nessus in Mæsia, and there cut three thousand of them in pieces, as they were attempting to cross that river. Naulebat himself was taken prisoner, but treated with great humanity by Gallienus, who, to gain the affection of the barbarians, honoured him either with the consulate, or the consular ornaments^d. The Heruli however, two years after, that is, in 269. joined the Goths, and other northern nations, against the emperor Claudius; but were defeated by that prince with great slaughter, as we have related at length elsewhere^e. In the year 287. the fourth of Dioclesian's reign, the Heruli, joining the Chaibons and Cavions, entered Gaul, and laid waste the provinces bordering on the Rhine. But Maximian, marching against them, gave them a total overthrow, and pursued them with such slaughter, that, if his panegyrist may be credited, out of so great a multitude not one was left alive to carry home the news of their defeat^f. All we know of the Chaibons and Cavions is, that their country lay at a great distance from Gaul, as well as that of the Heruli. In the year 366. the third of Valentinian's reign, we find a body of Heruli serving in the Roman army on the Rhine; for Ammianus Marcellinus^g and Zosimus^h tell us, that the Alemans, crossing that river on the ice, defeated the Romans, and took the standards of the Batavians and Heruli. About the year 370. Ermenric, whom Jornandes calls Ermanaric, king of the Ostrogoths, after having subdued the neighbouring nations, fell upon the Heruli, and obliged them to submit, to pay him a yearly tribute, and to supply his army with their youth, when required^k. They were afterwards subdued, with the other northern nations, by Attila, and served in his army, when in 451. he invaded Gaul. Upon the death of Attila, they recovered their ancient liberty, and, entering into an alliance with the Romans, served in their armies, under commanders of their own nation, but named by the emperors^l. In the year 456. they made a descent on the coast of Galicia; but finding the inhabitants on their guard, they re-embarked, and, landing in Biscay, committed great ravages there^m. Idatius, who speaks of this descent, does not tell us whence these Heruli came, who, according to him, were but four hundred in number. When Odoacer made himself master of Italy in 476. such of the Heruli, as served at that time in the Roman armies, obtained of him lands in Italy, the third of that country being by him divided among the barbarians, who were in the Roman service, under the name of fœderati, or allies, and had joined him against Orestes, and his son Augustulus, as we have related elsewhereⁿ. In the reign of the emperor Anastasius, which began in 491. they made war on several barbarous nations, says Procopius^o, and subdued them; but having obliged their king Rodulphus to make war upon the Lombards, without the least provocation, they were overthrown by them with great slaughter, and obliged to live either in subjection to the conquerors, or abandon their country. Most of them chose the latter, some settling in the country of the Rugians, as we have hinted above, others returning into Scandinavia, and some, with the permission of the emperor Anastasistasius, taking up their abode in Thrace and Slyritum [†], where they had not been long, ere they began to oppress and abuse, in a most barbarous manner, the Romans, among whom they lived. Hereupon Anastasistasius ordered the troops quartered in the neighbouring provinces to march to the assistance of the oppressed Romans, who, taking arms upon their arrival, fell, in conjunction with them, on the Heruli, and cut most of them in pieces. Such of them as escaped the general slaughter, had recourse to the clemency of the emperor, who, upon their promising to serve the empire like faithful subjects, not only ordered them to be spared, but suffered them to continue in the countries, which he had formerly granted them [‡]. In the reign of the emperor Justinian, which began in 526. the Heruli, having murdered their king, ^b and no other remaining among them of the blood royal, they dispatched embassa-dors into Thule or Scandinavia, with orders to bring a prince from thence of the same family, if it was not extinct likewise there. The ambassadors, pursuant to their directions, pitched upon one (for there were many of the royal race there); but he dying on the way, they went back, and chose another named Todasius, who immediately set out on his journey to Thrace, attended by the ambassadors, by his brother Aordas, and by a guard of two hundred men. But in the mean time the Heruli, having long waited the return of their ambassadors, and suspecting they had met with some misfortune, had recourse to Justinian, begging he would give them a king. The emperor readily complied with their request, and appointed one Suartuas to reign over them, who was of the same nation, but had lived long at Constantinople. The Heruli received their new king with the greatest demonstrations of joy; but, a few days after his arrival, news being broughed, that the ambassadors, on their return from Thule, had already reached the confines, with a prince of the blood royal, they immediately revolted from Suartzuas, who was thereupon obliged to save himself by flight, and return to Constantinople. Justinian, highly provoked at their conduct, resolved to force them to acknowledge the prince he had given them; but the Gepidæ espousing the cause of the new king, the emperor, whose troops were then employed against the Ostrogoths in Italy, did not think it advisable to engage in a new war. But the war in Italy was no sooner ended, than, turning his arms ^d against the Heruli, and their allies the Gepidæ, he drove both nations quite out of the empire [‡]. He was afterwards reconciled to the Heruli, who assisted him in his other wars, supplying his armies with numerous bodies of troops, of which one served with great reputation in Italy, and the other in Colchis [‡]. In the reign of Justinian, great numbers of them embraced the christian religion; but the change of religion wrought no change in their manners, being of all nations, says Procopius, the most wicked, the most treacherous, avaricious, and the most addicted to drunkenness, and all manner of lewdness and debauchery [‡]. They were, soon after the death of Justinian, subdued by the Lombards, and lived partly subject to them, partly to the neighbouring nations.

The Marco-
mans.
Their origin,
country, &c.

THE Marcomans are, by all the antient writers, reckoned among the German ^e nations. They dwelt originally near the springs of the Danube; but removed from thence, under the conduct of their king Maroboduus, into the country which was then held by the Boians, and is still called from them Bobemia, as it was by the antients Boiobemia and Boioheimia, that is, the country of the Boians. The Boians were, according to Cæsar, a Gaulish nation, but from Gaul passed into Germany, and, settling in the present Bobemia, continued there till they were driven out by the Marco-mans [‡]. The migration of the Marcomans, from their original country into that of the Boians, is mentioned by Velleius Paterculus [‡]. Ptolemy, in describing the country of the Marcomans, mentions a city there called Marobudum, which name it took, without all doubt, from its founder Maroboduus. This our modern geographers take ^f to be the present city of Prague. Strabo calls the city, where Maroboduus usually resided,

- a resided, Boviasmum^f; but Cluverius thinks we ought to read Boiaum. The Marcomans agreed in customs, manners, religion, &c. with the other German nations, were a very numerous and warlike people, and ever ready to prefer death to slavery. Of all the German nations they alone made use of the Runic letters in their charms and incantations; whence Lazius and Rhabanus Maurus conclude them to have come originally from Scandinavia s; but, in every thing else, they agreed with the German nations, and are reckoned among them, as we have hinted above, by the antient writers. As for their history, in the reign of Augustus, Tiberius, having crossed the Rhine at the head of a very numerous and powerful army, gained great advantages over them, and the other German nations; which obliged them to send deputies to
- b Augustus, and sue for peace. The emperor received the ambassadors of the Marcomans with particular marks of distinction, and granted them their request; but obliged the other German nations to retire beyond the Elbe, and the Sicambrians, with such of the Sueves as were not subject to Meroboduus, to abandon their native country, and people some places in Gaul, that were destitute of inhabitants^b. In the year 17. the fourth of Tiberius, a war broke out between the Marcomans and the Cheruscans dwelling between the Elbe and the Wefer. The former were commanded by Meroboduus, and the latter by the celebrated Arminius, who, a few years before, had cut off the legions of Varus. But all we know of this war is, that the Cheruscans gained considerable advantages over the *Marcomans*¹. Two years after, Tiberius
- c having, by his emissaries, stirred up the subjects of Meroboduus against him, he was driven from the throne, and obliged to pass the last eighteen years of his life at Ravenna. Meroboduus was succeeded by Catualdus, who was likewise driven out soon after, and obliged to take refuge in Gaul^k. In the year 86. the emperor Domitian, provoked against the Marcomans and Quadians, because they did not assist him in the war, which he was then waging with the Dacians, entered their country in an hostile manner. Both nations earnestly sued for peace; which Domitian was so far from granting, that he caused their ambassadors to be put to death. Hereupon the Marcomans flew to arms, and, having drawn together a considerable body of troops, they engaged the emperor, and put his army to the rout^l. However, the emperor,
- d upon his return to Rome, triumphed both over them and the Dacians, of whom, after his defeat by the Marcomans, he had purchased a peace with large sums, which he had refused before upon most advantageous terms^m. But the triumphs of this emperor were looked upon as certain tokens of his having been defeatedⁿ. In the year 93. Domitian marched in person against the Sarmatians, who, according to some, had cut in pieces one, according to others, several Roman legions^o, and at the same time made war upon the Marcomans^p. But all we know of this war is, that Domitian pretended to have gained great advantages over both nations, and, on that account, took the title of imperator^q. We have spoken elsewhere at length of the memorable war, which, in conjunction with several other German nations, the Marcomans made
- e on the empire^r; and therefore shall only observe here, that, in one of the battles that were fought in this war, the Romans were defeated with the loss of twenty thousand men; and that, on another occasion, the emperor Aurelius was in great danger of being cut off with his whole army. Though the whole strength of the empire was employed against them, yet they held out for the space of fifteen years, and in the end obtained a peace upon very reasonable terms, one of which was, that they should not, for the future, settle within six miles of the Danube. Some of the Marcomans, who submitted to the emperor, were transplanted into Italy; but these, having attempted to make themselves masters of Ravenna, were by him sent back to their own country. This war lasted from the year 165. to the year 180. In the year 214.
- f a war was kindled between them and the Vandals, by means of the emperor Caracalla, who used to brag, that he had set at variance those two nations, which, till his time, had lived in friendship and amity^t; but what was the issue of that war, we are no-where told. In the year 256. the emperor Gallienus entered into an alliance with Attalus king of the Marcomans; and, upon the captivity of his father Valerian, taken prisoner by the Persians, he yielded to him part of Upper Pannonia for his daughter Pipa or Pipara, whom he pretended to marry; but as he was already married to Salonina, styled in the antient inscriptions Cornelia Salonina Augusta, Pipa is called by the writers of those times his concubine^a. The Marcomans joined the Alemans and the Juthungians in the war, which those nations made on the emperor Aurelian about the year 270. but were in the end cut off almost to a man^b. Both Idatius and Victor^c mention a victory gained over the Marcomans in the year 299. the sixteenth of Dioclesian's reign. About the year 396. Fritigil, queen of the Marcomans, having embraced the christian religion, wrote to St. Ambrose, intreating him to send her some instructions relating to the conduct of her life. The holy prelate readily complied with her request, and besides exhorted her to persuade her husband to live in peace and amity with the Romans. This she not only did, but prevailed upon the king to subject himself, and his kingdom, to the empire^d. And hence it is, that, among the many barbarous nations that broke into Gaul a few years after, that is, in 406. and 407. no mention is made of the Marcomans. They seem to have continued faithful to the Romans till the time of Attila, when, being subdued by that prince, they were obliged to serve in his army against their old friends and allies; for they are mentioned among the many different nations, of which his army was composed, when in the year 451. he invaded Gaul^e. Upon the death of Attila, they shook off the yoke, and, having recovered their antient liberty, submitted either to Marician, or his successor Leo^f, and served the empire to the last with unshaken fidelity. From them, and, without all doubt, from several other nations settled among them, are descended the present inhabitants of Bohemia.

NEXT to the Marcomans dwelt the Quadians, a German nation often mentioned^d by the antients, especially by Eutropius and Capitolinus. Their country is at present known by the name of Moravia; for it extended from the mountains of Bohemia to the river Marus, now the March, and consequently comprised that province. Ptolemy mentions the following cities in the country of the Quadians, viz. Eburodunum, or, as others read it, Robodunum, Eburum, Medoslanium, and Celemantia, now, according to Cluverius, Brin, Olmütz, Znaim, and Kalminz. The Quadians were a warlike people, had kings of their own, and agreed in customs, manners, and religion, with the other German nations. The Quadians joined, without all doubt, their countrymen against Lollius, Germanicus, Caius, and Galba, attempting to reduce Germany, and bring under subjection the several nations inhabiting that extensive country. The emperor Domitian, while engaged in a war with the Dacians, turned unexpectedly his arms against them; but, before the Quadians could draw their troops together, the emperor was defeated and put to flight by the Marcomans, as we have related above. They submitted, it seems, to the emperor Titus Antoninus; for they received and acknowledged a king named by that prince, as appears from some of Antoninus's coins, supposed to have been struck about the year 139^e. They joined the Marcomans in the memorable war, which that nation made on the empire in the reign of M. Aurelius, as we have hinted above, and related at length in our Roman history^f. The Quadians being, by that war, which had lasted fifteen years, reduced to great streights, sent in the end embassadors to sue for peace, and with them all the Roman deserters, and thirteen thousand prisoners, whom they had taken during the war. By that means they obtained a peace, upon condition that they should not traffick for the future within the Roman dominions, nor settle within six miles of the Danube. But, disliking these conditions, they renewed the war, in conjunction with the Marcomans; and, having driven out Furtius, whom the emperor had appointed to reign over them, they appointed one Ariogeses in his room; which M. Aurelius resented to such a degree, that tho' the Quadians promised to set at liberty fifty thousand Roman captives, upon condition that he confirmed to Ariogeses the title of king,

- a the emperor would not hearken to the proposal; but, on the contrary, proscribed the new prince, and set a price upon his head. Hereupon the Quadians, being joined by the Marcomans, and several other nations, attacked the Romans; but, after a long and bloody dispute, were put to the rout, and utterly defeated. Ariogestes himself was taken prisoner; but the emperor generously spared his life, and contented himself with confining him to the city of Alexandria, the metropolis of Egypt. After this victory, the other nations submitted, and obtained a peace; but the Quadians seem to have continued in arms till the reign of Commodus, who granted them a peace upon the following terms: 1. They should keep at the distance of five miles from the Danube. 2. That they should deliver up their arms, and supply the Romans with a certain number of troops, when required. 3. That they should assemble but once a month in one place only, and in the presence of a Roman centurion. And lastly, That they should not make war upon the neighbouring nations, without the consent of the people of Rome.^d This peace was concluded in the year 180. the first of the emperor Commodus's reign. In the year 214. the Quadians had one Gaiobomar for their king, who was murdered by the orders of Caracalla; but upon what provocation, we are not told. Of this assassination the emperor used to brag, as of a glorious action.^e In 257. the fourth of the emperor Valerian's reign, the Quadians, joining the Sarmatians, broke into Illyricum, and ravaged part of that province; but they were defeated by Probus, afterwards emperor, but at that time only tribune of a legion. On this occasion Probus rescued out of the hands of the Quadians Valerius Flaccus, a youth descended from an illustrious family, and nearly related to the emperor Valerian, who publicly commended Probus for so glorious an action, and presented him with a civic crown, which, in the times of the republic, was bestowed on those, who had saved the life of a citizen.^f In 260. the seventh of the emperor Galienus, they made a sudden irruption into Pannonia; but were obliged by Regillianus, who commanded there, to quit their booty, and return home. That commander is said to have gained several victories over them in one day.^g Some years after, that is, about the year 283. Probus, who had kept the barbarians in awe, being dead, the Quadians, in conjunction with the Sarmatians, broke into Illyricum and Thrace, and, after having ravaged those provinces, were advancing towards Italy; but Carus, who had succeeded Probus, meeting them on the borders of Illyricum, gave them a total overthrow, killed sixteen thousand of them on the spot, and took twenty thousand prisoners.^h In the year 355. the nineteenth of the emperor Constantius, the Quadians broke into Pannonia and Mæsia, and, having pillaged both provinces, without meeting with the least opposition, they returned home unmolested, carrying with them an immense booty.ⁱ Of this irruption, no mention is made by Ammianus. Two years after, they returned anew, and laid waste Valeria, while the Sueves committed dreadful ravages in Rætia, and the Sarmatians over-ran Lower Pannonia, and Upper Mæsia. Hereupon Constantius, leaving Milan, where he then was, advanced to the confines of the Quadians, and there conferred with their chiefs, who excused, in the best manner they could, the past ravages, and promised, for the future, to live in peace and amity with the empire.^j But, notwithstanding the promises they had made, the following year 358. in conjunction with the Sarmatians, they laid waste great part of Pannonia and Mæsia; but, at the approach of Constantius, who marched against them in person, they repassed the Danube, and returned home. But the emperor resolved to punish them for their treachery, and, having passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, began to lay waste their country. The Quadians, not finding themselves in a condition to make head against the numerous forces Constantius had with him, sent deputies to sue for peace; which the emperor readily granted them, upon their delivering up hostages, and setting at liberty all the prisoners they had taken.^k In the year 374. their king Gabinus being treacherously murdered by Marcellianus duke of Valeria, in the manner we have related in our Roman history,^l they passed the Danube in the utmost rage, and falling upon the reapers, it being then harvest-time, cut most of them in pieces, laid waste the country to a great distance, and took an incredible number of captives. Equitius, general of the troops in Illyricum, not finding himself in a condition to stem this furious torrent, retired into Valeria; but the Quadians, looking upon him as the chief author of the murder of their king, followed him thither, committing dreadful ravages in the countries through ^a which they passed. In their way they met two legions, the Pannonian and Mælian, who had been sent to oppose them; but the legions falling into an unreasonable contention about precedence, the barbarians, taking advantage of their disagreement, cut them both in pieces. Thus all the open country was abandoned to them, the Romans remaining masters only of the fortified places ⁿ. The Sarmatians, who had joined the Quadians in this irruption, having entered Upper Mæsia, were defeated there with great slaughter by Theodosius, afterwards emperor, but then very young, and only duke of Mæsia. Against the Quadians Valentinian I. then emperor, marched in person, and, arriving at Carnutum in Illyricum, which most geographers take to be the present city of Hainburg on the Danube in Austria, about thirty miles east of Vienna, continued there three months, making vast preparations for his intended expedition into the country of the Quadians. At length he took the field, and, having passed the Danube at Acincum, now Gran, or, as others will have it, Buda in Lower Hungary, he entered the enemy's country, and laid it waste, destroying all with fire and sword. Having thus passed the summer, and great part of the autumn, he took up his winter-quarters at Bregetio, which some take to be a village on the Danube, now called Bregnitz, and others the present city of Komare in the isle of Schut. There he gave audience to the ambassadors of the Quadians, come to sue for peace; but, while he was speaking to them with great warmth, and threatening to extirpate their whole nation, he fell all on a sudden to the ground, as if his life and voice had failed ^c him at once. Being immediately conveyed into his chamber, he was there seized with convulsion-fits, and violent contortions of all his limbs, in the agonies of which he soon expired ^o. Socrates writes, that being offended at the mean and beggarly appearance of the ambassadors of the Quadians, he asked them, If their country afforded men of no better quality to appear before him? They answered, That the first men in the nation were in his presence. Hereupon he fell into a violent passion, upbraiding their whole nation with arrogance, for daring to insult the majesty of the Roman people. He delivered himself with so much heat and violence, that, his veins bursting, he was instantly suffocated in his own blood ^p. Upon his death, the officers of the army proclaimed Valentinian, his second son, emperor, though he was then a child ^d but four or five years old. At the same time they concluded a truce with the Quadians, and recalled the troops, which, under the conduct of Merobaudes, and count Sebastian, were laying waste their country. In the year 379. they broke anew into Illyricum; but were driven out with some loss by the emperor Gratian. In the year 407. the Quadians entered Gaul with the other barbarians, and over-ran those provinces, committing every-where dreadful ravages, of which we have spoken at length elsewhere ^q. From this time no further mention is made in history of the Quadians; whence Lazius concludes them to have been either subdued, or utterly extirpated, by the Goths, who had settled in Pannonia and Illyricum.

The Sarmatians.

The Sarmatians.

Their country.

They consisted of several different nations.

THE Sarmatians were a very numerous and warlike nation, divided into many ^e tribes, each of them having their own king, and masters of a large and extensive country. Sarmatia Europæa, or Sarmatia in Europe, of which alone we design to speak here, extended from the Vistula, now the Weissel, parting it from Germany, to the Euxine sea, the Bosporus Cimmerius, the Palus Mæotis, and the Tanais dividing it from Asia and the Asiatic Sarmatia. In this vast tract of land, comprehending the present Poland, Russia, and great part of Tartary, dwelt the following nations; viz. the Burgiones, Cariones, Sudeni, Geloni, Hamaxobii, Agathyrsi, Boruse, Melanchane, Alauni or Alani, Iazyges, Roxolani, Bastarnæ, Carpi or Carpates, Sidones, Borani, and Venedi, by Jornandes called Winidæ and Vinidi. The five last-named nations are thought to have come originally from Germany, especially the Bastarnæ; for even ^f in the time of Tacitus, who is at a loss whether he ought to place them among the German or the Sarmatian nations, they agreed with the former in dress and language ^r.

- a The Gelonians were, according to *Herodotus, of Greek extraction; but had, even in Their origin. his time, adopted, in a great measure, the customs and manners of the Budini, among whom they had settled, especially the custom of painting their bodies, as we read in Virgil† and Claudian‡. The Budini dwelt near mount Budinus, from which springs the Borysthenes, called by more modern writers the Danapris, and thence the Dnieper or Nieper. The other nations, which we have mentioned above, were all Gotbic; and of the origin of the Gotbic nations we have spoken at length in the history of the Gotbs. These various nations were blended by the Romans under the common name of Sarmatæ; by the Greeks under that of Sauromatæ, and sometimes by both, under the denominations of Scythæ or Scythians, and Gætæ. Each of them had, it seems, their own king; for mention is made in history of the kings of the Roxolani, of the Bastarnæ, of the Iazyges, &c. Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of the Sarmatians in general, tells us, that they were a savage people, and infamous for their lewdness*. The Melanclænæ are said, both by Ammianus† and Herodotus‡, to have fed on human flesh, and are thence called by them, as well as by Mela and Pliny, Anthrophagi and Androphagi.

- THE Sarmatians began first to threaten the empire in the reign of Nero, about the year of the christian æra 63. that is, about seventeen years after Thrace had been by Claudius reduced to a Roman province; for, till its reduction, it had been governed by its own princes, and served as a barrier on that side between the Sarmatians and Romans. A few years after the latter became possessed of it, the Sarmatians began to appear in great numbers on the confines, as if they intended to make themselves masters of that province, which was then guarded by a small number of troops, under the command of Plautius Silvanus Ælianus, who had sent the rest to the assistance of Corbulo, then making war in Armenia. But the Roman general having gained over the kings of the Bastarnians and Roxolani, the rest soon dispersed†. However, six years after, that is, in 69. Otho being then emperor, the Roxolani, who dwelt on the west side of the Palus Mæotis, entering Mæsia, defeated there two Roman cohorts, and, having pillaged that part of the province, which bordered on the Danube, they repassed the river, and returned home unmolested. Animated with this success, they appeared anew the same year with nine thousand horse. But Marcus Aponius Saturninus, governor of Mæsia, falling upon them with a legion and some auxiliaries, cut them off almost to a man‡. The same year Vespasian being proclaimed emperor by the legions quartered in the east, the Iazygians, a Sarmatic nation dwelling next to the Roxolani, declared for the new emperor against Vitellius. But Vespasian, returning them thanks for the troops they offered him, took with him only their chiefs, not with a design to employ them, but to prevent them from making inroads into the Roman territories during the war§. Tacitus calls the Iazygians the allies of the Romans. But the very first year of the reign of Vespasian, whom they had offered to join a few months before, they broke into Mæsia, and, having killed Lontei Agrippa, governor of that province, who attempted to oppose them, they laid waste the country far and near. Hereupon Rubrius Gallus, marching against them with the utmost expedition, pursuant to the orders he had received from the emperor, cut great numbers of them in pieces in several encounters, obliged the rest to repass the Danube, and, with great care, fortified the banks of that river, to cover the province from their incursions¶. In the year 85. the fourth of Domitian's reign, the Iazygians, joining the Sueves, armed with a design, says Dion‡, to pass the Danube, and lay waste the Roman dominions; but whether or no they put their design in execution, that writer has not thought fit to tell us. Tacitus indeed writes in one place, that the Sarmatians and Suevians armed against the empire*; and elsewhere, that this very year, soon after the return of Agricola to Rome, the Roman armies were defeated in Pannonia†, in all likelihood by the Iazygians and Suevians. In the year 93. the thirteenth of Domitian's reign, the Sarmatians having cut in pieces a Roman legion with their tribune, the emperor, who was then in Dacia, marched against them in person‡; but with what success, we are not told. Domitian indeed took the title of imperator, as if he had gained some great advantage over the enemy; but that prince often claimed the victory when he had been driven out of the field, and shamefully put to flight, as we have hinted above. The Sarmatians are by Dion reckoned among the nations that submitted to Adrian ^b while he was in Armenia, in the year 107. but that writer speaks, without all doubt, of the Asiatic Sarmatians. As for the Sarmatians in Europe, they broke into Illyricum with great fury in the year 119. the second of Adrian's reign; which obliged that prince to quit Rome, and march against them in person. Upon his arrival in Mæsia, they repassed the Danube with great precipitation, and encamped on the opposite bank; but the Roman cavalry swimming, armed as they were, cross the river, in order to attack them, the Sarmatians were struck with such terror, that they immediately submitted ^c. The horse, to whose intrepidity and boldness was owing the submission of the enemy, were the Batavians in the Roman ^b service, as appears from the epitaph of one of them named Soranus ^k. Suidas writes, that Adrian himself passed the Danube on horseback ^l; but he seems to have misunderstood the passage in Dion. The princes of the Sarmatians quarrelled afterwards among themselves, and chose Adrian for their umpire, who composed their differences to the general satisfaction of the contending parties. On this occasion, the king of the *Roxolani*ans complaining to the emperor, that his pension had been lessened, Adrian ordered the sum, which had been formerly allowed him, to be paid without the least deduction ^m. In the year 135. the Iazygians sent ambassadors to Rome, to renew their alliance with Adrian, who received them in a very obliging manner, introduced them to the senate, and, having granted them their request, sent them ^c back loaded with rich presents ⁿ. All the nations inhabiting Sarmatia conspired, with the Marcomans, against M. Aurelius; but were in the end most of them cut in pieces. Over the Iazygians in particular the emperor gained two complete victories, the one before they reached the Danube on their way home, and the other, described at length by Dion ^o, as they were crossing that river on the ice. But, notwithstanding the great losses they sustained in this war, they were so far from suing for peace, that they deposed, and threw into prison, their king named Bandaspes, for no other reason but because he had sent ambassadors with proposals for concluding a peace with the empire. However, being in the end abandoned by the Marcomans, and their other allies, and reduced to great straits, their new king, named Zanticus, came in ^d person, attended by all the chief men of the nation, to throw himself at the emperor's feet, and sue for peace; which was granted them upon the following terms, viz. That they should not settle within ten miles of the Danube; that they should set at liberty all the prisoners they had taken, and supply the emperor's army with a body of eight thousand horse. With these conditions they readily complied; and we are told, that the prisoners, whom they dismissed on this occasion, were in number, at least, one hundred thousand, though they had sold to other nations many of those they had taken during the war. The eight thousand Iazygian horse were, by the emperor, sent into Britain. To the other Sarmatic nations lands were allotted in Pannonia, Mæsia, Germany, and even in Italy ^p. The Iazygians lived, it seems, ^e some time in peace and amity with the Romans; for in 180. one of the articles of the peace concluded between the emperor Commodus and the Alemans was, that they should not make war upon the Iazygians, Burians, or Vandals ^q. Besides, no mention is made by historians, either of them, or the other Sarmatic nations, till the year 215. when the emperor Caracalla is said to have gained some advantages over the Sarmatians, and to have taken, on that account, the surname of Sarmaticus ^r. In the year 228. the Carpi, a people of Sarmatia dwelling near the Carpatian mountains, which part Hungary and Transylvania from Poland, being informed, that the Roman emperors paid a yearly pension to the Goths, sent deputies to Menophilus, governor of Mæsia, demanding, that the same sum which the Goths received should be paid to ^f them, since their friendship deserved to be no less courted than that of the Goths. The deputies found Menophilus exercising his troops, according to his daily custom; and, as he well knew on what errand they were come, to humble their pride, he made them wait several days before he gave them audience, allowing them in the mean time to assist at the military exercises performed by his troops. At length he received them seated on a high tribunal, and attended by all the officers of the army, to whom he pretended to give his orders while the ambassadors were speaking, as if

- a nothing they said deserved his attention. The ambassadors, mortified and amazed at this conduct, only asked, Why money was given to the Goths, and not to them? Because the emperor, answered Menophilus, bestows his favours on whom he pleases. We hope then, replied the ambassadors, that he will be pleased to shew himself as generous to us, as to the Goths: we are a more brave and deserving nation. The Roman general answered with a smile, That the emperor would do what he thought fit; and that if they met him in four months time, at a place which he appointed, he would acquaint them with the emperor's will and pleasure. The ambassadors met him accordingly, and found him, as they had done before, wholly intent upon exercising his troops. Menophilus, having made them wait some days, as if he had affairs
- b of greater importance on his hands than to give audience to them, received them in the same manner as he had done the first time, and ordered them to return in three months, appointing the place where they should find him. The answer he then gave them was, That the emperor would enter into no engagements with them; but, if they stood in need of present relief, the emperor would, in all likelihood, out of his good-nature, allow them some, provided they went and threw themselves at his feet. They were highly provoked at this answer, and departed in a great rage; but nevertheless, awed by Menophilus, they continued quiet so long as he commanded in that province^a. The emperor Maximinus made, it seems, war upon the Sarmatians, and gained considerable advantages over them; for it appears from several
- c inscriptions found in France and Spain, that both he and his son took the surname of Sarmaticus^b. However, Capitolinus only writes, that Maximinus, having quelled the Germans, resolved to make war upon the Sarmatians, and, with that design, passed the winter in 236. at Sirmium in Pannonia^c. Maximinus, speaking of himself in Herodian, only says, that he overcame, on several occasions, the Germans; inso-much that they were afraid to stir, as were likewise the Sarmatians, who, by their deputies, were constantly suing for peace^d. In the year 238. Menophilus, of whom we have spoken above, being recalled, the Carpi, who had been awed by his presence, broke into Mæsia, and having ravaged that province, and utterly destroyed the city of Istria or Istropolis, on the most southern mouth of the Danube in Lower
- d Mæsia, or rather Little Scythia, they returned home unmolested, the Romans being then engaged in a civil war between Maximinus, Maximus, and Balbinus^e. In 242. the fourth of the emperor Gordian's reign, that prince, in passing through Thrace on his march into the east to make war there on the Perfians, overcame the Goths and Sarmatians, and obliged them to abandon that province, and retire beyond the Danube^f. In the year 260. the Sarmatians and Quadians seized on great part of Dacia and Pannonia; but were driven out by Regillianus, who commanded in Illyricum, and is said to have gained several victories over them in one day^g. He soon after caused himself to be proclaimed emperor; but he was scarce seated on the throne, when the Roxolanians, who served under him, revolted; and their example being fol-
- e lowed by the rest of the army, he was murdered by some of his own men^h. Aurelian, who was afterwards emperor, is said to have gained a signal victory over the Sarmatians and Sueves in the reign of Claudius, about the year 268ⁱ. But of this victory no mention is made by any other writer. In the year 278. the emperor Probus marched against them in person; but, at his approach, they retired from Thrace, where they had committed great ravages, abandoned the booty they had taken, and, awed by the fame of his name, sent deputies to sue for peace; which the emperor granted them, upon their promising to keep beyond the Danube, and supply the Roman armies with a certain number of troops, when required^j. They continued quiet during the remaining part of Probus's reign, but no sooner heard of his death,
- f than they broke into Illyricum, destroying all with fire and sword. But Carus, then emperor, marching against them, cut sixteen thousand of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to repass the Danube, and sue for peace^k. About seven years after, they returned with a very numerous army, and committed great ravages in Thrace and Illyricum; but Dioclesian, hastening to the relief of the oppressed provinces, defeated the barbarians with great slaughter. Eumenius writes, that, on this occasion, almost the whole nation was cut off^l: but he speaks more like a panegyrist than an historian;

for some years after, the Sarmatians dwelling near the Palus Mæotis, under the conduct of Crisco king of Bosporus, broke into the country of the Lazians in Colchis, and, having pillaged great part of Pontus, advanced as far as the Halys, a river of Paphlagonia. Constantius, then only tribune, but soon after declared Cæsar, was sent by Dioclesian to put a stop to their ravages; but his army being far inferior in number to that of the barbarians, he contented himself with encamping on the opposite bank of the Halys, and by that means preventing them from passing that river. But in the mean time Chrestus, king of the Chersonesus, and vassal of the empire, having, at the instigation of Dioclesian, broken into Sarmatia, and even taken by stratagem the city of Bosporus, Crisco immediately dispatched ambassadors to Constantius, suing for peace; which was granted him, upon his restoring the booty, and setting at liberty all the prisoners he had taken. Chrestus at the same time restored to him the booty he had taken, and the prisoners, among whom were his wife, and his concubines. For this eminent piece of service, Dioclesian sent rich presents to the inhabitants of the Chersonesus, declared them free, and exempted them from all tribute, customs, and taxes. This account we have copied from a piece, intituled, Of the government of the empire, published by Meursius in 1611. and ascribed to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who reigned in the east in 950. The emperor Galerius made war, it seems, on the Sarmatians; for both Zonaras and Ammianus Marcellinus tell us, that seeking the destruction of Constantine, whose extraordinary qualities gave him great umbrage, he ordered him, in the Sarmatian war, to engage a barbarian, who surpassed all the others in stature, and the fierceness of his looks; which Constantine did accordingly, and, having overcome him, and thrown him to the ground, he dragged him by the hair to the emperor's presence, and laid him at his feet. In the same war, having ordered him to cross a marsh at the head of some troops, he entered it the first on horseback, and, being followed by his men, put great numbers of the enemy to the sword, and gained a complete victory^f. This is supposed to have happened about the year 305. About the same time the whole nation of the Carpi submitted to the Romans, being several times overcome, and reduced to great streights, by Galerius. Dioclesian transplanted the whole nation into the Roman territories, especially into Pannonia, where great numbers of them had been allowed to settle in the reign of Aurelianus^g. Constantine the Great, in the year 322. the seventeenth of his reign, gained a great victory over the other Sarmatic nations^h. Ostianus writes, that they were overcome in several battles in the neighbourhood of Campana, Marga, and Bononia, all three cities of Illyricum on the *Danube*ⁱ. Raufimodes, one of the Sarmatian kings, had, as we read in Zosimus, besieged a city, which that writer does not name; but Constantine, hastening to the relief of the place, put the enemy to flight, and, having obliged those, who had made their escape, to repass the Danube, he pursued them cross that river, defeated them a second time, killed their king Raufimodes, laid waste their country, and returned with an incredible number of captives^k. The Sarmatian sports, which were yearly celebrated about the latter end of November, as appears from an antient calendar of the year 534. probably took their rise from this victory.

In the year 332. a war being kindled between the Goths and Sarmatians, the latter had recourse to Constantine, who immediately sent a considerable body of troops to their assistance. These, engaging the Goths on the twentieth of April of this year, gained a complete victory over them. We are told, that, in this war, near an hundred thousand Goths perished either by the sword, or by famine. At length they concluded a peace, both with the Romans and the Sarmatians, Ariaric or Araric their king delivering up his son as an hostage^l, and supplying the Roman armies with a body of forty thousand Goths; which corps was, for some ages, kept intire and complete, and served under the name of fæderati, or allies^m. The Sarmatians, finding they had nothing now to fear from the Goths, with the utmost ingratitude, turned their arms against their friends and benefactors, making frequent inroads into the territories of the Romans, to whom they owed their deliverance. Constantine, highly provoked at their conduct, marched against them at the head of a powerful army, and, having put them to flight, entered their country, destroying all with fire and sword. However, upon their submitting, and promising to serve the empire with

- a fidelity, the emperor put a stop to all hostilities, and, quitting their country, repassed the Danube ^a. Two years after, the Sarmatians were attacked anew by the Goths, under the conduct of their king Geberic, the successor of Araric. The war lasted some years; but in the end the Sarmatians were utterly defeated on the banks of the Marisus in Dacia. In this battle, the Sarmatians lost their king Wisimar, and with him the flower of their nobility, and such numbers of men, that they were obliged to arm their slaves, who defeated indeed the Goths; but then, turning their arms against their masters, drove them quite out of their native country, and seized on their lands and possessions ^o. These slaves are by Ammianus ^p and St. Jerom ^q styled Limigantes: ^{They are driven out of their country by their slaves.} the former tells us, that the free-born among the Sarmatians were distinguished by the name of Acaragantes ^r. The Sarmatians, thus driven out by their slaves, had recourse to Constantine, who received three hundred thousand of them within the empire, incorporated some among his troops, and to the others allowed lands in the provinces bordering on the Danube, and in Italy itself ^s. Some of them took refuge amongst other barbarians, by Ammianus called Vitolobales ^t, and by most writers thought to be the same people with the Quadi Ultramontani, or the Quadians beyond the mountains Sudeti or Suditi parting the country of the Quadi from that of the Marcomans, at present the mountains of Bohemia. The Sarmatians, who took refuge among the Quadians, in the year 355. made an irruption into Pannonia, in conjunction with the Quadians, and, having pillaged both that province and Upper Mæsia, returned home unmolested, with an immense booty ^u. Thus Zosimus. But of this irruption no mention is made by Ammianus. Two years after, they returned anew, and laid waste the same provinces, while the Sueves committed dreadful ravages in Rætia, and the Quadians in Valeria, a province of Illyricum. Constantius, who was then at Rome, and, as Ammianus tells us ^v, mightily taken with the curiosities and diversions of that city, set out in great haste to stop the progress of the barbarians, who threatened Italy itself; but they were no sooner informed of his arrival at Milan, than they retired of their own accord ^w. However, the emperor advanced as far as Sirmium, and there had several conferences with the chiefs of the nations dwelling in the neighbourhood of the Danube, who all promised to live in peace and amity with the empire ^x.
- d But the following winter, while the Danube was frozen, unmindful of their promises, they laid hold of that opportunity, and, entering Mæsia and Pannonia, pillaged those provinces, while the Alemans, notwithstanding the peace they had lately concluded with the empire, laid waste Rætia. Against the Alemans Constantius dispatched Barbatio; but against the Sarmatians, who had been joined by the Quadians, he marched in person, leaving Sirmium, where he had passed the winter, after the spring equinox ^y. The barbarians retired at his approach; but the emperor, having passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, entered their country, and laid it waste far and near. The Sarmatians came in great numbers to Constantius, pretending to sue for peace; but their real design was to attack the Romans unawares. Of this the emperor had timely notice, and therefore ordered his troops to fall upon them as they drew near; which they did accordingly, and cut them in pieces to a man. The rest, disheartened with this loss, submitted to Constantius, who concluded a peace with them, upon their setting at liberty all the prisoners they had taken, and delivering up hostages as a surety for their future conduct ^z. The Sarmatians reaped in the end great advantages from this war. They had been driven out of their own country by their slaves in 334. as we have hinted above, and obliged to take refuge among the Quadians, who treated them as their subjects. From this subjection they were delivered by Constantius, who declared them free, appointed one Zizais, a prince of their own nation, to reign over them, and re-established them in their antient country; for the slaves, by whom they had been driven out, having ravaged the neighbouring provinces, Constantius made war upon them, and reduced them to great streights. Hereupon the Limigantes (for so those slaves were called) came in great numbers to the emperor, suing for peace; but resolved at the same time to fall unexpectedly upon the Romans, if they could not obtain it upon honourable terms. This Constantius suspected, and therefore ordered his troops to surround them insensibly while they were yet speaking. When they had done, Constantius told them upon what terms he was willing to grant them a peace; which they no-ways relishing, ^a began to handle their arms. This the Romans, who watched them narrowly, no sooner observed, than they fell upon them sword in hand, and cut most of them in pieces, not one, out of so great a multitude, calling for quarter, or offering to submit ^b. After this, the Romans entering their country on one side, and the Sarmatians, their ancient masters, on the other, a dreadful havock was made of the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age. Thus the Limigantes were obliged at length to submit, and accept the terms, however hard, that were offered them. These were, that they should quit the country, which they had seized on, and held with the utmost injustice, and retire to another at a great distance from the empire. The country, which they abandoned, was, by Constantius, restored to the antient proprietors, who ^b settled there anew twenty-four years after they had been driven out by their rebellious slaves ^c. For these achievements Constantius took the surname of Sarmaticus ^d. The Sarmatians, notwithstanding the great obligations they owed the Romans, a few years after, that is, in 364. broke into Pannonia, and laid waste that province, while the Roman troops were employed against the Alemans in Rhetia ^e. In 374. they joined the Quadians, and, in conjunction with them, committed dreadful ravages in Pannonia, and from thence advanced into Upper Mæsia; but were there defeated with great slaughter by Theodosius, afterwards emperor, as we have related above. In the year 376. Atbanaric, one of the chiefs of the Goths, being forced by the Hunns to abandon his own country, retired, with his people, to a place called Caucalanda, driving from ^c thence the Sarmatians, to whom it belonged ^f. In 378. the Sarmatians, informed that the Goths, who had been admitted by Valens into the empire, had taken up arms against the Romans, resolved to pass the Danube, and join them. But Theodosius, afterwards emperor, meeting them in Thrace, gave them a total overthrow. Incredible numbers of the barbarians were cut in pieces, and the victory Theodosius gained over them is said to have been so complete, that Gratian, then emperor, could not believe the account, which Theodosius himself gave him of it upon his return to court, till he was informed of the truth by persons sent on purpose to view the field of battle ^g. In the year 407. they entered Gaul, with the Vandals, Sueves, Franks, Burgundians, and other barbarians, and committed dreadful ravages there. Those who remained in ^d Sarmatia, were afterwards subdued by Attila, and served, with their princes, in his army, when he invaded Gaul in 451 ^h. Upon that prince's death, they shook off the yoke, and, having recovered their antient liberty, submitted to Marcian, then emperor, who allowed them to settle in Pannonia, Mæsia, and the other provinces bordering on the Danube, where they continued quiet, till they were reduced by the Goths, the most powerful nation in those parts. Such of them as resided among the Goths, became, in process of time, one nation with them. From those, who remained in Sarmatia, the present Poles and Tartars are thought to have sprung.

The Dacians.

The Dacians.

Their origin.

THE Dacians were, according to Jornandes ⁱ, a Gotbic nation, came originally ^e out of Scandinavia, and, settling in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, made themselves masters of Scythia, Mæsia, Thrace, and Dacia, driving out the antient inhabitants. This seems agreeable to what we read in Herodotus, viz. that the antient Scythians, who, coming out of Syria, had crossed the Araxes, and settled in the country which was afterwards called Scythia, were, in process of time, driven from their seats by the Cimmerians, that is, by the Goths, who, according to Jornandes, settled first in Cimmeria. Dion observes, that the same people were called Dacians by the Romans, and Getes by the Greeks ^k; and Justin, the compiler of Trogus Pompeius, tells us in express terms, that the Dacians were the offspring of the Getes ^l. Now, that the Getes and Goths were one and the same people, we have sufficiently proved above, ^f in our history of the Goths. Some writers derive the Dacians from the Dacæ, a people dwelling, according to Strabo, near Hyrkania in Asiatic Scythia. But this opinion is intirely founded on the similitude of the names Daci and Dacæ. The Dacians, in more

- a ancient times, were known by the name of Davi; for the termination dava was common to most of their towns and cities, as Comidava, Sergidava, Decidava, Marcidava, &c. and the names of Geta and Davus were, among the Athenians, peculiar to slaves, who usually bore the name of the nation to which they belonged. As to the ancient country of the Dacians, it comprised the present Moldavia, Valachia, and part of Transylvania. The whole nation was afterwards transplanted into Illyricum by the emperor Aurelian, and the country they held there is the Dacia, of which the authors speak, who wrote in the fourth and fifth centuries, the Goths being then masters of ancient Dacia. The Dacians were deemed the most warlike and formidable of all the barbarous nations, not only on account of their natural courage, and great strength, which enabled them to endure the toils of war, but because they looked upon death, not as the end of the present, but as the beginning of a more happy life; whence they were as ready, says the emperor Julian, to expose themselves to the greatest dangers, as to undertake a journey^m. This doctrine they learnt of one Xamolxis, a great philosopher, whom Jornandes supposes to have been king of the Getes or Goths dwelling in Thrace, Dacia, and Mæsia; but other writers speak of him only as a disciple, and some as a slave, of the celebrated *Pythagoras*ⁿ. Suidas thinks he flourished long before Pythagoras^o. He was by birth a Gete or Goth, and is said to have been held in great veneration among his countrymen during his life, and, after his death, to have been worshipped by them with divine honours^p. The Dacians were governed by their own kings, and agreed in customs, manners, laws, and religion, with the other Gothic nations, of whom we have spoken above. The first of their kings we find mentioned in history is Oroles, in whose reign they made war upon the Basternæ; but not having behaved on a certain occasion with their usual courage, the king, by way of punishment, ordered them to lay their heads, when they slept, where their feet should lie, and to perform the same offices about their wives, which it was customary for their wives to perform about them, till such time as, by a more gallant behaviour, they had retrieved their lost reputation^q. In the reign of Augustus they broke first into the empire; but in what place, we are not told. All we know is, that, at the approach of Drusus, sent against them by Augustus then in Gaul, they retired to their own country^r. In the year of the christian æra 69. the legions quartered in Mæsia being by Otho ordered into Italy, to make head against Vitellius there, the Dacians, who dwelt beyond the Danube, and never allowed the Romans, says Tacitus, any respite, but when they did not think it safe to attack them, laying hold of that opportunity, crossed the Danube, and, entering Mæsia, made themselves masters of part of that province. But Mucianus passing soon after through Mæsia on his march from the east into Italy, obliged them to abandon the country they had seized, leaving there Fon-teius Agrippa, formerly proconsul of Asia, with a body of troops to awe the barbarians^s. But the following year, Agrippa being killed by the Sarmatians, the Dacians broke into Pannonia, and, having plundered that province, advanced into Mæsia, where they joined the Sarmatians; but were soon after driven out with great slaughter by Rubrius Gallus, whom Vespasian, then emperor, had dispatched against them^t. About the year 86. the Dacians having anew ravaged the neighbouring provinces, and committed every-where great cruelties, Domitian, then emperor, resolved to march against them in person. Duras was at that time king of the Dacians; but he, by an instance of moderation seldom to be met with in history, of his own accord yielded the sovereignty to Decebalus, because he thought him better qualified for it than himself: and truly Decebalus was, according to Dion^u, one of the best commanders of his time, knew what was proper to be done, and how it ought to be put in execution; was very dextrous both in attacking and retiring, in laying ambuscades, and engaging in the open field; was never at a loss how to improve a victory, or how to support himself when conquered^v. Either Duras or Decebalus, but more likely the latter, is by Orosius^w and Jornandes^x called Diurpaneus. As for the issue of this war in general, Tacitus tells us, that, soon after the return of Agricola to Rome, several Roman armies were destroyed in Mæsia and Dacia, some through the cowardice, others by the rashness, of their leaders; that the legions and the troops of the allies were taken prisoners even in the fortified towns; insomuch that the Romans had reason to apprehend the loss, not only of the country bordering on the Danube, but of a intire provinces. News was daily brought of some new misfortune, and every year distinguished by some remarkable defeat ^p. Our historian did not think it safe to give us a more particular account of these misfortunes, or to mention the number of the slain on the side of the Romans in so many engagements, imitating therein the reserve of Salust, and some other historians, on like occasions ^q. Every true Roman, says Tacitus, wished then to see the command of the armies vested in Agricola. He was even proposed to the emperor by several of his freed-men, some of them hoping by that means to hasten his ruin, while others had nothing in view but the reputation of their master, and the welfare of the state; but that jealous prince dreaded nothing so much as to trust a man of courage with the command of his armies ^r. As for the ^b particulars of this war, we have related them in the history of Domitian's reign; and therefore shall only observe here, that the Dacians, in the first battle they fought, utterly defeated Appius or Oppius Sabinus, governor of Mæsia, who was killed in the engagement; that, upon his death, and the defeat of his army, they laid waste, without controul, all Mæsia, and made themselves masters of several castles and strong holds; that Domitian, to put a stop to their ravages, hastened into Illyricum, with almost all the forces of the empire; that thereupon Decebalus sent deputies to sue for peace; but the emperor, rejecting his proposals, dispatched Cornelius Fuscus, then præfectus prætorio, against him, with the flower of his army, who, having passed the Danube, and engaged the Dacians, was by them cut off, with almost his whole ^c army. This overthrow obliged Domitian, who was already returned to Rome, to hasten back into Illyricum, whence he detached one of his generals, named Julian, against the enemy, not caring to expose his own person. Julian gained a complete victory, and put such numbers of the Dacians to the sword, that Decebalus, no longer able to keep the field, dispatched ambassadors anew to sue for peace; which Domitian upon no terms would grant him. But in the mean time, instead of improving his late victory, and pressing Decebalus, already reduced to great straits, he turned his arms against the Marcomans and Quadians, and, being by the former defeated and put to flight, he was glad to come to an agreement with Decebalus; and accordingly dispatched ambassadors to him, with more advantageous proposals than he could ^d have asked or expected. Decebalus, reflecting on the bad situation of his affairs, thought it adviseable to accept the emperor's offers; but instead of waiting upon him in person, as Domitian desired, he appointed his brother Diegis to supply his room. Diegis delivered up to the emperor some arms, and a small number of prisoners, and received, at his hands, the diadem in his brother's name ^e. The emperor besides agreed to pay to Decebalus a yearly sum, and sent him, at his request, a great number of artificers of all professions, such artificers especially as were well versed in the art of contriving and making military engines. This yearly pension, or, as we may call it, tribute, was punctually paid, so long as Domitian lived; and nevertheless, after this shameful peace, he wrote to the senate boasting letters, as if ^e he had obliged Decebalus to submit to what terms he had thought proper to prescribe; nay, he dispatched to the senate the ambassadors of Decebalus, with a letter of submission, which he pretended to have been written to him by that prince, but others deemed supposititious ^f. The senate decreed him a triumph, and he triumphed accordingly over the Dacians ^g, and at the same time, according to Eusebius, over the Marcomans, by whom he had been defeated. The sycophants of those days, especially the poets, extolled these pretended victories, comparing, nay, and preferring them to the victories of Alexander and Cæsar. But they were, or hoped to be, paid for their lying encomiums and flatteries. The war with the Dacians lasted, according to Eusebius, from the year 86. to 90. and Domitian is supposed to have ^f triumphed in 91. After the conclusion of the peace, he caused a magnificent monument to be erected in the country of the Dacians in honour of Fuscus, who was killed there ^h.

THE yearly sum, which Domitian had agreed to pay to Decebalus, was punctually transmitted to him during the reign of that prince, and likewise the reign of his successor Nerva; but Trajan, who succeeded Nerva, would by no means submit to

Hereupon the Dacians began to prepare for war, soliciting the neighbouring nations to join them, especially the Iazygians, at that time a powerful and war-like people; but they declining, under various pretences, to break with the empire, Decebalus made war first upon them, and seized a considerable part of their country, They seize on part of the country of the Iazygians. which Trajan, after he had conquered the Dacians, refused to restore to them, tho' they had lost it for their fidelity to the Romans *. Dion, who relates this, does not tell us, that Trajan alleged, or had, any reason for not complying with the just demand of the Iazygians. Decebalus soon after turned his arms against the Romans, and, passing the Danube, began to plunder the neighbouring provinces. With this
- b Trajan was no-ways displeased; for he wanted only a pretence to make war on the Dacians, whose growing power gave him no small umbrage. Besides, he was informed, that Decebalus maintained a friendly correspondence with Pacorus king of the Parthians, whom he had presented with one Callidromus taken in Mæsia by one of his lieutenants during the war with Domitian. The good understanding between these two powers gave Trajan no small jealousy. He therefore no sooner heard, that Decebalus Their war with Trajan. Year after Christ 101. had crossed the Danube, and committed some hostilities in the Roman territories, than, drawing together a mighty army, he marched, with incredible expedition, to the banks of the Danube, passed that river without opposition, Decebalus not being apprised of his arrival, and, entering Dacia, laid waste the country far and near.
- c Decebalus however, not in the least dismayed, having armed the youth of the country, marched boldly to meet Trajan; whereupon a bloody engagement ensued, in which great numbers fell on both sides; but the Romans in the end gained the victory. It was on this occasion, that, linen being wanted to bind the wounds of the Romans, Trajan tore his own robes to supply that want. The emperor, pursuing the advantages of his victory, followed the enemy close, and, not allowing them time to levy new forces, he harassed them without intermission to such a degree, that Decebalus was in the end obliged to send deputies with proposals for an accommodation. Trajan appointed Licinius Sura, and Claudius Libianus, to treat with them; but the deputies not agreeing, Trajan pursued his ravages, advancing from hill to hill, not without
- d great danger, till he arrived in the neighbourhood of Zermizegethusa, the metropolis of Dacia. On the other hand, Maximus, one of the emperor's generals, reduced several places, in one of which he took the sister of Decebalus prisoner, and recovered a Roman standard, which had been lost when Fuscus was defeated and killed in the reign of Domitian. Thus Decebalus was obliged at last to submit, and comply with the hard terms, which Trajan thought fit to prescribe, and we have related elsewhere *. However, three years after, he renewed the war; but, being overcome by Trajan in several encounters, and stripped of his dominions, he chose rather to put an end to his life, than to live in subjection. His head was immediately brought to Trajan, and by him sent to Rome. Upon the death of Decebalus, Dacia was intirely Dacia reduced by Trajan to a Roman province. Year after Christ 105. subdued, and reduced to a Roman province. The emperor caused several castles to be built in the country, and placed garisons in them, to keep the inhabitants in awe. He likewise planted a great number of colonies, distributing lands among the poor citizens of Rome, and of the other cities of Italy, who were willing to settle in Dacia. The Hungarian writers mention several cities in their country, and likewise in Transylvania, which on this occasion were, as they endeavour to prove, built or peopled by the Romans. But of Trajan's war with the Dacians, and the intire reduction of their country, we have spoken at length in our Roman history *; and therefore have only hinted here at some of the chief events. Dacia, thus reduced to a province, was governed by a Roman magistrate, with the title of proprætor, as appears from
- f some antient inscriptions *. The emperor Adrian, who succeeded Trajan in 117. was for abandoning Dacia; but the regard he had for the Roman citizens, who had settled there in great numbers, made him alter the resolution he had taken. However, to prevent the barbarians dwelling on the other side the Danube from invading the Roman territories, he caused the famous bridge to be broken down, which his predecessor had built over that river, and we have described in our Roman history b. In the year 138. the first of the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Dacians attempted to They attempt in vain to shake off the yoke. shake off the yoke; but the rebellion was soon quelled by the generals, whom the emperor dispatched against them^c. In 168. they joined the Alemans, Marcomans, Quadians, and Sarmatians, against the empire; but the two emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus marching against them, they submitted anew. However, a battle, it seems, was fought, and the victory gained by the Romans; for in this very year the two emperors took the title of imperator the fifth time^d; which they never did but on occasion of some victory. In 180. twelve thousand Dacians being driven out of their country by other barbarians, Sabinianus, governor of that province, prevailed upon them to settle in another part of Dacia, while they were in full march to join the Alemans, then at war with the Romans^e. In the reign of Caracalla, the Dacians seem to have revolted anew; for we are told, that some skirmishes were fought between them and that prince, and that they gave hostages, as a pledge of their future fidelity^f. Upon the reduction of Dacia in 105. great numbers of the natives, abandoning their ancient country, settled among the neighbouring barbarians. These made frequent inroads into the empire, with the Sarmatians, Quadians, Alemans, &c. and their descendants, in the reign of Maximinus, joining the Sarmatians, committed dreadful ravages in the Roman provinces bordering on the Danube; but were, in all likelihood, repulsed with great loss by the emperor, since the year after they broke into the empire Macrinus took the titles of Sarmaticus and Dacicus, as appears from several inscriptions found in France and Spain^g. In the year 265. the thirteenth of Gallienus's reign, the Goths, and other barbarous nations, made themselves masters of Dacia; for the loss of that province is reckoned among the many misfortunes of that prince's unhappy reign^h. About nine years after, it was in great part recovered by Aurelian; but he, finding he could not maintain it in the midst of so many barbarous nations without an immense charge, withdrew the troops appointed to defend it, and with them the inhabitants and their families, allotting them lands in Mæsia and Dardania, which he made a new province, called likewise Dacia, and by Laëtantius New Dacia. This province lay on the Roman side of the Danube, and is placed by Vopiscus between the two Mæsias. It comprised, according to Sanson, part of the present Bulgaria and Servia, and had Sardica for its metropolis. The Goths seem to have seized on the ancient Dacia abandoned by Aurelian. Thus were the ancient Dacians either transplanted into the Roman territories, or dispersed among the neighbouring barbarians beyond the Danube, with whom they became one nation.

The Lombards.

The Lombards THE Longobards, Langobards, or Lombards, who, in process of time, made themselves masters of Italy, and from whom part of that country, formerly known by the name of Cisalpine Gaul, is still called Lombardy, are first mentioned in history by Prosper Aquitanus, bishop of Rhegium, in the year 379. That writer, beginning a chronicle of his own in the said year, after having copied till then the chronicle of St. Jerom, tells us, that the Lombards, abandoning the most distant coasts of the ocean, and their native country Scandinavia, and seeking new settlements, as they were overstocked with people at home, attacked first, and overcame, about this time, the Vandals, then in Germany. They were headed by two chiefs, named Iboreus and Aionus, upon whose death, which happened about ten years after, they created Agil-mund, son to the latter, their first king, who reigned thirty-three yearsⁱ. It is to be observed, that, long before Prosper's time, mention is made of a people named Longobards; for that name occurs in Ptolemy, Tacitus, and Strabo; nay, Maroboduus, who was contemporary with Augustus, is by Tacitus styled king of the Sueves, Marcomans, and Longobards^k. In the time of Tiberius they entered into an alliance with the Cheruscans, under the conduct of the celebrated Arminius, and made war upon Maroboduus, from whom they had revolted^l. In the year 170. the ninth of M. Aurelius's reign, six thousand of them, who had passed the Danube, and, in conjunction with the Marcomans, invaded the Roman dominions, were defeated by Vindex and Candidus, and obliged to sue for peace^m. But these Longobards, by most geogra-

- a phers placed between the Elbe and the Oder, were, according to Grotius, a German nation, and a quite different people from the Longobards, who are mentioned by Pro- per, and afterwards settled in Italy°. The latter were, according to Paul Warne- frid deacon of Aquileia, commonly known by the name of Paulus Diaconus, and the most credible writers, originally a Gotbic nation, and the same with the Gepidæ, of whom we have spoken above. The Gepidæ, coming, with the other Gotbs, out of Scandinavia in three ships, as we have related above, stopped at the mouth of the Vistula or the Wieffer. From thence they advanced to the banks of the Danube, and, settling there, infested, as we read in Vopiscus, the Roman territories with frequent incursions. In process of time, the Gepidæ fell out among themselves; and from this division sprung the Longobards, who are therefore, as Salmasius° and Constantine Porphyrogenitus p observe, called sometimes Gepidæ, and sometimes Longobards.
 They wandered from place to place, often shifting their seats, and were thence called Winili, that is, wanderers; which denomination has induced some writers to think, that the Lombards and Vandals, named also Winili, were one and the same people.
 As these two nations were constantly changing their habitations, they were thence called Winili, or wanderers; but, tho' agreeing in name, they continued to be two distinct nations. The learned Sherringham is of opinion, that the Longobards mentioned by Strabo, Tacitus, and Ptolemy, were of Gotbic extraction; and that they were left in Germany by the celebrated Woden on his march through that country from Scythia into Scandinavia; but at the same time that writer allows the Lombards, who afterwards made themselves masters of Italy, to have been a different nation, come several ages after out of Scandinavia, their common country q. As for the name of Longobards, some derive it from the word lack or lache, signifying in the German language water, because the Lombards, while in Scandinavia, lived in marshes, or near the sea r. Others think it comes from the two German words langen barden, or bellebarden, that is, from the long halberds, which they suppose to have been used by them. But Paulus Dia- conus, who was himself a Lombard, though born in Italy, tells us, that they were called Longobards from the length of their beards; and with him agree Constantine Porphyrogenitus°, Otho Frisingensis°, Gunterus°, and Grotius°. After they had wandered through several countries, shifting their seats, they settled at length in Panno- nia, which they held for the space of forty-two years, and then marching into Italy, under the conduct of their king Alboinus, made themselves masters of the greater part of that country. We have observed above, that, upon the death of their leaders Iboreus and Aion, they appointed Agilmond their first king. He was succeeded by the following princes, Lamiscus, Leta, Ildeock, Gudeoc, Claffus, Talus, Wachus, Walter- rius, Audoinus, and Alboinus, the first of that nation who reigned in Italy. As for the manners of the Lombards, Paulus Diaconus tells us, that no violence or oppression, no treachery or compulsion, was practised among them; and that every man enjoyed his property undisturbed, and followed his profession, without the least apprehension of danger. But that writer was perhaps somewhat prejudiced in favour of his countrymen; for Procopius writes, that those Lombards, who had served under Narses against the Gotbs in Italy, were sent back to their own country, on account of the disorders they committed; and pope Gregory, surnamed the Great, who was but too well acquainted with the Lombards, calls them, in several parts of his works, a most wicked nation. Perhaps they neither deserved the encomiums of Paulus, nor the reproaches of Gregory; at least it does not appear from their conduct, while masters of Italy, that they did. Paulus Diaconus, speaking of their dress, tells us, that their cloaths were loose, and for the most part of linen, such as the Anglo-Saxons wore, being interwoven with various colours; that their shoes were open to the end of their foot, and that they used to button or lace them°. From some antient paintings it appears, that they shaved the back part of their heads; but that their hair was long before, their locks being parted, and laid on each side their foreheads. As for their history, we shall here relate what we find in Paulus Diaconus; but will not take upon us to vouch the truth of what that author writes.

THE Gotbs in Scandinavia, overstocked with people at home, sent out frequent colonies in quest of new settlements. One, among the rest, leaving their native country, put to sea in three ships: one of these sailed slower than the other two, and a stopped in the end at the Vistula. The Goths on board this ship were called, as we have observed above, Gepidæ, from a word in their language signifying slow. These Gepidæ, unwilling to proceed farther, settled in an island formed by the Vistula, and continued there, till their numbers were so increased, that the island could no longer support them. They then began to roam about the neighbouring countries in quest of new seats; and thence were called Winili, or wanderers. They quarrelled at length among themselves, and agreed to part. Paulus Diaconus writes, that the country, where they had settled, being no longer able to maintain them, they divided themselves into three parts, one whereof, on whom the lot should fall, was to go in quest of new habitations. But most other writers suppose the Longobards to have sprung from b the division of the Gepidæ quarrelling among themselves. Be that as it will, those who went out, chose for their leaders Iboreus and Aion, the sons of one Gambra, a woman universally respected on account of her wisdom. Under their conduct they first settled in a country, by Paulus Diaconus called Scoringa, bordering on that which was then held by the Vandals, who, soon after their arrival, gave them to understand, that they must either pay tribute, or prepare for war. The two leaders, by advice of their mother, returned answer, That, though they were few in number, they preferred war to servitude and subjection. Hereupon a bloody engagement ensued, in which the Vandals were utterly defeated. But the Gepidæ, whom we shall henceforth call Lombards, though that name was perhaps given them afterwards, c being sorely distressed with famine, resolved to abandon Scoringa, and settle in a more fruitful country. They set out accordingly for Mauringa; but the Assipitti denying them a passage through their territories, they resolved to attempt it by force. In order to strike terror into the enemy, who were far superior to them in number, they gave out, that they had among them Cynocephali, or men with dogs heads; which report so terrified the Assipitti, that, not caring to engage so dreadful an enemy, and having one among them of extraordinary strength and courage, they resolved to put the whole to the issue of a single combat; which they no sooner proposed to the Lombards, than the proposal was accepted, the two nations agreeing, that, if the champion of the Assipitti should overcome, the passage should be denied; but, if the d Lombard proved victorious, the rest should be allowed to pass unmolested. The two champions engaged in the sight of both armies; and the Lombard having gained the victory, a passage was granted to the whole nation, pursuant to the agreement. Upon their arrival in Mauringa, to increase the number of their warriors, they set all their slaves at liberty, who, though of different countries, became one nation with them. From Mauringa, where they staid but a short time, they proceeded to Gotbland, and there made themselves masters of Antbabet, Balbab, and Urgundiab, which our historian conjectures to be names of towns. In Gotbland died their two leaders Iboreus and Aion, upon whose death the Lombards resolved to chuse a king, after the manner of other nations; and accordingly conferred that dignity on Agil- e mund the son of Aion, who is said to have been killed by the Bulgarians, after he had reigned thirty-three years. He was succeeded by Lamiscus or Lamissio, so called from the word lama, signifying in their language a fish-pond; for his mother, by profession a harlot, is said to have thrown him, with six other males, of whom she was delivered at the same time, into a fish-pond. Lamissio was luckily saved by Agilmund, who, passing that way, and observing the children, stopped his horse, and stretching out his spear to them, one of them took hold of it, and was by that means saved. The king, not doubting but he would one day prove a great man, ordered him to be brought up with great care, calling him Lamis-shon, that is, the son of a fish-pond. He is said to have gained a victory over the Amazons, and to have behaved, on several f other occasions, with such resolution and intrepidity, that, upon the death of Agilmund, the Lombards, with one voice, proclaimed him king. He no sooner found himself invested with this dignity, than, bent upon revenging the death of his predecessor, he marched against the Bulgarians; and though his men gave way at first, yet in the end, being animated by the words and example of their new king, they gained a complete victory. Lamissio was succeeded by Leta or Lechu, and he, after a reign of near forty years, by Ildeock or Hildebock, as was Ildeock by Gudeck. In the reign of the latter, Odoacer king of Italy having killed Felctbeus, king of the Rugians dwelling beyond the Danube, and either put to the sword, or carried into captivity, the whole nation, the Lombards came and settled in their country, then destitute g of

- a of inhabitants. During their stay in Rugiland (for so the country of the Rugians is called by our historian) their king Gudgock died, and was succeeded by his son Claffus, after whom reigned Tatus, in whose time the Lombards, leaving Rugiland, settled in the champaign country bordering on the Danube, where a war breaking out between them and the Heruli, the latter were defeated with great slaughter, their king Rodulphus being slain, with the flower of their nation. The victorious Lombards divided the rich plunder; but Tatus their king took for his share only the standard of Rodulphus, called bandum, with the helmet he used to wear in battle. Not long after, Tatus was slain by Wacho, son to his brother Zuchilo. Aldicbus, the son of Tatus, endeavoured to revenge his father's death, and make good the just claim he had to the crown; but was in several encounters defeated by Wacho, and in the end obliged to take refuge among the neighbouring Gepidæ. Wacho is said to have subdued the Sueves. He had three wives, viz. Ranicunda, daughter to the king of the Thuringians; Austrigosa, daughter of the king of the Gepidæ; and Salinga, daughter of the king of the Heruli. By the latter he had Walterius, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned about seven years. After Walterius came Audoinus, in whose reign a war being kindled between the Lombards and the Gepidæ, a bloody battle was fought, in which the latter were utterly defeated. The signal victory gained on this occasion by the Lombards, was chiefly owing to Alboinus, the king's son; for the young prince having engaged and killed with his own hand Thorismund, the son of Turisind king of the Gepidæ, the enemy, who had fought till then with great resolution and intrepidity, hearing the king's son was killed, betook themselves to a precipitous flight. The victorious Lombards, upon their return home, begged their king to indulge his son, by way of reward for his gallant behaviour, the honour of dining with him, which was deemed no less honourable among the Lombards, than a triumph was among the Romans. The king answered, That, by an antient and immemorial custom among the Lombards, that honour and mark of distinction was not to be granted, even to the princes of the blood royal, till they had publicly appeared in the armour of some foreign prince killed in battle with their own hand. Hereupon Alboinus, attended only by forty resolute young men, repaired to the court of Turisind, to demand the armour of that prince's son, whom he had killed in the above-mentioned battle, being resolved, if any violence was offered him, to sell his life dear. The king received him in a most obliging manner, entertained him at his table, and, admiring his courage and intrepidity, complied with his demand, and dismissed him not only unmolested, but loaded with rich presents. Upon his return home, after he had publicly appeared in the armour of Thorismund, he was, at a grand entertainment, allowed to sit at table with the king his father. In the reign of Audoinus, the Lombards were, by the emperor Justinian, allowed to settle in Pannonia. Thus far Paulus Diaconus of the various migrations, wars, and conquests, of the Lombards, from their first leaving Scandinavia, to their settling in Pannonia. His account is, as the reader must have observed, interwoven with some fables; but, in the main, he agrees with Prosper Aquitanus, who wrote before his time; with Erchempertus, who flourished after; and likewise with Procopius, who lived in the reign of the emperor Justinian, whose secretary he was, and consequently well acquainted with the Lombards. The latter writer, in speaking of the above-mentioned war between the Lombards and the Heruli, tells us, that the Lombards had been formerly obliged to pay tribute to the Heruli, of which no notice is taken by our historian. The names of the various countries, in which the Lombards are said by Paulus Diaconus to have settled, have occasioned great debates among the later historians and geographers, and several conjectures have been offered; but all we know with any foundation is, that the countries mentioned by that writer, lay between the mouth of the Vistula, where the Lombards coming from Scandinavia are supposed to have stopped, and Pannonia, where they settled in Justinian's time.

then known by the name of Avars, took the field, and, in the first battle that was fought, killed the king of the Gepids with his own hand, put their army to the rout, and, pursuing his victory, cut such numbers of them in pieces, that they ceased to be a nation, as we have related above. Alboinus, having caused the deceased king's head to be struck off, made a cup of his skull, called, in the language of the Lombards, ſebala, which he made use of in all public entertainments. However, having taken, among many other captives of great distinction, the late king's daughter, by name Rofimunda, he married her upon the death of his former wife Clodisvinta ^a. By this victory Alboinus gained great fame and reputation, not only among the Gothic nations, whose bards celebrated his prowess and valour in their poems, but likewise among the Romans; insomuch that Narſes, who had been sent by Justinian to drive the Goths out of Italy, courted his friendship, and, entering into an alliance with him, solicited his assistance to put in execution the commission he had received. Alboinus sent him a choice body of men, who, crossing the Adriatic gulf, landed in Italy, and, joining the Romans, distinguished themselves in that battle, in which Totila was killed. The war being ended, they were sent home loaded with rich presents, continuing faithful allies to the Romans, whom they assisted on all occasions, so long as they inhabited Pannonia ^b. Thus Paulus Diaconus. But Procopius writes, that the Lombards, who came to the assistance of Narſes, committed every-where unheard-of disorders, pillaging the open country, burning the villages, and not sparing even the holy virgins; insomuch that the Roman general was obliged to send them home before the war was ended, charging the two generals Valerianus and Damianus to accompany them, with a body of troops, to the confines of the empire, in order to restrain them from plundering the countries through which they passed ^c. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Narſes, whom we may justly style the deliverer of Italy, maintained, so long as he governed that country, a strict friendship and correspondence with Alboinus king of the Lombards; so that it was no difficult matter for him to persuade that warlike and ambitious prince to attempt the conquest of Italy. Of this memorable event Paulus Diaconus, the author who deserves most credit in what concerns the Lombards, gives us the following account: Narſes having, with the assistance of the Lombards, delivered Italy from the yoke of the Goths, sent back into Pannonia his victorious auxiliaries, loaded with rich presents. There they continued faithful to their engagements with the Romans, whom they were ready to assist on all occasions. In the mean time Justinian dying, Narſes, who governed Italy with an absolute sway, and had acquired immense wealth, was by the Italians accused to the emperor Justin II. the successor of Justinian, and to the empress Sophia, as if he aspired at the sovereignty of the country. Hereupon he was recalled, and Longinus was sent to succeed him; nay, as he was an eunuch, the empress is reported to have said, that his employment at Constantinople should be to distribute, in the apartment of her women, the portion of wool, which each of them was to spin. Narſes, enraged at this severe and insolent reflection, I will begin, said he, such a web, as she shall never be able to finish; and immediately dispatched messengers to the Lombards, inviting them into Italy. With the messengers he sent several presents to Alboinus, with whom he was well acquainted, and some of the best fruits Italy afforded, as baits to allure him and his subjects to attempt the conquest of so fertile a country ^d. Thus Paulus Diaconus. But Baronius ^e, and some other writers, reject this account as fabulous, alleging, that Narſes had been recalled the year before by Justin, at whose inauguration he assisted, and continued in great credit at Constantinople. This they assert upon the authority of Chorippus, a poet and grammarian of Africa, who flourished at that time, and was then at Constantinople, where he saw Narſes present at the emperor Justin's coronation, and attending him soon after, when he gave audience to the ambassadors of the Avars. ^f But this objection the learned Petavius has intirely removed, shewing, that Chorippus speaks of another Narſes, much younger than the celebrated commander; and that there were three of that name living at the same time, viz. the renowned deliverer of Italy, who died at Rome some time after he had called in the Lombards; the brother of Aratius; and the Narſes whom Chorippus mentions in his poem, commending him on account of his tall stature, comely countenance, graceful person, and beautiful

- a hair (K). It is surprising Baronius should think, that such a description suited an old eunuch. The Narſes, of whom Chorippus speaks, was burnt alive in the year 605, by the command of Phocas. Baronius adds, that, according to our historian, Narſes dying at Rome, his body was put into a leaden coffin, and conveyed from Rome to Constantinople, where it was honourably interred¹. Now, it is not by any means probable, says Baronius, that the emperor would have suffered any honours to be paid him after his death, had he treacherously delivered up Italy to the Lombards. To this Pelavius answers, that his treachery was not known either to the Greeks or Latins, till some time after his death, when it was discovered by the Lombards themselves owning, that they had been invited into Italy by Narſes. That brave commander was, according to Paulus Diaconus, a man of great piety, and had, as we are told by *Evagrius*² and *Nicephorus*³, a particular veneration for the virgin Mary, imploring her assistance before he entered upon any enterprize, and ascribing the success, that attended his arms, to her protection; and this is what induced Baronius to write in his favour, and endeavour to clear him from the treachery, with which he is charged by our historian.

- But to resume the thread of our history: Alboinus, highly pleased with the opportunity that offered of invading Italy, a country with which his Lombards were already well acquainted, began, without loss of time, to make the necessary preparations for his intended expedition. In the first place, he solicited the assistance of the Saxons, his old friends and allies, promising to share with them his future conquests. The Saxons readily closed with his proposals, and sent him twenty thousand men, with their wives and children⁴. He likewise received powerful succours from other nations, namely from the Gepidæ, then his subjects, from the Bulgarians, Sarmatians, Pannonians, Sueves, Noricans, &c.⁵. Having thus drawn together a numerous and powerful army, before he set out, he entered into a strict alliance with the Hunns, the most powerful of his neighbours, leaving Pannonia to them, upon this condition, that, if the expedition he was going upon should not succeed, the Lombards should be allowed to re-enter upon their former possessions. Having concerted such other measures as he thought necessary for so great an undertaking, he set out with his whole nation, their wives and children, carrying with them all their moveables, and whatever they had of value, and, leaving Pannonia after a stay of forty-two years there, took their route towards Italy. They began their march in the month of April, just after Easter, which fell that year on the first day of the month, in the first indiction, in the third year of Justin II. the ninth of John III. bishop of Rome, and in the year of the christian æra 568. Alboinus, with his army, and the promiscuous multitude that followed it, arrived, by the way of Istria, on the borders of Italy, which he entered without the least opposition, and, advancing through the province of Venetia to the city of Aquileia, found the whole country abandoned, the inhabitants being fled to the neighbouring islands in the Adriatic. He no sooner appeared before Aquileia, than the gates were opened to him by the few inhabitants who had the courage to stay, the rest having, upon the news of his approach, fled with their most valuable effects, following therein the example of their patriarch Paulinus, who, carrying with him all the utensils of his church, had taken refuge in an island. From Aquileia Alboinus advanced to Forum Julii, now Friuli, which likewise surrendered. In this city he passed the winter, dispersing his troops among the neighbouring villages, where they were plentifully supplied by the natives with all sorts of provisions. During the winter, Alboinus reduced the city of Friuli, and its territory, to a dukedom, conferring the title of duke on his nephew Gisulfus, whom he appointed to guard and govern those territories, which were, in a manner, the gates of Italy, through which every invader must first force his passage. Thus Friuli was erected into a duchy, and such it has continued ever since. The following year 569. Alboinus, as soon as the ^a season allowed him to take the field, moved forward with his army, and, without the least opposition, made himself master of Trivigi and Oderzo. From thence he marched to Monte Selce, Vicenza, Verona, and Trent, which surrendered to him upon the first summons. In each of these cities he left a strong garrison of Lombards, under the command of an officer, whom he distinguished with the title of duke; but these dukes were only officers and governors of cities, and bore that title no longer than the prince thought fit to continue them in their command or government. Such likewise were the first dukes in Gaul, as Paulus Æmilus well observes¹. Alboinus left Padua, and several other cities, behind him, either because they lay too much out of his way, or because they were well garrisoned, and it would take up too much of ^b his time to besiege them. Thus ended the second campaign of the Lombards in Italy. The third proved no less successful; for entering Liguria upon the return of the spring, the inhabitants were so terrified at his approach, that, leaving their habitations, they fled, with such of their effects as they could carry off, to the most remote and inaccessible parts of the mountains; so that the cities of Brescia, Bergamo, Lodi, Como, and the other towns of Liguria, quite to the Alps, being almost destitute of inhabitants, received him, without attempting to make the least resistance. He then advanced to Milan, the capital of Liguria, which, after a short siege, surrendered, most of the inhabitants, seeing there were not forces in the place sufficient for its defence, being retired, with Honoratus their bishop, to Genoa. Upon the reduction of Milan, ^c the Lombards, with joyful acclamations, proclaimed and saluted Alboinus king of Italy, lifting him up upon a shield in the midst of the army, according to the custom of their nation, and presenting him with a lance, which, among them, was the ensign of royalty. From this time historians date the beginning of the kingdom of the Lombards in Italy, which lasted for the space of two hundred years, and upwards.

Alboinus, now vested with royal authority, marched from Milan to Pavia; but meeting there with a vigorous resistance, as the place was well garrisoned, and furnished with great plenty of provisions, he left part of his army to push on the siege, and with the rest reduced Piacenza, Parma, Modena, and the other inland cities both in Emilia and Tuscany. He then marched into Umbria, and there made himself ^d master of Spoleto, which he made the metropolis of Umbria; and, erecting the city and its territory into a dukedom, appointed Feroaldus, whom he dignified with the title of duke, governor of that district. The governors of the other cities of note were honoured with the same title, as were the cities with that of duchies, which title most of them retain to this day^m. From Umbria Alboinus returned to the siege of Pavia, which at length surrendered, after it had held out with great resolution for three years, and some months. The king, highly incensed against the inhabitants, had vowed to put them all to the sword; but we are told, that, as he was entering the city on horseback, his horse fell under him in the middle of the gate, and could not by any means be raised, till, at the persuasion of one of his followers, he revoked ^e the cruel vow he had made; when his horse starting up of himself, he proceeded to the palace built by Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths, whither the people, to whom he had promised indemnity, crowded to see him, and to swear allegiance to their new princeⁿ. As Pavia was a city of great strength, and conveniently situated, Alboinus and his successors chose it for the place of their residence; whence it became the metropolis of the kingdom of the Lombards, and was raised above all the other cities subject to them. Alboinus, now master of great part of Italy, that is, of all Venetia, Liguria, Emilia, Ættruria, and Umbria, resolved to establish peace and good order throughout the countries he had already reduced, before he made any further conquests. But he was in the mean time slain by the treachery of his wife, in the fourth ^f year of his reign. This princess, called Rosamund, was the daughter of Cunimund, king of the Gepidae, whom Alboinus had killed with his own hand in battle, and made a cup of his skull, as we have related above. Our historian assures us, that he himself had seen this cup^o. Though Alboinus thus insulted the memory of his conquered enemy, yet, upon the death of his first wife, he married his daughter, and was, by her contrivance, murdered on the following occasion: As the king was one day feasting at Verona with his chief favourites, and principal officers, in the height of his mirth he sent for the queen, and, filling the detested cup, commanded her to drink

- a merrily with her father. Rosamund, struck with horror, hurried out of the room, and, highly incensed against her husband for thus barbarously triumphing over the misfortunes of her family, resolved, at all events, to make him pay dear for such an inhuman and affronting conduct. Accordingly she immediately discovered her intention to Helmichild, the king's schilpor, as the Lombards called him, that is, shield-bearer, a youth of great boldness and intrepidity. Helmichild peremptorily refused to imbrue his hands in the blood of his sovereign, or to be any-ways accessory to his death; and in this resolution he persisted, till he was, by a shameful stratagem, forced by the queen to a compliance; for she, knowing that he carried on an intrigue with one of her ladies, placed herself one night in her bed, and, receiving the youth, indulged him, as if she had been his own mistress, in his amorous desires; which she had no sooner done, than, discovering herself to the deceived lover, she told him, that he must now either put the king to death, or be put to death by him. Helmichild, well apprised that, after what he had done, his safety depended upon the death of the king, engaged in the treason, which he otherwise abhorred. One day therefore, while Alboinus was reposing in his chamber after dinner, Helmichild, with some others, whom he had made privy to his design, breaking in unexpectedly, fell upon the king with their daggers. Alboinus, starting up at their first coming in, laid hold of his sword, which he had always by him; but having attempted in vain to draw it, the queen having before-hand fastened it in the scabbard, he defended himself for some time with a footstool; but was in the end overpowered, and dispatched with many wounds. Such was the end of Alboinus, the first king of the Lombards in Italy, and one of the greatest princes of the age in which he lived. He was both a warlike and prudent prince, being, according to the character the antients give him, no less skilled in the arts of government, than in those of war. His friendship was courted by all the princes of those times, especially by the emperor Justinian, who was glad to enter into an alliance with him while he was still in Pannonia. Accordingly he assisted Narses, as we have hinted above, in his wars with the Goths, and, so long as that great man continued in favour at court, was ready to serve the Romans on all occasions. The little opposition he met with in the reduction of Italy, was, in a great measure, owing to the new form of government, of which hereafter, introduced by the exarch Longinus, sent by Justin the younger to succeed Narses, who had driven the Goths quite out of Italy, and had governed those provinces with great reputation, as the emperor's lieutenant, for the space of thirteen years. Baronius supposes Alboinus to have led the Lombards out of Scandinavia, to have brought them into Pannonia, and from thence, after they had continued forty-two years in that country, into Italy. But what that annalist writes on this head is scarce worthy of notice, since he can only allege a few groundless conjectures to support his opinion; and, on the other hand, Paulus Diaconus, the only author who has given us a tolerable account of the affairs of the Lombards, writes, that Alboinus was the tenth king of the Lombards; that, under the conduct not of Alboinus, but of Iboreus and Aton, they left Scandinavia, or at least the countries at the mouth of the Vistula; that, upon the death of these two leaders, they chose Agilmund for their first king; and lastly, that, after having often changed their seats, they settled at last in Pannonia, under the conduct of Audoinus, the father of Alboinus.

- BUT to return to Rosamund: she had promised to marry Helmichild as soon as he had dispatched the king her husband, and to bestow upon him, with her person, the kingdom of the Lombards. She married him accordingly; but was so far from being able to bestow upon him the crown, that they were both obliged to save themselves by flight, the Lombards being highly provoked against them for the death of a prince, whom, in a manner, they adored, and unalterably determined to bring to condign punishment the authors of so barbarous a murder. Rosamund therefore, with her new husband, and her daughter Albifvinda, withdrew in the night-time, and fled to Longinus the exarch, residing at Ravenna, taking with her all the jewels and treasure of her late husband. Longinus received her with the greatest marks of friendship and kindness, and assured her of his protection. She had not been long in Ravenna, when the exarch, judging a favourable opportunity now offered to make himself king of Italy by means of Rosamund and her treasure, imparted his design to her, and declared his intention to marry her, provided, by some means or other, she dispatched Helmichild. Rosamund, highly pleased with the proposal, to satisfy her ambition, resolved to get rid of the person, whom she had married for the sake of her revenge. ingly, having prepared a strong poison, she mixed it with wine, and gave it to her husband, as he came thirsty out of the bath, and called for drink, according to his custom. Helmichild had not half emptied the cup, when, by the sudden and strange operation he felt in his bowels, he concluded what it was, and, with his sword pointed at the queen's breast, compelled her to drink the rest. The poison had the same effect on her as on her husband; for, in a few hours, they both died. Longinus, laying aside, upon her death, all thoughts of making himself king of Italy, sent the treasure of the Lombards to Constantinople, together with Albifrinda, the queen's daughter by Alboinus. In the mean time the Lombards, having paid the last duties to their deceased king, assembled in Pavia, the metropolis of their kingdom, and there proceeded to the election of a new prince, which fell on Clephus, a man of great distinction among them. He rebuilt Imola, which had been ruined by Narses, made himself master of Rimini, and extended his conquests to the very gates of Rome. But as he treated not only the Romans, but his own subjects, with great cruelty, he was murdered, with his wife Messana, by one of his people, after a short reign of eighteen months. His cruelty gave the Lombards such an aversion to royal power, that, upon his death, they resolved to change their form of government; and accordingly, for the space of ten years, they chose no king, but lived subject to their dukes, that is, to the governors of the cities; for each city of note, as we have hinted above, was governed by some person of distinction, dignified with the title of duke. These dukes had hitherto acknowledged the royal authority, and were by the kings appointed and removed at pleasure; but, upon the abolishing of kingly power, each of them became sovereign in his own city and its district. This division of the countries they had conquered in Italy into so many petty kingdoms, as we may call them, put a stop for the present, to their conquests, prevented them from ever making themselves masters of all Italy, and in the end occasioned their total ruin; for though the royal authority was afterwards restored among them, yet, as they had been free for some time, they proved less obedient, and more liable to quarrel among themselves^a.

WE cannot dismiss this subject, without taking notice of a mistake, which most modern writers have been led into by Sigonius. That writer supposes the Lombards, upon the death of Clephus, to have created thirty dukes, and to have divided their conquests in Italy among them. But from the words of Paulus Diaconus, where he speaks of that change^b, it plainly appears, that the Lombards, dreading the authority, or rather tyranny, of a king, chose to live under their dukes, who were not then first appointed, but had been chosen before by Alboinus and Clephus. The only innovation that happened among the Lombards, upon their abolishing the royal authority, was this, that the dukes, who had been hitherto subordinate to the kings, as their ministers and officers, now governed each his dukedom with absolute power, acknowledging no superior authority. Besides, the number of the dukes amounted not to thirty only, as is commonly believed, but to thirty-six; for Paulus Diaconus, after having told us, that Pavia, Milan, Bergamo, Brescia, Trent, and Friuli, were governed by the following dukes, Zaban, Alboinus, Walaris, Alachis, Evin, and Gisulfus, adds, that the other cities were governed by thirty dukes^c. Tho' the Lombards, during the inter-regnum, were attended with success in their wars with the Romans, for they made themselves masters of several cities, namely of Sutri, Bomarzo, Orta, Todi, Amelia, Perugia, Luceoli, &c. yet they soon perceived, that their kingdom, thus divided, could not long subsist; and therefore assembling in Pavia, they resolved to submit anew to the authority of one man, and accordingly chose Autbaris the son of Clephus for their king in the year 585. This prince, with his valour and prudence, (for he is said to have excelled in both Alboinus himself) so established the kingdom of the Lombards, that, in spite of the utmost efforts of the Roman emperors, it lasted for the space of near two hundred years. But of the exploits of the dukes during the inter-regnum, and the wars of Autbaris and his successors, till the utter destruction of their kingdom by Charlemagne in 774. we shall speak at length in a more proper place.

The Bulgarians.

- A THE name of the Bulgarians began to be first heard and dreaded by the Romans The Bulgarians in the reign of the emperor Zeno, about the year 485. Ennodius, the most antient writer who mentions them, tells us in the panegyric, which he wrote on Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths, that they were a warlike and numerous nation, inured to the toils of war, ever ready to prefer death to slavery, and never known to have been put to flight, till they engaged this hero^d. They dwelt, in antient times, near the Volga, on the north side of the Caspian sea; whence their country was called Vo'garia, Their antient seats, language, origin, &c. and they Vo'gari, which names, in process of time, were changed into Bulgaria and Bulgari^e. Paulus Diaconus calls those countries Bulgaria Magna, which are known at present by the names of Asiracan and Casan^f. Some writers will have them to be of Gothic, and some of German extraction; but as their language differs widely from the languages of both these nations, others, with far greater appearance of truth, conclude them descended from neither. They spoke antiently, says Diocleates in his history of the kingdom of the Slavi, the Slavonian language, as they still do, with some variation in the dialect^g. As therefore the Goths, Alans, Vandals, Gepide, &c. are thought to have been originally one and the same people, because the same language was common to all, these nations must, on the contrary, be allowed to be different, whose languages differ. Now, no two languages, says Rudbeckius, can be conceived more unlike than the Slavonian spoken by the Bulgarians, and the German and Gothic. The Bulgarians therefore were not sprung either from the Goths or the Germans, but ought to be reckoned among the nations inhabiting Asiatic Scythia; for they came first from thence; and to trace them farther back would be a vain and fruitless attempt. From Asiatic Scythia, and the countries lying north of the Caspian sea, they advanced, in quest of a more fertile country, to the Tanais, and from thence, in the reign of the emperor Zeno, to the banks of the Danube, having at that time one Bladinus for their king. They were not stopped by that river, but, passing it, broke into Thrace, with a design to settle there. But Theodoric the Ostrogoth, afterwards king of Italy, and at this time general of the Roman troops quartered in that province, marching against them, put them to flight, and obliged them to repass the Danube^h. Those who broke into Thrace had one Libertem for their leader, who was wounded in the engagementⁱ. Ennodius, to enhance the glory of his hero, pretends, as we have hinted above, that the Bulgarians had never been overcome before^k. Some years after, that is, in 499. the eighth of the emperor Anastasius's reign, they broke anew into Thrace, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Against them the emperor dispatched Aristus, commander of the troops in Illyricum, at the head of fifteen thousand men, attended by five hundred and twenty waggons, loaded with arms and provisions. Aristus, confiding in his own strength, engaged the barbarians on the banks of the Zarta or Zurta; but was by them utterly defeated, with the loss of all his baggage, and four thousand men, among whom fell the counts Nicostratus, Innocentius, and Aquilinus, with some of the most experienced officers of the army^l. Of this victory Zonaras, without all doubt, speaks, where he tells us, that the Bulgarians, in the second irruption they made into the empire, gained, by magical incantations, a complete victory. He adds, that, about the time of this invasion, a comet appeared, and several prodigies happened^m. We are not told what the barbarians did after this victory; but, in all likelihood, they returned home with the rich booty they had acquired. Three years after, they invaded Thrace anew, and, having plundered that province, and great part of Illyricum, they carried off an immense booty, without meeting with the least opposition, the Roman troops being employed against the Saracens, who, under the conduct of one Badicarim, committed unheard-of cruelties in Palestine, Arabia, and *Phœnice*ⁿ. They seem to have continued quiet, perhaps by some agreement with the empire, from this time to the year 539. the twelfth of the emperor Justinian the Great, when, under the conduct of two kings, Vulger and Droggo, they passed the Danube, and laid waste all Mæsia. commanders of the Roman troops quartered in that and the neighbouring provinces, a having drawn together their forces, marched against them; but were defeated with great slaughter, and put to flight. Hereupon the barbarians, roving about uncontrouled, took an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives, destroying with fire and sword what they could not carry off. But in the mean time one Acum, by nation a Hunn, an officer of great experience, whom Justinian had sent against them, having cut off their retreat, obliged them to venture a battle in a very disadvantageous situation. The Bulgarians fought with great resolution and intrepidity; but great numbers of their men being cut in pieces, and both their kings killed, they were in the end forced to quit their booty, and betake themselves to a precipitous flight. Acum, having thus delivered the Roman provinces from the barbarians, by whom they had been strangely harassed, set out on his return to Constantinople with Constantine, who had commanded under him; but, in passing through Thrace, both generals were unexpectedly surrounded by a party of Bulgarians, and taken prisoners; so that Justinian was obliged to ransom them with an immense sum^o. The following year 540. the Bulgarians, not in the least discouraged by the losses they had sustained, returned anew, and, entering Thrace, plundered and laid waste the open country far and near. But Mundus, by nation a Gepid, whom Justinian had appointed governor of Illyricum, coming upon them unexpectedly, gave them a total overthrow, cut most of them in pieces, and, having taken a great number of prisoners, sent them to the emperor at Constantinople, who incorporated some of them among his troops, and ordered the rest to be transplanted into Armenia and Lazica &c. For this and the above-mentioned victory, the emperor took the surname of Bulgaricus, which, among his other titles, is still to be seen on his coins.

No further mention is made in history of the Bulgarians, till the reign of Constantine III. surnamed Pogonatus, which began in 668. In his time they passed the Danube, and, entering the Roman territories, committed great ravages in the provinces bordering on that river. Constantine, having raised a powerful army, dispatched it against them; but as the Romans, confiding too much in their own strength, and despising the barbarians as an undisciplined multitude, were marching carelessly, the Bulgarians fell upon them with such vigour, that, after a faint resistance, they betook themselves to flight, and, retiring into the fortified places, left the enemy at full liberty to ravage at pleasure the open country. Hereupon the emperor, preferring a shameful peace to an expensive and doubtful war, agreed to pay them a yearly pension, upon condition that they should not, for the future, infest the Roman territories, but join, when required, the emperor's forces against all other barbarians, who should attempt to disturb the peace of the empire &c. About this time Alczecus, one of the princes or chiefs of the Bulgarians, abandoning his own country, for what reason we are not told, entered Italy with a body of his countrymen, and arriving at Pavia, without offering the least violence to the people in the countries through which he passed, offered his service to Grimoaldus king of the Lombards, declaring at the same time, that he was willing to live, with his people, in what part soever of his dominions he should be pleased to allot him. Grimoaldus received him in a most obliging manner; and thinking he might prove very serviceable to his son Romualdus duke of Benevento, threatened at that time by the Greeks, who were masters of Naples, he sent Alczecus and his Bulgarians to him, requiring him to allow them settlements in the dukedom of Benevento. Romualdus, in compliance with his father's request, allotted them several cities, and, among the rest, Sepinum, Bajanum, and Isernia; but at the same time obliged Alczecus to relinquish the title of duke, which, it seems, he had before, and content himself with that of gastaldus, either to shew, that he had not given him those places in feignory and property, or because he did not think it fit, that one of his subjects should be distinguished with the title of duke, since he had no other himself. The dukedom of Benevento being thus divided into several counties, all subject to the duke of Benevento, those who were appointed to govern them, had no other title but that of gastaldi, which is the same with the title of comes or count &c. Thus the Bulgarians came to settle in the dukedom of Benevento, where, for several ages, they inhabited the country now known by the name of Contado di Molise. Paulus Diaconus, who wrote above an hundred and fifty years after they had settled there,

- a tells us, that though, in his time, they had learnt the Italian language, nevertheless they had not yet lost the use of their own (L.). To return to the Bulgarians who remained on the banks of the Danube: Constantine, as we have hinted above, had concluded a peace with them, and agreed to pay them an annual pension; nay, most authors are of opinion, that he allowed them to settle in Lower Masia, from them afterwards called Bulgaria, which name that country still retains. Other writers indeed suppose them to have settled there several years before Constantine's reign, tho' they will not take upon them to fix the precise time. However that be, Justinian II. not only refused to stand to the articles of the treaty, which his father had concluded with the Bulgarians, but, entering their country in an hostile manner, laid it waste far and near, made himself master of several forts, and obliged the inhabitants either to submit to him, and pay unreasonable contributions, or to abandon their dwellings, and take refuge in the woods and marshes. The Bulgarians, finding themselves reduced to great streights, dispatched ambassadors to the emperor, suing for peace; but he refusing to hearken to any terms but those of an intire submission, animated with despair, they resolved to make a last effort in defence of their liberties. Accordingly, having drawn together all their forces, they fell unexpectedly upon the emperor, put his army to flight, and, having seized on all the passes, obliged him to restore the prisoners and booty he had taken, and confirm the treaty his father had made with them, to purchase a retreat. In the year 713. Philippicus being then emperor, the Bulgarians, upon what provocation we know not, breaking unexpectedly into Thrace, advanced to the very gates of Constantinople, and, having laid waste the country, taken an incredible number of captives, and put more to the sword, returned home unmolested, carrying with them an immense booty. Six years after, that is, in 719. Anastasius II. who had been deposed and confined to Thessalonica by Theodosius III. having made his escape from thence, fled to Tribelin king of the Bulgarians; and, having prevailed upon that prince to espouse his cause, he obtained of him a considerable army, with which he marched into Thrace, and approached the imperial city. Anastasius believed himself, and had assured the Bulgarians, that the inhabitants, at his approach, would open the gates, and receive him; but the citizens making a vigorous resistance, and the emperor Leo raising at the same time a numerous army, the Bulgarians, highly provoked against Anastasius, seized him, and delivered him up to Leo, by whom he was put to death.

(L.) What Paulus Diaconus writes on this head is worthy of observation: The Bulgarians, says he, retained their own language, tho' at the same time they spoke the Latin, quamvis etiam Latino loquerentur (1). By the Latin tongue our historian did not mean, as some have imagined (3), the language of the ancient Romans, but another then current in Italy, and commonly called Italian; for the ancient Latin, about the end of the ninth century, when Paulus Diaconus flourished, was only made use of in writings, another, called Italian, being then commonly spoken, to which the mixture, variety, and confusion of several languages with the Latin, had given rise. The Latin tongue, even in the time of the emperor Justinian, who died in 566. began to be strangely corrupted, and to bear a great resemblance to the Italian; for Fornerius tells us, that he had perused a public instrument, which had been drawn up in Ravenna in the reign of Justinian, and was written in a kind of Latin, which bore a great affinity to the Italian (4). In the tenth century, the Italian alone was spoken in Italy; but that Italian came much nearer the Latin, than the language which is used now by the Italians, both in common speech, and in writing; but tho' the current language was then very different from the Latin, yet it was called Latin by the writers of that and the two following centuries, because it was spoken by the antient inhabitants, who were styled Latins or Romans, and by that name distinguished from the Greeks, the Lombards, and the other nations settled in Italy. Hence not only Paulus Diaconus, but authors who flourished long after his time, by the Latin meant the Italian, as the learned Camillo Pellegrino rightly observes (5). Thus, where Otho Frisingensis commends the Lombards of his time, who were then become Italians, for the elegance with which they spoke the Latin tongue, that writer must be understood, not of the antient Latin, but the Italian; and in the same sense we must understand all the authors who flourished after the ninth century, and call the language used in their time Latin. There is in no country so great a variety of dialects as in Italy, which, as Camillo Pellegrino observes, is owing to the many different nations that settled there, viz. the Goths, the Lombards, the Bulgarians, the Greeks, the Saracens, the Normans, the Sueves, &c. for tho' these foreign nations forgot, in process of time, their native language, and spoke that of the country in which they dwelt, yet they kept many of their own words, and, with their words, a foreign accent; and hence the many different accents and dialects chiefly in the present kingdom of Naples, where all the above-mentioned nations continued some time.

the Bulgarians,
being driven
from the throne, embraces the christian religion.

FROM this time the Bulgarians continued quiet till the year 750. the ninth of the a reign of Constantine surnamed Copronymus, who caused some forts to be built on the borders of the provinces, which joined the country of the Bulgarians. Of this they sent ambassadors to complain to the emperor, and to demand a confirmation of the former treaties. The emperor received the ambassadors in a manner altogether unsuitable to their character, and dismissed them with a disdainful answer; which so incensed the Bulgarians, that they made a sudden irruption into the Roman territories, and, penetrating without opposition as far as the long wall, laid waste the country, and returned home loaded with booty. Hereupon the emperor, upon the arrival of his troops out of the east, marched against them in person, and, entering their country, began to lay it waste, destroying all with fire and sword. But the Bulgarians, b who carefully watched all his motions, falling upon him as he was marching through a narrow pass named Beregaba, put him to flight, and pursued him with great slaughter to the very gates of Constantinople *. In the year 763. a new war was kindled between the same emperor and the Bulgarians, the occasion of which is variously related by authors; but the most probable opinion is, that Constantine, wanting a pretence to quarrel with them, and to retrieve the reputation he had lost in his late war with them, pretended to be highly provoked against them for putting to death in a sedition all the princes of the blood royal among them, and raising to the throne one Telesis, a person of a mean descent. What gave rise to this rebellion, we are not told; but Constantine, pretending to revenge it, raised a powerful army, and, march- c ing into the country of the Bulgarians, gave them battle on the borders of Thrace.
The engagement lasted eight hours; but in the end the Romans gained a complete victory: after which the emperor, instead of improving it, returned to Constantinople, with the booty and prisoners he had taken, and entered the city in triumph. The Bulgarians, upon the retreat of the emperor, put their new king to death, either mistrusting him, as if he entertained a private correspondence with the Romans, or because his behaviour in the battle was such, as shewed him unworthy of the dignity to which he had been raised *. The Bulgarians, discouraged with the loss of the battle, in which the flower of their youth was cut off, sent ambassadors to Constan- tinople to sue for peace; which was granted them; but upon such disadvantageous d terms, that they resolved to observe them no longer than a favourable opportunity offered of renewing the war. Accordingly two years after, great part of the emperor's forces being employed in the east against the Saracens, they broke into the Ro- man dominions with a body of twelve thousand men; but Constantine marching in person against them, and, coming upon them when least expected, cut them all off to a man, and then returned in triumph to Constantinople. This the emperor styled his noble war, because not one christian was killed in it; but the victory was obtained, it seems, by treachery, the emperor being privately informed by some Bulgarians of the designs, and all the motions, of their countrymen. These Elerich, king of the e country, discovered by the following device: He wrote to Constantine, pretending a desire to resign the crown, and lead a private life at Constantinople; for which purpose he begged the emperor to send him a safe conduct, and at the same time to let him know what friends the Romans had among the Bulgarians, that he might repair with them to Constantinople, being unwilling to trust his person or design to others. Hereupon Constantine, not suspecting any deceit, sent him a list of the names of those, who maintained a private correspondence with him; which Elerich no sooner received, than he caused them all to be put to death. The emperor, finding himself thus deluded, tore his garments, and his hair, in the height of his passion, and, vowing revenge at all events, spent the winter in warlike preparations, and early in the spring f took the field, with a design to cut off the whole nation of the Bulgarians root and branch; but being seized on his march with a violent fever, he was obliged to return to Achadiopolis, whence he was conveyed to Strongylum, where he died †. He was succeeded by his son Leo III. who, upon his accession to the throne, concluded a peace with the king of the Bulgarians, whose daughter Irene he had married. In the third year of his reign, Elerich being driven from the throne by his own subjects, fled to Constantinople, where he was received by the emperor with extraordinary marks of kindness and esteem. During his stay in that metropolis, he was, at his own request, instructed in the principles of the christian religion; which he no sooner embraced,

- a than he was by Leo created a patrician, and married to a relation of the empress². Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the son and successor of Leo, in the year 791. the eleventh of his reign, made war upon the Bulgarians, who, according to their custom, had broken into the Roman provinces; but with what success the emperor was attended in this war, is uncertain; for Cedrenus writes, that he gained a signal victory; Zonaras, that it was a drawn battle; and some, that the Romans were worsted, and lost the flower of their army. Be that as it will, the following year 792. he marched anew against the Bulgarians, encouraged thereunto by some mathematicians, who promised him certain victory; but while, depending upon their promises, he omitted the proper means to obtain it, he was utterly defeated. In the battle, besides a great number of common soldiers, fell some of the best officers of the army, and the most considerable men in the empire, with Pancratius the mathematician, who, by his lying predictions, had given occasion to the overthrow³. Two years after, Cardanes king of the Bulgarians sent ambassadors to the emperor, demanding a tribute, and threatening, if it was refused him, to come as far as the Goldengate of Constantinople, and take it by force: to such a low ebb was the empire then reduced! Constantine however, exerting himself on this occasion, returned answer, That, as the king of the Bulgarians was stricken in years, he would save him the trouble of so long a journey, by coming in person to wait upon him. Accordingly he marched against him at the head of a considerable army, at the sight of which the barbarians, struck with a panic, fled in the utmost confusion; but Constantine, instead of pursuing them, and taking advantage of the consternation they were in, returned to Constantinople^b. In the year 806. the seventh of the emperor Nicephorus, the Bulgarians, falling upon a party of Romans, put them all to the sword, and seized eleven hundred pounds weight of gold, which they were escorting to Strogmon for the payment of the army. Soon after, they made an irruption into the Roman provinces, under the conduct of Crumus their king, and, having surprised Sardica, put the whole garrison, consisting of six thousand men, to the sword. Nicephorus marched against them in person; but the barbarians retiring at his approach, he returned to Constantinople. However, the following year, having drawn together all the forces of the east and west, he marched at the head of them into Bulgaria, destroying all with fire and sword. Crumus, alarmed at the approach of so formidable an army, sent ambassadors to sue for peace, which he offered to conclude upon terms highly honourable to the empire. But Nicephorus, rejecting them with scorn and indignation, pursued his ravages, burning the towns and villages, and putting such of the inhabitants to the sword as fell into his hands, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. He not only raged against the living, but likewise against the dead, not suffering those who were slain to be buried, but ordering their bodies to be exposed to the dogs and wild beasts. But in the mean time Byzantius, his chief favourite, forsaking him, fled with the imperial robe, and an hundred pounds weight of gold, to the enemy; which was looked upon by the superstitious multitude as an unlucky omen. Crumus, sensibly affected with the calamities of his subjects, sent anew ambassadors to the emperor, offering to agree to any terms, on condition he would put an end to the ravages, and quit the country. But Nicephorus, deaf to all proposals, received the ambassadors with great haughtiness, and dismissed them with scorn. Hereupon Crumus, pushed on by despair, and the thirst of revenge, in the first place, secured and fortified all the passes thro' which the emperor was to retire; and then, animating his men to revenge the blood of their wives and children inhumanly massacred by the emperor's orders, he attacked unexpectedly the Roman camp, and, having forced it in spite of all opposition, cut off almost the whole army, with the emperor himself, a great number of patricians, and almost all the chief officers of the army. Saturatius, the emperor's son, was dangerously wounded; but escaped in a litter to Adrianople. All the arms and baggage fell into the enemy's hands; and the body of Nicephorus being found among the slain, Crumus ordered his head to be struck off, and, after having kept it for some time exposed to public view, inclosed the skull in silver, and used it ever after in all grand entertainments, instead of a cup^c. In the beginning of the reign of Michael, who succeeded Nicephorus, a peace was concluded between the Romans and Bulgarians, nay, some of the latter were allowed to settle in the Roman provinces. But the good harmony that passed between the two nations was short-lived; for, in the second year of Michael's reign, they came to an open rupture on the following occasion: Some Romans, who had been taken prisoners by the Bulgarians in the late war, having found means to make their escape, returned home. These Crumus demanded, threatening the empire with war, if his just demand was not immediately complied with. The emperor, who was naturally averse to war, and several persons of distinction at court, were for granting the king of the Bulgarians his request, the empire not being at that time in a condition to carry on a war with success. But Nicephorus the patriarch, and Theophilus, a person in great esteem at court for his virtue and wisdom, urging, that they ought to trust to the assistance of Heaven, and not gratify the pride and insolence of the barbarians, the emperor, following their advice, received the Bulgarian ambassadors in the most obliging manner; but at the same time told them, ^b that he could not, by any means, comply with their request, and deliver up into captivity such of his subjects, as, having once escaped that deplorable condition, had fled to him for protection. Hereupon Crumus, having drawn together a considerable army, entered the Roman territories, and not only ravaged the open country, but laid siege to, and made himself master of, several fortified places, being assisted therein by an Arabian, well skilled in the art of framing military engines, who had been formerly employed by the emperor Nicephorus, but, being ill used by him, had fled to the Bulgarians, and taught them the use of all sorts of battering engines. Besides ^c several other cities, he made himself master of Mesembria, a place of great importance in the neighbourhood of mount Hæmus, and put the garrison to the sword. In the mean time the emperor, having assembled a very numerous army, leaving Constantinople, put himself at the head of it, and marching into Thrace, came up with the enemy in the neighbourhood of Constantinople. After several skirmishes, in which the Romans had the advantage, the emperor was, in a manner, forced by the soldiery to venture a battle. Both armies engaged with the utmost fury, and the victory continued long doubtful; but in the end the Romans were utterly defeated. Michael was so sensibly affected with this misfortune, that, resigning the purple to Leo, he retired to the monastery of Pharus, and there took the monastic habit. Thus Theophanes ^d, who lived at this time, and was an eye-witness of what he wrote. But Cedrenus writes, that the Romans had the advantage in the engagement; that great numbers of the Bulgarians were cut in pieces; and that Crumus, with much-ado kept his men from betaking themselves to a precipitous flight, till Leo, who aspired at the empire, drew off the forces under his command; which so disheartened the Romans, that they fled in the utmost confusion ^e. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Bulgarians gained a complete victory, and that the emperor, with great difficulty, escaped to Adrianople, and from thence, with a small attendance, to Constantinople, where he abdicated soon after. The Bulgarians, elated with the great victory they had gained, pursued their ravages without controul, advancing almost to the gates of Constantinople, and destroying all with fire and sword. Leo, who had succeeded Michael, endeavoured at first to restrain them by fair means, and for that purpose ^f sent ambassadors to Crumus, with proposals for an accommodation; but Crumus, deaf to all overtures, sent them back without so much as granting them an audience. Leo, who was an active and warlike prince, highly provoked at the arrogance of the barbarian, drew together all the forces of the empire, and, marching into Thrace, offered the enemy battle; which Crumus not declining, a bloody engagement ensued. Great numbers fell on both sides; but in the end the Romans, after a most obstinate resistance, were put to the rout. The Bulgarians, instead of pursuing the enemy, fell upon the baggage, and began to plunder the camp in great disorder; which being observed by Leo from a neighbouring eminence, where he had kept during the battle with a body of reserve, he came down unexpectedly upon the enemy, renewed the fight, and, having rallied his other troops, obtained in the end an intire victory. Great numbers of the enemy were slain, and more taken prisoners. Among the former some reckon the king himself; and add, that the emperor slew him with his own hand; but others say, that he was only wounded, and that, falling from his horse, he had been either killed or taken prisoner by the Romans, who had already surrounded him, had not his guards, with unparalleled valour, rescued him out of their hands ^f. The Bulgarians were so disheartened with this overthrow, that they made no inroads into the empire for some years after. Crumus was succeeded by a Mortagon, in whose time Thomas, of whom we have spoken in our Roman history ^e, revolting from Michael II. who had succeeded Leo, and keeping him closely blocked up in Constantinople, the king of the Bulgarians, pitying his condition, resolved to march to his assistance, and, lest he should in the mean time come to any agreement with the rebels, he privately acquainted him with his design. The emperor, either to prevent the ravages and disorders, which he was well apprised the barbarians would commit, or suspecting the sincerity of the king, or, what the writers of those times think most probable, apprehending that a reward, answerable to such a friendly and seasonable assistance, would too much exhaust his treasury, in the improving of which he at least equalled the most covetous of his predecessors, returned the king of the Bulgarians thanks for his generous offer; but declined accepting it. Mortagon however, accustomed to war and depredations, undertook the expedition, and, entering Thrace, encamped at a place called Cedossus, at a small distance from Constantinople. Thomas, hearing of the approach of the Bulgarians, broke up the siege, and marched with all his forces to meet the enemy. Hereupon a battle ensued, in which the rebels were put to flight with great slaughter. But Mortagon, instead of pursuing the fugitives, returned home, with the booty he found in the enemy's camp^b.

THE Bulgarians continued quiet, no doubt in virtue of some treaty between them and the Romans, from this time to the year 893. the eighth of Leo V. when a war broke out between them and the Romans on the following occasion: A great trade had been carried on for some time between the two nations, and the public mart was kept at Constantinople, whence, by the interest of Zantzas, father to Zoe the emperor's concubine, it was removed to Thessalonica. This removal was procured by Zantzas, at the request of the Constantinopolitan merchants, and those very merchants were, by the great sway he bore at court, appointed officers and receivers of the customs; which put it in their power to give great trouble to the Bulgarian merchants, whom they oppressed with new and unlawful impositions. Of this Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, complained by his ambassadors to the emperor; but he, who was in all things governed by Zantzas, refusing to redress the grievances complained

d of, Simeon, who wanted only a pretence for a rupture, without any further declaration of war, entered the Roman territories at the head of a powerful army, and advanced as far as Macedon, destroying all with fire and sword. On the borders of that province he was met by the army, which Leo had sent against him, under the conduct of Procopius Crenites, and one Curcius an Armenian. The two armies no sooner came in sight of each other, than they engaged. The Romans stood their ground some time; but both their generals being slain, they were in the end utterly defeated. In the pursuit great numbers of them were taken prisoners, and treated in a most barbarous manner by the insolent conqueror, who first led them in triumph round his camp, and then, having caused their noses to be cut off, sent them, thus deformed, to Constantinople. Leo, highly provoked at this outrage, prevailed upon

e the Ungri or Hungarians to break into the country of the Bulgarians on one side, while he invaded it on the other. Simeon marched first against the Hungarians, who committed every-where dreadful ravages; but, in the battle that ensued, the flower of his army was cut off, he himself having, with great difficulty, made his escape, and taken refuge in a strong-hold named Drifta; so that the Hungarians pursued their ravages without controul, laid waste the country far and near, and took an incredible number of prisoners, whom they sold to the emperor. Leo, before the Hungarians began hostilities, or his own troops took the field, had sent to Simeon one Constantinacius, with proposals for an accommodation; but the king of the Bulgarians, imagining that the emperor had therein no other view but to deceive and amuse him, had thrown the ambassadors into prison; but finding his army cut off by the Hungarians, and being informed at the same time, that the Roman army, under the conduct of Nicephorus Phocas, was in full march to enter his country, he not only set Constantinacius at liberty, but dispatched ambassadors to Leo suing for peace in a most submissive manner. The emperor, not thinking it adviseable to reduce so warlike a nation to despair, readily granted him his request, ordering Phocas, who was then upon the point of entering Bulgaria, to return home, with the forces under his command^f. embassadors into prison, and, falling unexpectedly upon the Hungarians, gave them a total overthrow. He then entered their country, and committed there unheard-of cruelties, putting all to the sword who fell into his hands, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. Leo, not able to march to the assistance of his allies at so short a warning, dispatched embassadors to the king of the Bulgarians, complaining of the breach of the treaty just concluded, and requiring him to withdraw his troops forthwith out of the country of the Hungarians. Simeon, elated with his success, returned answer, That he would hearken to no terms, till all the Bulgarians, who had been taken in the late war, were set at liberty. To this the emperor consented, unwilling to engage in a new war. But the prisoners were no sooner returned him, than Simeon made new demands, still more unreasonable than the former; which provoked the emperor to such a degree, that he resolved to fall upon the Bulgarians with the whole strength of the empire, and utterly extirpate, if possible, that perfidious nation. A powerful army was accordingly raised, and sent into Bulgaria, under the command of Catacalon, and Theodosius a patrician. But Simeon, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut most of them in pieces, with Theodosius, and a great number of officers of distinction. This obliged the emperor to consent to a peace upon the best terms he could obtain; which the Bulgarians seem to have observed during the remaining part of Leo's reign.

UPON that prince's death, they dispatched embassadors to Alexander, his brother and successor, to renew the treaty concluded in the late reign. But Alexander, instead of cultivating the friendship of that warlike nation, dismissed the embassadors in an ignominious manner; at which Simeon justly provoked, invaded the Roman dominions with a mighty army, and, meeting with no opposition, after having ravaged Thrace, advanced to the very gates of Constantinople, which he hoped to surprise; but the inhabitants making a vigorous resistance, after several unsuccessful attempts, Simeon was obliged to drop the enterprize, and retire to Hebdomon, at a small distance from the imperial city. From thence he sent embassadors to Constantine, who had succeeded Alexander, with proposals for an accommodation; which were received with great joy by the governors of the young prince, who was then under age. While the negotiations were carrying on, Simeon was admitted to dine with the emperor in the palace of Blachernæ, and, when the entertainment was over, dismissed with rich presents. Cedrenus supposes a peace to have been concluded; but Zonaras writes, that Simeon would not agree to the terms that were offered him. Be that as it will, the following year 914. the king of the Bulgarians broke anew into Thrace, and, advancing as far as Adrianople, laid siege to that city. In the mean time the empress Zoe, mother to the young prince, having got the whole power into her own hands, and, by the advice of the senate, concluded a peace with the Saracens, who had invaded the eastern provinces, resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against the Bulgarians, and utterly extirpate, if possible, that nation. With this view she assembled a mighty army, and, having first distributed large sums among the soldiers, she ordered them to march against the enemy, under the command of Leo Phocas, captain of the imperial guards. Under Leo commanded the following generals, Grapsos, Merula, Romanus, Melius, and Constantinus Africanus, who had all distinguished themselves in former wars. The army was mustered in a spacious plain called Diabesis, where the chief chaplain of the palace, called the Protopapa, made them all kneel down, and swear, they would fight to the last. After this, he gave them his blessing with the usual ceremonies; which were no sooner over, than Leo led them against the Bulgarians, who had made themselves masters of Adrianople, betrayed to them by one Pancratucus an Armenian. Simeon met the Romans at a castle called Achelous, whereupon a bloody battle ensued on the sixth of August of the present year 917. in which the Bulgarians, after a most obstinate dispute, were in the end put to flight. The victory however was snatched out of the hands of the Romans by the following unlucky accident: Leo, the Roman general, alighting at a fountain to quench his drought during the pursuit, his horse broke loose while he stooped down to drink. The soldiers, who knew him, seeing him without a rider, concluded that their general was killed, and thereupon turned the pursuit into a flight. Simeon quickly perceived the disorder the Romans were in, though not acquainted with the cause of it, and, rallying his men, returned to the charge, put such of the

- a enemy to flight as offered to oppose him, and pursued them, till the day was far spent, with great slaughter. Vast numbers of common soldiers were killed on this occasion, and several officers of distinction, among whom were Constantius Africanus, and Grapsus. As for Leo, who commanded in chief, having narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands, he got safe in the end to Mesembria ^k. To this mistake some ascribe the dreadful overthrow, which the Romans received on this occasion; but others tell us, that, while Leo was busy in the pursuit of the enemy, news was brought him, that Romanus Lacapenus, who commanded the fleet, was returned to Constantinople, with a design to usurp the sovereignty, while most of the nobility and officers were absent; that, upon this intelligence, Leo, who had the same ambitious view, returned in great haste to the camp, the better to be informed of the truth; and that the soldiers, imagining he retired out of fear, betook themselves to flight. Be that as it will, the flower of the Roman army was cut off; and Simeon, elated with this unexpected success, resolved to return before Constantinople; but two strong detachments from his army being met and defeated at a place called Catasyrtes by the imperial troops, he thought it advisable to drop the enterprise, and return home; with the immense booty, which he had already got. Even in this encounter or skirmish the Romans lost a considerable number of men, and some officers of great reputation, among whom was Nicolas, the son of Constantine Ducas, who, on this occasion, commanded in chief, and to whose valour the success of the day was chiefly owing. Five years after, Simeon, taking advantage of the intestine broils and factions into which the empire was rent by the usurpation of Romanus, began to make new inroads into the Roman territories. One of his parties advanced as far as Catasyrtes, in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, where they were met by Leo, son-in-law to Romanus, and put to flight. In this encounter Michael, a Roman officer, who had signalized himself on several occasions, received a wound, of which he died. A few months after, Simeon sent into Thrace a very numerous army, commanded by Chaganus and Minicius, with orders to march strait to Constantinople. Romanus, receiving timely notice of their design, dispatched Leo, his brother Pothus Argyrus, and one John, against them, with all the troops he could assemble. The two armies met in the plains of Pega, at a small distance from Constantinople, and thereupon a bloody battle ensued, in which the Romans, frightened with the sudden flight of John, one of their generals, gave way, and were pursued with great slaughter by the Bulgarians. Leo and Pothus took refuge in a neighbouring castle; John saved himself on board a small vessel; but most of the other officers and soldiers were either cut in pieces, taken prisoners, or drowned in striving to get on board the fleet, which was riding at a small distance from the field of battle. Among the latter was Alexius the admiral, and several other officers of the navy. The Bulgarians, now masters of the field, laid waste the country without controul, burnt the imperial palace of Pega, and closely besieged Adrianople. Leo, surnamed Moraleon, from his rash and inconsiderate boldness, defended the place with great gallantry, and made several successful sallies; but the inhabitants being in the end obliged by famine to surrender, Simeon basely caused Leo to be tortured to death ^m.

to the Eternal Judge for the christian blood he had already shed; expostulated with a him, that, being a christian, he should delight in the slaughter of those, who professed the same religion; exhorted him to join those, with whom he was already united by the same faith, and, putting an end to such unnatural wars, turn his arms against their common enemy the Saracens. He told him in the end, that, if he was prompted by the desire of riches to commit every-where such devastations, the treasures of the empire should be opened to him, and leave granted him to take from thence what wealth he pleased, provided he sheathed his sword, and put an end to the shedding of christian blood. Simeon was so affected with this speech, that he accepted the terms offered him by the emperor, signed the treaty, and, having received many rich presents from Romanus, he returned home, not suffering his men b to commit the least disorder in the provinces through which they passed. Simeon, having thus concluded a peace with the Romans, turned his arms against the Chrobati, a neighbouring nation; but he was by them overthrown, with the loss of his whole army. He did not long outlive this misfortune, but died of grief a few days after.
He left three sons behind him, viz. Michael, whom he had by his first wife, Peter and John, his children by his second wife. He had obliged his eldest son, whom he disliked, to take the monastic habit some years before his death. He was therefore succeeded by Peter, to whom, as he was yet under age, George Sufurbulus, his mother's brother, was appointed guardian. The neighbouring nations no sooner heard of the death of Simeon, than they resolved to fall jointly upon the Bulgarians, by whom c they had been incessantly harassed during the late king's reign. At the same time a dreadful famine raged in Bulgaria, the corn having been consumed by incredible multitudes of locusts. Sufurbulus therefore, fearing the Romans, encouraged by their present calamities, might join the neighbouring nations against them, advised the young prince to invade their dominions first with the whole strength of his kingdom, which, he said, would make way for an advantageous treaty, and prevent them from joining their other enemies. Pursuant to this advice, Peter broke into Macedon at the head of a powerful army, destroying all with fire and sword; but when he heard, that Romanus was marching against him, he dispatched a monk to the emperor, with proposals for a peace, which he desired might be strengthened and confirmed by d more strict alliance, if the emperor thought fit to give him his grand-daughter in marriage. This overture was very acceptable to Romanus; so that, after several negotiations and conferences between the ministers of the two princes in the city of Mesembria, not only a peace, but a marriage, was concluded between the young king of the Bulgarians, and Mary the daughter of Christopher, the emperor's son.
The articles being agreed on, Peter repaired to Constantinople, where he was splendidly entertained by Romanus, and, with great solemnity, married to his grand-daughter by Stephen the patriarch. The king of the Bulgarians was scarce returned home, when a conspiracy was discovered, carried on against him by John his brother, and several other persons of distinction. All who were privy to it, were put to death; but the e king contented himself with confining his brother to a castle, whence, with the assistance of the emperor's ambassadors, he made his escape to Constantinople. Soon after, Michael his brother, quitting the monastic habit, laid claim to the crown, and was joined by great numbers of Bulgarians; but he dying, his followers, abandoning their native country, broke into the Roman dominions, and, ravaging Macedon and Greece, advanced as far as Nicopolis; which city they took, and settled there. Upon the death of Romanus, the king of the Bulgarians sent ambassadors to Constantinople, to renew with his successor Nicephorus Phocas his alliance with the empire, delivering up his two sons Borises and Romanus as hostages; but the king dying soon after, they were sent home, where, with much difficulty, they got the better of a powerful faction, f headed by the four sons of one of the chief lords of that country. In the year 970.
the Russi or Roffi, who inhabited the present Podolia, broke into Bulgaria, under the conduct of their king Spendoslabus, and, having ravaged the country, and burnt several towns, they returned home loaded with booty. The ensuing year they pursued their ravages, and, having put the Bulgarians to flight who attempted to oppose them, and, in the pursuit, taken Borises and Romanus, the two sons of Peter, prisoners, they resolved to settle in Bulgaria, finding it a country far more pleasant and fertile than their own. In this resolution they were confirmed by one Calocyrrus, a

- a Roman fugitive, who engaged to resign Bulgaria to them, to enter into a strict alliance with their nation, and to pay them annually a considerable sum, provided they raised him to the imperial throne. The Russi, well acquainted with the late revolutions of the empire, and the low ebb to which the Roman power was reduced, thought it would be no difficult matter to effectuate what Calocyrrus proposed. Accordingly, having drawn to their assistance the Patzinacæ, a Sarmatic nation, with the Hunns or Hungarians, and armed such of the conquered Bulgarians, as they thought they might safely trust, they entered Thrace with an army of three hundred and eight thousand men, and, having ravaged that province, sat down before Adrianople, where they were soon after defeated, and most of them cut in pieces, by Bardas Sclerus with a body of twelve thousand Romans, as we have related elsewhere p. Such of the Rossi as escaped the general slaughter, returned into Bulgaria; whence they were afterwards driven back to their ancient seats by John Zimisces, then emperor. But of the war which that prince made on the Rossi, till they consented to abandon Bulgaria, we have spoken at length in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader q.

THE Bulgarians, being thus delivered from the yoke under which they had groaned some years, readily submitted to Zimisces their deliverer. But their submission lasted no longer than his life; for no sooner did they receive the news of the emperor's death, revolting from the Romans, they invested with supreme power four brothers, David, Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, called Cometopoli, because they were the children of an eminent count among them. Of the family of Peter none was left, whom they could prefer. His two sons Borises and Romanus had been taken prisoners by Zimisces in his war with the Rossi, and brought by him to Constantinople, whence they both made their escape upon that prince's death. But Borises, in passing through a wood in a Roman dress, was killed by a Bulgarian, who mistook him for a Roman. Romanus indeed was alive, but an eunuch, and consequently incapable of ascending the throne. Of the four brothers, whom we have just mentioned, David died soon after he was invested with the sovereign power; Moses was killed in the siege of a place called Serræ; and Aaron, being suspected of favouring the Romans, and keeping a private correspondence with them, was murdered by Samuel, with all his children,

They revolt, and are governed by four brothers.

- d Blackobstblabus excepted, who was saved by Kadomer the son of Samuel. Samuel, who was a warlike prince, and a man of a restless temper, having thus got the whole power into his own hands, made frequent inroads into the Roman territories, returning home with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives; nay, while Basilus, the successor of Zimisces, was engaged in a civil war with Bardas Sclerus, who had assumed the purple, Samuel, laying hold of that opportunity, over-ran not only Thrace and Macedon, but likewise Thessaly, Greece, and Peloponnesus, in which provinces he committed unheard-of ravages, burnt several cities, took others, and among the rest Larissa, the inhabitants whereof he transplanted, with their whole families, into Bulgaria, incorporated such of them as were able to bear arms among his troops, and employed them against the Romans. Basilus therefore, highly provoked against the Bulgarians, had no sooner put an end to the civil war, than he resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against them. Pursuant to this resolution, having drawn together all his forces, he left Constantinople, without acquainting even his own generals with his design; and, putting himself at the head of his army, he entered Bulgaria through the country lying near Rhodoptes and the river Eurus, leaving Leo Melissenus behind him to secure the streights, while he, by a short cut through woods and marshes, advanced to Sardica, by the Bulgarians called Triaditza, with a design to lay siege to that important place; but as he was making the necessary preparations for the attack, Stephen, the commander of the western forces, and an irreconcilable enemy to Leo Melissenus, coming to him in the dead of the night, assured him, that Leo intended to usurp the sovereign power, and with that design was marching, with all the troops under his command, to the imperial city. The emperor, alarmed at this account, and at the same time apprehending the enemy might seize on the passes abandoned by Leo, and cut off his retreat, immediately ordered the army to march. They no sooner began to move, than Samuel, rushing down from the neighbouring mountains, where he had kept the whole time, fell with great fury upon them in their retreat, and turned it into a precipitous and disorderly flight. All their baggage was taken, with the imperial robes and diadem; great numbers of the soldiers, and some officers of distinction, were cut in pieces; but the emperor with much-ado escaped to Philippopolis, where he found Leo carefully attending his duty, and guarding the post, which had been committed to his care. The emperor, though highly provoked, and indeed with a great deal of reason, against Stephen, the author of so much mischief, contented himself with reviling him only in words, till he began to defend what he had done; and then Basilus, no longer able to command his temper, leaped from his seat, and, taking hold of him by his locks and beard, pulled him down to the ground.

make new inroads into the empire.

THE two following years, the emperor was diverted, by intestine broils, from pursuing the war against the Bulgarians; and Samuel their king, taking advantage of these disturbances, harassed, with daily incursions, the neighbouring provinces. But tranquillity was no sooner restored to the empire, than Basilus began to make vast preparations both by sea and land, with a design intirely to subdue, or utterly extirpate, that restless and turbulent nation. In the first place, he took a progress into Thrace and Macedon, and, having visited the frontiers on that side, and left a strong garrison in Thessalonica, under the command of Gregorius Taronitas, to restrain the Bulgarians, he returned to Constantinople, to hasten the military preparations. In the mean time Samuel, approaching Thessalonica at the head of a numerous army, made himself master of the place, after having, by a stratagem, killed the governor, and taken his son prisoner. Elated with this success, he crossed the Peneus, and, having over-run all Thessaly, Boeotia, and Attica, he penetrated into the very heart of Peloponnesus, destroying all with fire and sword in the provinces through which he passed. Hereupon the emperor dispatched Nicephorus Uranius against him, with the flower of the army, who, leaving his heavy baggage at Larissa, passed with incredible expedition the Pharsalian plains, and the river Apidanus, arrived at the Spercheius, and encamped on the banks of that river opposite to Samuel. The river was then so swelled, that Samuel, believing the Romans could not pass it, lay with great security on the other side. However, Uranius, having fought with indefatigable pains, and at length found out, a ford, passed the river in the dead of the night, and, falling upon the Bulgarians while they lay asleep, without the least apprehension of danger, made a dreadful havock of them before they had time to repair to their arms. Samuel, and his son Romanus, were dangerously wounded, and must unavoidably have fallen into the conqueror's hands, had they not kept themselves concealed the whole day among the dead bodies, and in the night stole away to the mountains of Ætolia, and, keeping the tops of those mountains, to mount Pindus, and thence into Bulgaria. Upon his return home, he found his daughter enamoured to such a degree of Asotes the son of Gregory, late governor of Thessalonica, who had been taken prisoner, as we have related above, that she declared she was determined to destroy herself, unless she was allowed to marry him. Samuel complied with her desire, and, as soon as the nuptial solemnity was over, sent his new son-in-law, with his wife, to reside at Dyrrhachium, appointing him governor of that important place; but he had not been long there, when, hearing that the emperor's galleys were cruising on the coast, he laid hold of that opportunity to return to Constantinople, where both he and his wife, whom he had easily persuaded to accompany him, were kindly received and preferred by the emperor, he to the dignity of magister, and she to that of zosta, whose province it was to take care of the imperial wardrobe. Asotes brought letters with him to the emperor from Chryselius, one of the chief officers in Dyrrhachium, wherein he promised to deliver the city into the hands of the Romans, on condition the emperor conferred the dignity of patrician on him, and his two sons; but, so far as we can conjecture from Cedrenus, whose text is strangely maimed in this place, the delivering up of the city was prevented by the death of Chryselius. However, the emperor became master of the place not long after; but in what manner, we are not told. The following year the emperor entered Bulgaria in person by the way of Philippopolis, and, having taken there several castles and strong-holds, he detached from Mosynopolis part of his army, under the command of Theodoracranus a patrician, and Nicephorus Xiphias protospaschian, against the Bulgarian cities beyond mount Hæmus. By these were reduced the Great and the Little Peristhlaba, with Pliscoba, and several other fortified places. The ensuing year, Basilus in person made a second inroad into Bulgaria, by the way of Thessalonica, took some cities, burnt a great number of a villages, and laid the country waste far and near. The city of Boraa was delivered up to him by Dobromerus, governor of the place, whom the emperor honoured with the title and rank of proconsul. The city of Servia, which was defended by a numerous garrison, under the command of Nicolas, made a long and vigorous resistance; but was taken in the end by storm. From Servia the emperor returned to Constantinople, carrying with him a great number of captives, and among the rest Nicolas, governor of the place, whom, for his gallant behaviour, he generously raised to the rank of a patrician. But Nicolas, preferring the service of his master to all the honours the emperor could confer upon him, made his escape soon after to Samuel, and with him laid siege to Servia; which the emperor no sooner understood, than he hastened thither in person, obliged the Bulgarians to retire, and, falling upon them in their retreat, took Nicolas a second time prisoner, and sent him to Constantinople, where he was, by the emperor's orders, kept under close confinement. From Servia Basilus led his army into Thessaly, and there repaired such castles, as had been dismantled by the Bulgarians, recovered those that were still held by them, and reunited that province, after it had been some time in their hands, to the empire. The year after, Basilus, early in the spring, entered Bulgaria anew, and laid siege to Bodyna, which held out for the space of eight months; but was in the end taken by storm. As the autumn was already far spent, the emperor, having left a strong garrison in Bodyna, marched back with the rest of his troops to Constantinople. When he came, on his return home, to the river Axius, he found Samuel, with all the forces he had been able to assemble, encamped on the opposite bank. But Basilus, having discovered a ford, and passed the river in the dead of the night, fell early next morning on the enemy, before they could put themselves in a posture of defence, and gave them a total overthrow. Samuel's army being thus defeated and dispersed, Romanus, the son of the late king Peter, and brother to Borises, delivered up to the emperor the city of Scopiaz, of which he was governor, and was on that account rewarded with the dignity of patrician. Samuel, no longer able to keep the field, placed strong guards in all the passes, to prevent the emperor from penetrating farther into Bulgaria. However, Basilus, bent upon the intire reduction of the country, forced, not without great loss of men, several passes; but, in the streights of Cimba Longus, he had been cut off with his whole army, had not Nicephorus Xiphias, governor of Philippopolis, marching with a strong detachment through by-ways, and over a steep mountain, fallen unexpectedly on the enemy's rear, and by that means obliged them to abandon their post. Hereupon Basilus, entering the streights without opposition, pursued them with great slaughter, though they retired in good order, and, often facing about, skirmished with the Romans. In one of these skirmishes the king narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the Romans by the valour and conduct of his son, who rescued him when he was already surrounded on all sides, and conveyed him safe to the castle of Prilapus, though closely pursued by a body of Roman horse. On this occasion the emperor is said to have taken fifteen thousand prisoners, whom, contrary to his custom, he treated with great inhumanity; for he caused their eyes to be put out, and, to every hundred assigning a guide, who had one eye left, sent them in that condition to Samuel. The king of the Bulgarians, already broken with age, and worn out with misfortunes, was so shocked at this dismal spectacle, that he fell into a swoon; and though he returned to himself again, yet, not able to bear up against so great a calamity, he died two days after.

Samuel, king of the Bulgarians, dies of grief.

Samuel was succeeded by his son Gabriel, whom he had by a captive of Larissa. In the beginning of his reign, the emperor, pursuing the conquest of Bulgaria, made himself master of a strong castle named Matzucius, and then sat down before Strumpitza, a place of great strength. During the siege, he detached Theophylact, one of his generals, with a body of chosen men, to reduce the strong-holds among the mountains, and open a way through the woods. Theophylact made himself master of several places; but being in the end surprised by the Bulgarians in a narrow pass, where he could not draw up his men, he was cut off, with the whole body under his command. The emperor, to whom Strumpitza had submitted after a vigorous resistance, hearing of this misfortune, thought it advisable to retreat; and accordingly marched back to Mosynopolis, and thence to Thessalonica. On his route, he took the castles of Prilapus, Stypeius, Melencius, and Budena, and burnt Buteliana, the royal palace of the Bulgarian kings. During the winter, Gabriel was killed, while he was ^a hunting, by Bladistblabus, the son of Aaron, whose life he had formerly preserved, as we have related above. Bladistblabus, being acknowledged king by the Bulgarians, immediately acquainted the emperor with the death of Gabriel, and his own promotion, acknowledging himself at the same time a subject and vassal of the empire. But Basilus, suspecting his sincerity, returned early in the spring into Bulgaria, and there made himself master of several strong castles, and fortified towns, in one of which he took some of the principal men among the Bulgarians. In the mean time Bladistblabus sent a new deputation to the emperor, offering to submit upon what terms he should think proper to prescribe. At the same time the emperor received letters from the Bulgarians, owning themselves his subjects and vassals. But Basilus, ^b being informed, that neither the king nor his subjects were sincere in their declarations, and that they had made an attempt upon Dyrrbachium, hoping to surprise that important place, entered Bulgaria anew, and, having laid waste the countries of Ostrobos, Gofens, and Pelagonia, advanced to Achris, the place where the Bulgarian kings usually resided, which he reduced; and then, leaving part of his army in Pelagonia, to awe the Bulgarians, he marched out with the rest to reduce the neighbouring provinces. But he was scarce gone, when Ibatzes, a man of great distinction among the Bulgarians, and remarkable for his valour, and experience in war, having drawn the Romans left by the emperor into an ambuscade, cut them off, with their commanders, all to a man. Hereupon Basilus, marching back in great rage, ^c laid several cities in ashes, ravaged the open country with fire and sword, and, having taken a great number of prisoners, ordered their eyes to be put out, and, in that condition, sent them to Bladistblabus. On the other hand, the Bulgarians, making frequent sallies from the woods, cut great numbers of his men in pieces; inso-much that, his army being greatly diminished, he thought it adviseable to return earlier than usual to Constantinople. On his march, he laid siege to the castle of Per-nicus; but the garrison making a vigorous resistance, he lay before it eighty days, assaulting it almost every day with his whole army; but, being constantly repulsed with great loss of men, he was in the end obliged to drop the enterprize, and retire. However, thinking he could not, without forfeiting his reputation, drop the war, ^d till he had intirely subdued Bulgaria, after having so often invaded it in person, he allowed his army but a short respite; and then, taking the field again, he laid siege to Castoria, a fortified town in Pelagonia. But in the mean time the king of the Bulgarians, having drawn together all the forces he could muster, began to march towards the frontiers of the empire, in order to oblige the emperor to abandon Bulgaria, and hasten back to the defence of his own dominions. Basilus accordingly, breaking up the siege of Castoria, marched against Bladistblabus, who, not caring to put the whole to the issue of an engagement, retired at his approach. Basilus detached Constantine Diogenes in pursuit of the enemy, who put many of them to the sword, took the horses and baggage of the king, with one of his kinsmen, and returned ^e loaded with booty. After this, the emperor took by storm the castle of Satana, where he found a great quantity of corn, which he caused to be removed, and then set fire to the place. Having ended the campaign, he returned, according to his custom, to Constantinople. He was no sooner gone, than the king of the Bulgarians laid siege to Dyrrbachium; but the garrison making a vigorous resistance, he was slain in an assault. The Bulgarians, who had hitherto defended their country with an unparalleled valour, and maintained their liberties against the whole strength of the empire, in a war which had lasted twenty years and upwards, being now quite disheartened by the loss of their king, sent deputies to the emperor, with offers of a total and unfeigned submission. Basilus received them in the most obliging manner, ^f and, hastening into Bulgaria, was met on the confines by the governors of thirty-six castles, which they delivered up to him. Their example was followed by most of the chief men of Bulgaria, and even by the wife of the deceased king, who, coming to the emperor, with three of her sons, and her six daughters, renounced all claim to the kingdom of Bulgaria. She had three other sons by the king; but they had taken refuge on the tops of the Ceraunic mountains, whence they were soon after obliged by famine, the emperor having ordered all the passes to be carefully guarded, to come down, and surrender themselves. Basilus received them in the most obliging manner imaginable, raised Profranus, who seems to have been the eldest, to the dignity of magister, and the other five to that of patrician. To the mother, and ^g the

- a the daughters, he allowed a maintenance suitable to their rank, and ever treated them with the utmost respect. At Acbris, where the Bulgarian kings usually resided, he was received by his new subjects with loud acclamations. There he seized on the immense treasure of the Bulgarian princes, and found, among other things of great value, several crowns enriched with pearl, and a great quantity of gold, which he bestowed as a donative upon his soldiers *. There remained now but one man in the whole country capable of raising disturbances, who had not submitted to the emperor. This was Ibaizes, a person nearly allied to the royal family, and one who, during the course of the war, had given several instances of his courage, and implacable hatred to the Romans. He, refusing to comply with the present posture of affairs, seized on a castle standing on the top of a mountain most difficult of access, and, having fortified himself there, declared, that he was resolved to hold out to the last extremity. But in what manner he was seized in his castle, and brought to the emperor, we have related at length in our Roman history †, to which we refer the reader. And now Basilius, absolute master of all Bulgaria, took a progress through the country, receiving every-where the submissions of his new subjects, and causing several castles to be demolished, lest the Bulgarians, seizing on them, should attempt to shake off the yoke. Then, leaving Bulgaria, he repaired to Athens, and, ascribing the success that had attended his arms to the protection of the virgin Mary, he enriched her church in that city with many presents of great value. From Athens he returned to Constantinople, which he entered in triumph through the Golden gate, amidst the loud acclamations of the multitude, the widow of the late king of the Bulgarians, with all the princes and princesses of the blood royal, walking before him. This conquest and final reduction of Bulgaria, which had been often attempted in vain by other emperors, was effected by Basilius in the forty-fourth year of his reign, and of the christian æra 1019.

- THE Bulgarians bore the yoke patiently for the space of seventeen years, that is, till the year 1036. the second of Michael IV. when they revolted on the following occasion: One Deleanus, as we read in Cedrenus, or Dolianus, as Zonaras calls him, by birth a Bulgarian, but slave or servant to a citizen of Constantinople, escaping from his master, fled into Bulgaria, and there gave out, that he was the son of Gabriel, and grandson of Samuel, kings of that country. This he affirmed with such confidence, that the Bulgarians, giving intire credit to all he said, and being already weary of the yoke, to which they had lately submitted, received him every-where with joyful acclamations, and proclaimed him king of Bulgaria, sacrificing to this new idol all the Romans, who had the misfortune to fall into their hands. Basilius Synademus, governor of Dyrrbachium, no sooner heard of this insurrection, than he marched out against the rebels, with all the troops under his command; but an unseasonable quarrel arising between him and a tribune in the army, named Michael Democaitas, the contention was carried to such a height, that the tribune accused Synademus at court of high treason; who was thereupon, by the emperor's orders, seized, and sent to Theffalonica, to be confined there to close prison. The accuser was preferred to the government of Dyrrbachium in his room; but in that command he behaved with such insolence, that the people, no longer able to bear his tyrannical temper, and cruel exactions, rose against him, and drove him out of the town. This they were well apprised the emperor would highly resent, and therefore, despairing of pardon, they openly revolted, and chose for their king one Teichomer, a soldier of great reputation among them. This unexpected election very much surprised Deleanus, and his adherents; for there were now two powerful factions in Bulgaria, the city and territory of Dyrrbachium acknowledging Teichomer, and the rest of the country Deleanus. This, Deleanus was well apprised, would occasion the ruin of both, and therefore resolved, by some means or other, to get rid of his new rival; but, as that could not be well effected by force, he had recourse to artifice; and, pretending to be highly pleased with the election of Teichomer, he wrote obliging letters to him, congratulating him upon his new dignity, expressed great joy in having him for his colleague, and earnestly intreated him to come and share the sovereignty with him. Teichomer, believing him sincere in his professions, went and joined him with all his forces. Deleanus, having thus got him, as he thought, into his power, watched his opportunity; and, having called the soldiers together, he told them, that Bul- garia could not, in his opinion, admit of two kings; and that therefore they ought a either to confirm his election, who was descended from Samuel, and remove Teichomer, or, if they thought fit, to depose him, and vest Teichomer with the whole power. This speech occasioned, at first, a great contest in the army, which ended in the choice of Deleanus, and the death of Teichomer, who was stoned by the soldiery.

Deleanus, having thus got the whole power into his hands, led his army, without loss of time, towards Thessalonica, where Michael then was; but, upon the first news of his approach, the emperor fled to Constantinople, leaving all his baggage and treasure behind him, under the care of Manuel Ibatza, who was ordered to convey it to the imperial city. But Ibatza, betraying his trust, carried it over to Deleanus, whose party being strengthened by some new accession almost every day, he sent a strong b body of troops, under the conduct of one Caucanus, against Dyrrhachium, which was soon reduced; and dispatched another, commanded by one Anthemius, into Greece, at whose approach the province of Nicopolis, revolting from the emperor, cut in pieces his officers, by whom they had been most grievously oppressed, and submitted to the rebels. In the mean time Alusianus, the second son of Aaron, and brother to Bladislabus the last king of Bulgaria, who, submitting with the rest of his countrymen to Basilus, had been raised by him to the rank of patrician, retiring privately from Constantinople, returned into his native country. He had been accused of some illegal proceedings by the inhabitants of Theodosiopolis, of which city he had been appointed governor by Basilus. Hereupon John, the emperor's brother, who ruled c with an absolute sway, and bore an irreconcilable hatred to Alusianus, not only prevailed upon Michael to forbid him the court, but obliged him, before his cause was heard, to pay a great sum of gold, and, what provoked him most, forced a beautiful woman from him, for whom he had a great passion. Alusianus, not knowing how far the emperor, at the instigation of his brother, might carry his resentment, retired privately from Constantinople, and, in the disguise of an Armenian, got safe to Ostro- bus, where Deleanus lay encamped with his army. Both the soldiery and people received him with the greatest demonstrations of joy; which did not a little alarm Deleanus. However, dissembling his fears, and pretending to be no less pleased with his arrival than the rest, he offered to share with him the sovereignty. Alusia- d nus readily accepted the offer, and, being by all acknowledged as his colleague, in order to gain the affections of the people and soldiery, he immediately marched, at the head of forty thousand men, to besiege Thessalonica. But Constantine the patrician, a person nearly related to the emperor, making a very gallant and vigorous resistance, Alusianus, after having, for six days together, battered the walls with all sorts of engines, and attempted, with repeated assaults, to make himself master of the place, was in the end obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, hoping the garrison would be soon forced by famine to submit. But the besieged, making a general and unexpected sally, cut fifteen thousand of the Bulgarians in pieces, and obliged the rest to break up the siege, and save themselves by a precipitous flight. This defeat e increased the jealousies, which the two competitors had already conceived of each other, Deleanus ascribing the overthrow to treachery, and Alusianus, upon the sense of his late misfortune, apprehending that his rival would lay hold of the first opportunity to stir up the people and soldiery against him: thus each in private began to meditate the ruin and destruction of the other. But Alusianus was in the end beforehand with his colleague; for, having invited him to an entertainment, he encouraged him to drink till he was quite intoxicated, and then caused his eyes to be put out.
After this, distrustful of his own interest, and well acquainted with the fickle temper of the Bulgarians, he wrote to the emperor, offering to submit, and return to his duty, provided Michael would grant him his pardon, and such a reward as his service f might be thought to deserve. The emperor readily complied with his request, conferred on him the dignity of magister, and sent him to Constantinople. Michael had already resolved to march in person into Bulgaria, and employ the whole strength of the empire against the rebels, saying, it was a shame for him, who had added nothing to the empire, to suffer any part of it to be lost. Upon the submission therefore of Alusianus, he led his army, without loss of time, into Bulgaria, though he was then so ill of a dropsy, that all about him thought every day would prove his last. However, being resolved not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of attacking the Bulgarians, while destitute of a leader, he could by no means be prevailed upon to drop the enterprize. Upon his first entering Bulgaria, Deleanus fell into his g

- a hands, whom he immediately sent to Thessalonica; then, penetrating farther into the country, he dispersed some Bulgarians, who began to assemble, received the allegiance of the chief men of the country, and, having taken Manuel Ibatzes, of whom we have spoken above, he returned with him and Deleanus in triumph to Constantinople. From this time the Bulgarians continued subject to the emperors of Constantinople, whom they powerfully assisted both against the Latins and the Turks, and were on that account allowed to chuse a king of their own nation, who nevertheless owned himself a vassal of the empire. In 1206. John, king of Bulgaria, marching against Baldwin, the first emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, while he was besieging Adrianople, defeated his army with great slaughter, relieved the city, and, having taken the emperor himself prisoner, carried him to Ternova, at that time the capital of Bulgaria. There he caused his hands and feet to be cut off, and then ordered him, thus maimed, to be thrown into a neighbouring valley, where he lay in the utmost agony for three days, and then expiring, was devoured by the wild beasts and birds of prey. In 1275. Stephen, the fourth king of Hungary, overcame in a great battle Cea prince of Bulgaria, and, having cut his whole army in pieces, obliged the Bulgarians to acknowledge him for their king. Hence Stephen and his successors were styled kings of Hungary and Bulgaria, which title passed, with the kingdom of Hungary, to the princes of the house of Austria, as we shall hereafter relate more at length. With the assistance of the Greek emperors they shook off the Hungarian yoke, and in 1369. under the conduct of Sasmenos their king, they attempted the recovery of Adrianople, taken by the Turks; but were utterly defeated by Amurat I. who had no sooner settled his affairs in Asia, than, provoked against the Bulgarians for their late attempt, he turned his arms against them, and, entering Bulgaria with a numerous army, made himself master of several strong holds, and obliged Sasmenos to purchase a peace, by yielding to him the far greater part of his kingdom, and promising to hold the rest as his vassal and tributary. But Bajazet, who succeeded Amurat, invading Bulgaria without the least provocation, made an absolute conquest of the whole country in 1396. and reduced it to a province of the Turkish empire, in which state it has continued ever since. We shall now, in compliance with our plan, proceed to the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy, from Theodoric to their expulsion by Narses; of the exarchs of Ravenna, till driven out by the Lombards; and of the Lombards in Italy, to Desiderius their last king, taken prisoner by Charlemagne. These three different histories will afford us matter for the following chapter, and with them we shall close the antient history, or the history of the antient nations.

The history of the Ostrogoths in Italy, the exarchs of Ravenna, and the Lombards in Italy.

The history of the Ostrogoths in Italy, to their expulsion by Narses.

- c IN the foregoing chapter, we brought Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths into Italy, and there placed him on the throne of Odoacer. We shall now give the reader a succinct account of this excellent prince's reign, whom we must not look upon as an intruder or usurper, but as the lawful sovereign of the countries he held, especially of the kingdom of Italy; for when he first imparted to Zeno his design of invading that country, the emperor not only approved of the undertaking, but encouraged him to it, and, recommending to his protection the senate and people of Rome, dismissed him loaded with rich presents. During the course of the war, Theodoric sent distinct accounts of all that passed to the emperor, who was highly pleased with the success that that attended his arms; nay, when he was informed, that Theodoric only wanted Ra- ^a venna to be intire master of Italy, he advised him to lay aside the Gotbic dress, and assume the royal diadem, mantle, and other ensigns of majesty; which was acknowledging him king of Italy^a. Upon the reduction of Ravenna, which happened in the second year of the reign of Anastasi, the successor of Zeno, he was by the new emperor acknowledged for a just and lawful prince; for though the Goths, as we read in the anonymous of Valesius^b, upon the death of Odoacer, proclaimed him anew king of all Italy, without the consent and approbation of the emperor, yet Anastasi approved of what they had done, as is manifest from the letters he wrote to him, and from Theodoric's answer to them, which have been transmitted to us by Calpurnius.

 Besides, when Theodoric undertook the conquest of Italy, the western empire was at ^b an end; Spain was held by the Vandals, the Visigoths, and the Sueves; Gaul by the Franks and Burgundians; Britain by the Saxons; and Italy left a prey to the Heruli, the Rugians, and other barbarous nations. While the last-mentioned country, which, for so many ages, had given law to the world, was thus groaning under the yoke of the barbarians, the emperors of the east being no-ways in a condition to afford it the least relief, Theodoric, with their consent and approbation, undertook the great work, and having, at his own charges, and with troops of his own nation, driven out the tyrant, he was, with loud acclamations, received by the people as their king and deliverer. The only person, who had then any claim to Italy, was the emperor of the east, and both Zeno, and his successor Anastasi, acknowledged Theodoric king ^c of that country, not only allowing him to wear the royal ensigns, but transferring to him all their claims and rights, as we read in Procopius, a writer no-ways favourable to the Goths, not to mention Jornandes, or Ennodius the holy bishop of Pavia, who affirm the same thing, but may perhaps be thought biassed in favour of Theodoric, the former being a Goth by nation, and the latter a great admirer of Theodoric, on account of his eminent virtues, which he celebrated in a panegyric, that has reached our times. Hence, when the Goths, upon their being attacked by the emperor Justi- nian, had recourse to the Franks, they told them, among other things, that they might expect the same treatment from the emperors, which the Goths now met with, since they made war upon them, alleging, that Theodoric had invaded Italy, which ^d belonged to the Romans; whereas he had not taken that country from them, but from Odoacer, and had been, even by them, owned lawful king of Italy, till the power of the Goths being at a low ebb, the emperor thought himself in a condition to strip them of what had been yielded to them by his predecessors^e. But to return to Theodoric: Tho' he was master of all Italy and Sicily, and likewise of Rhetia, No- ricum, Dalmatia, Liburnia, Istria, and great part of Suevia, Pannonia, and Gaul, and governed Spain, as guardian to his young nephew Amalaric, yet he did not assume the title of emperor, but contented himself with that of king, either out of respect to the emperors of the east; or because he reckoned the title of king, denoting an independent authority, more honourable than that of emperor; or perhaps because Odo- ^e acer, whom he succeeded, had taken no other. Be that as it will, Theodoric, having no enemy to contend with after the death of Odoacer, sheathed his sword, and applied himself wholly to the establishing of good order throughout his new dominions. He retained the same laws, the same magistrates, the same polity, and the same distribution of provinces. Military honours, for the most part, he conferred on the Goths, but preferred the Romans alone to civil employments. Hence the Romans, that is, the antient inhabitants of Italy, were highly pleased with his government; and Gela- sius, bishop of Rome, wrote a letter to him, congratulating him upon his happy administration. He distributed the Goths among the fortified places, with their captains, who, in time of war, commanded them, and governed them in time of peace. ^f
 As for the Romans, they were governed by the same magistrates, as they had been under the emperors; but with this difference, that by the emperors was sent a confu- larius, a praeses, a corrector, into each province, to whom, in all suits, recourse was to be had from the most remote parts; whereas the Goths sent, besides the above-mentioned magistrates, others of an inferior rank to every small village, who, by administering justice there, delivered the people from the great trouble, and vast ex-pences, they had been at, in the Roman times, when the power of deciding controversies was vested in the supreme magistrate alone. The Goths were, as appears

a from Cassiodore, no less scrupulous in the choice of these inferior magistrates, than of the greater officers, employing only persons of known integrity, and acceptable to the people, and allowing no appeals to other tribunals, but in cases of manifest injustice. Of these inferior magistrates some were called cancellarii, others canonicarii, comites referendarii, &c. Petrus Pontinus wrote a book of the dignities of the Gothic court^d; but, as Grotius well observes^e, he might have saved himself that trouble, since they are minutely described in the sixth and seventh books of Cassiodore.

As Theodoric made no alteration in the laws, magistrates, or form of government, except that which we have just mentioned, so he contented himself with the same b tributes and taxes, which had been levied by the emperors; but was far more ready than they had ever been to remit them on occasion of any public calamity. Thus, he remitted to the inhabitants of Campania the tribute they usually paid, upon their representing to him, that they had suffered much by an eruption of mount Vesuvius. The letter or order which he sent on this occasion to Faustus, consularis or governor of Campania, has been transmitted to us by Cassiodore. In that letter he tells Faustus, that the inhabitants of Campania, having suffered greatly, had petitioned him for relief; that he was ready to grant them their request, provided he were rightly informed of the misfortune, and knew how to judge of the damage they had sustained. He commands him to send some person of known integrity into the territories of Nola and Naples, to view the lands, and take an estimate of the loss, that he might know c how to make a proportionable allowance out of the tribute^f. It was probably on this occasion that the Neapolitans erected, in their great forum or market-place, a statue to Theodoric, which is said to have afterwards presaged the end of the government of the Goths in Italy (M). In like manner Theodoric exempted the inhabitants of Sipontum in Puglia from all taxes for the space of two years, upon their representing to him, that their lands had been laid waste by the Vandals of Africa, who were constantly making descents on the coasts of Italy^g.

He not only forgave, but preferred to the first employments, several Italians, or, as they were still called in his time, Romans, who had stood by Odoacer to the last^h; but such as had once declared for him, and afterwards revolted to the enemy, he d punished according to the Roman law, taking from them the power of making testaments. But, in the third year of his reign, he was prevailed upon by Laurentius and Epiphanius, the one bishop of Milan, the other of Pavia, to forgive them, and publish a general pardon. Upon his becoming master of Italy, he did not treat the natives as those of the other Roman provinces were treated by the barbarians, who conquered them. These stripped the ancient proprietors of their lands, estates, and possessions, dividing them among their chiefs, and giving to one, as it happened in Gaul, conquered by the Franks, a province, with the title of duke; to another a frontier country, with the title of marquis; to some a city, and the title of count; to others a castle or village, with the title of baronⁱ. But Theodoric, who piqued him- e self upon governing after the Roman manner, and observing the Roman laws and institutions, left every one in the full enjoyment of his ancient property; for the feudal tenures, dukedoms, counties, &c. were not introduced into Italy by the Goths, but by the Lombards, as we shall relate hereafter. As to religion, Theodoric held, as all the Goths did, the tenets of Arius, but allowed his subjects to profess, without molestation, the faith of the council of Nice; nay, he gave free liberty to the Goths them-

(M) This statue was made of small pebbles of various colours, and so artfully joined together, that they represented Theodoric to the life. While he was still alive, the head of the statue fell, and broke to pieces; and soon after Theodoric died. He was succeeded by Athalaric his grandson, in the eighth year of whose reign, the belly of the statue, all on a sudden, fell of itself; and a few days after news was brought to Naples of the death of Athalaric. Not long after, the genitals dropped off; and an account was brought of the unhappy and undeferved end of Amalasuntha, the daughter of Theodoric, and mother of the late king. But when Justinian declared war against the Goths, the thighs and feet of the statue fell to the ground; from which event the Romans concluded, that the empire of the Goths in Italy was at an end, and that they would be soon driven out, as it happened. This presage, says Procopius, from whom we have borrowed the whole account, greatly encouraged the emperor's troops, and gave them certain hopes of victory (1).

selves to renounce, if they pleased, the doctrine of Arius, and embrace the catholic faith. He suffered none to be chosen for the government of the church but persons of known probity ^k. A great schism arising in his time, he used his utmost endeavours to restore the church to its former tranquillity, which in the end he effected, by causing a council to be assembled. Several edicts, both of Theodoric and his successor Atalaric, have been transmitted to us by Cassiodore, prohibiting and annulling all simoniacal elections and ordinations of bishops ^l. Thus the ecclesiastic policy was never better observed, nor more deserving men preferred to the government of the church, than in the time of Theodoric, and the Gothic kings his successors, though they all held the tenets of Arius, their nation having been first instructed in the christian religion by Arian teachers, sent them by the emperor Valens. Theodoric, ^b though an Arian, is highly commended for his piety by Ennodius bishop of Pavia, a most zealous stickler for the faith of Nice, as are the Goths in general by Salvianus, the catholic bishop of Marseilles, who ascribes their errors, not to them, but to those who first instructed them ^m. Theodoric is no less commended by all the writers of those times for his equity, moderation, and the tender regard he had for the welfare of his subjects, than for his piety and religion. He made good what he promised to the natives of Italy when he first took upon him the title of king, viz. that his conduct and behaviour should be such, that they should all wish they had come sooner under the government of the Goths. He not only appointed persons of great learning, known integrity, and unblemished characters, to administer justice, but often heard ^c causes himself, pronouncing sentence according to the strictest rules of justice and equity. He took upon himself the trouble of settling the prices of all necessary commodities, and assizing weights and measures: in imposing tributes, he had a particular regard to the condition and circumstances of those, who were to pay them, and was ever ready to remit them upon any remonstrance, that to him seemed reasonable. If his soldiers at any time wronged the country-people on their march, he never failed to send money to the bishops to make good the losses they had sustained. He paid ready money, not only for the necessary provisions of the army, but for the materials which he employed in building ships, fortifying his camps, &c. To the poor he was most liberal and generous, and, in a manner, made it his chief study, as Cassiodore ^d assures us, to relieve the widows and orphans. His moderation, temperance, chastity, called by Ennodius sacerdotal modesty, and other eminent virtues, are celebrated both by that writer and by Cassiodore, with such encomiums, that, if they were not greatly prejudiced in his favour, we must conclude him to have been one of the best and greatest princes, that ever swayed a sceptre. Procopius himself, tho' by nation a Greek, and secretary to the emperor Justinian, who made war upon the Goths, and in the end drove them out of Italy, could not forbear admiring and extolling the royal virtues of Theodoric.

As to the history of his reign, his first care, after he became sole master of Italy, was to repeople Liguria, in some places quite destitute of inhabitants, who had been ^e carried into captivity by the Burgundians, as we have related in the history of that people ^f. As the other provinces of Italy, exhausted by long wars, and frequent irruptions of the barbarous nations, could not spare any of their inhabitants, Theodoric resolved to ransom, at his own expence, all the Ligurians, who were kept captives among the Burgundians. Accordingly he dispatched Epiphanius to Gundebald their king, by whom, he well knew, that prelate was held in the greatest veneration, with a sufficient sum for the redemption of the captives. But Epiphanius, with his christian eloquence, and pious exhortations, persuaded Gundebald to set at liberty, without ransom, such of the Ligurians, as, through fear or famine, had delivered themselves up to the Burgundians; but for those who had been taken in battle, the king insisted upon a small sum, by way of ransom, lest he should disoblige his soldiers, by remitting what was their due, and taking from them the price of their lives and fortunes. This Epiphanius readily paid, Avitus bishop of Vienne, and Syagria, a lady of great piety, generously contributing towards it. The holy prelate, on his way home, passed with his captives through Geneva, where he prevailed upon king Godigisles to follow the example of his brother Gundebald, and set at liberty, without ransom, all the captives belonging to him, and to the royal family. With this numerous multitude Epiphanius returned in a kind of triumph to Theodoric, who a generously relieved the most indigent, and sent them all back to their respective homes¹. Thus Ennodius, who attended Epiphanius on this occasion.

WHILE Theodoric was thus wholly intent upon the establishing of good order throughout his dominions, and promoting the welfare of his new subjects, a war broke out between him and the emperor Anastasius on the following occasion: One Mundo, by nation a Goth, flying from the Gepidae, says Jornandes, withdrew to the deserts beyond the Danube, and, having assembled there a considerable number of robbers and others, who, for their crimes, had been obliged to abandon their native soil, he made himself master of a tower, named Herta, on the Danube. From thence he made frequent incursions into the neighbouring countries, and the rich booty he

b carried off drawing great numbers of abandoned people to him, he assumed the title of king, and caused himself to be acknowledged as such by his followers. His arrogant conduct highly provoked the emperor, who thereupon ordered Sabinianus, son to the great commander of that name, and general of the troops in Illyricum, to march against him. Mundo had either submitted to, or entered into an alliance with, Theodoric, then master of Pannonia, and great part of Illyricum. Hearing therefore, that Sabinianus was marching against him with ten thousand men, and a great number of waggons, loaded with arms and provisions, he had recourse to Pitzia, one of Theodoric's generals, then residing at Sirmium. Pitzia, without loss of time, marched in person to his assistance, at the head of two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, c and, joining Mundo's forces, engaged the Romans in the neighbourhood of Margus, now Galambecz, in Servia, according to Sanfon, cut most of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to take refuge, with their general, in the castle of Nator. Mundo, owning himself indebted to Theodoric for his preservation, submitted to him, says Jornandes, and became his subject². Anastasius, to be revenged on Theodoric, sent the following year a fleet, with eight thousand men on board, under the command of Romanus, to ravage the coasts of Italy. These, landing in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, were soon driven on board their ships by the Goths; but nevertheless they carried off a considerable booty, and returned with it to Anastasius, who, in this war, acted, says Jornandes, more like a pirate than a prince³. But Theodoric, who had

d formed a design of conquering Gaul, held by the Franks and Burgundians, and reuniting it to the empire of Italy, being well apprised, that he could not put this project in execution so long as he was at variance with the emperor, wrote letters to Anastasius, wherein he expresses, without betraying the least fear or meanness, his desire of renewing the peace, and living in friendship with the empire⁴. He soon after dispatched ambassadors to Constantinople, by whose means a peace was, in the end, concluded between the two princes. However, Theodoric was, for some time, diverted from pursuing his favourite scheme by the troubles and divisions that arose in Rome about the election of a bishop to that see; for, upon the death of pope Anastasius, two persons were chosen by two different factions to succeed him, viz. Symmachus, supported by Fauftus, and Laurentius by Festus. As the patrons of the two competitors were persons of great authority in the senate, and interest among the people, their division and obstinacy occasioned a kind of civil war in Rome, and several on both sides lost their lives in the quarrel. At length both parties had recourse to Theodoric, who, following the example of the late emperors, had fixed his residence at Ravenna. That prince, after having heard with great patience and attention the contending parties, prudently ordained, that he should be acknowledged as lawful bishop, who had been first elected, and had had the greatest number of voices. Hereupon Symmachus, who had been first chosen, and by a great majority, was confirmed in his see. But some of the partizans of Laurentius not acquiescing to e such an equitable decision, Theodoric, to heal the divisions of the church, was in the end obliged to summon a council, and, to appease the troubles in Rome, to take a journey thither in person; which he readily did, having a great desire to see that once celebrated metropolis of the world. He made his entry with such pomp and magnificence, as had not been seen for many ages, and was received by the senate and people with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable. He was welcomed in the senate by the celebrated Boetius, who, on that occasion, made an eloquent speech, setting forth the eminent virtues of Theodoric. To which the king answered in a most obliging manner, declaring, that he should ever have the greatest respect for that august body, and omit nothing that could contribute to their grandeur. ^a From the senate he proceeded to the circus, and there made a speech to the people, wherein he expressed his sincere desire of their welfare and prosperity, confirmed to them all the privileges they had enjoyed under the emperors his predecessors, and assured them of his protection. He spent several days in viewing the antiquities of the city, which he could not sufficiently admire. He declared, that, tho' he expected to see wonderful things, the stateliness and magnificence of the public buildings had far surpassed his expectation. He was grieved to see the walls in some places quite ruined, and contributed large sums for the repairing of them, and of some other decayed buildings. On the day of his entry, he made a grand entertainment for the senate, and gave a largess of corn to the people. Before he left Rome, he com- ^b posed the affairs both of the church and state in the best manner he could, and declared, upon his departure, that he was sorry he could not fix his residence in such an august city, the safety of the state obliging him to reside, as his predecessors had done, at Ravenna, where he was near at hand, and ready to put a stop to the irruptions of the barbarians, who, on that side, broke into Italy. He was scarce returned, when news was brought him, that the Bulgarians had made an irruption into Pannonia, and, advancing as far as Sirmium, had surprised that city. Hereupon he dispatched Petza with a considerable army against them, who, in one campaign, recovered Sirmium, and drove them quite out of Pannonia. To the government of that province Theodoric raised one Colosseus, a comes or count. From the copy of his commission, ^c which has been transmitted to us by Cassiodore, it appears, that the power of those governors extended both to civil and military affairs, and that the prince conferred that power on them, by girding them with a sword ^w. In the same writer is a letter written by Theodoric, and directed to all the barbarians and Romans inhabiting Pannonia, wherein he acquaints them, that he had appointed Colosseus to be their governor, and requires them to obey him as such.

dians.

Theodoric, having thus settled his affairs at home, resolved to attempt the execution of the project, which he had formed from the very beginning of his reign, which was, as we have hinted above, to drive the Burgundians and Franks out of Gaul, and reunite that country to Italy. His design was to begin with the Burgundians, and, ^d after having reduced them, to fall upon the Franks. But as the Burgundians were then a powerful nation, and masters of all the passes in the Alps, Theodoric, entering into an alliance with Clovis king of the Franks, prevailed upon him to attack the Burgundians on one side, while he attempted to enter their country on the other. Of the conduct of Theodoric in this war, we have spoken above ^x, and therefore shall only add here, that he acquired on this occasion the city of Marseilles, and its territory, with all the countries lying between the Durance, the Alps, the Mediterranean, and the Lower Rhône. Some years after, a war breaking out between Clovis and Alaric king of the Visigoths in Gaul, Theodoric, putting himself at the head of his army, marched to the assistance of the latter; but Clovis having in the mean time killed Alaric in ^e battle, and defeated his army, the king of the Ostrogoths, jealous of the growing power of the Franks, ordered his troops to join him from all parts, and, entering Gaul, obliged the Franks, who had laid siege to Carcaffone, to abandon the enterprize, and retire. The following year, the Franks besieged the city of Arles; but the siege was raised, and the Franks defeated with great slaughter, by the army which Theodoric had sent to the assistance of his countrymen, under the conduct of one Hibba, distinguished with the title of count. A peace was soon after concluded between Theodoric and Clovis, whereof one of the articles was, that the Franks should keep the countries which they had taken from the Visigoths, Theodoric having attempted in ^f vain, as we read in Procopius, to recover them ^y. Amalaric, the grandson of Theodoric, was, at this time, king of the Visigoths; but as he was yet under age, Theodoric, who was his guardian, exercised the same authority in the young prince's dominions, as he did in his own. In virtue of this peace, the Ostrogoths continued masters of the province they held before, lying between the Alps, the Mediterranean, the Rhône, and the Durance, and appropriated to themselves the city of Arles for the charges they had been at in this war. These countries Theodoric transmitted to his posterity; but could make no farther conquests in Gaul, being opposed by the Franks, who were become very powerful in that country.

Amalaric,

- a Amalaric, the grandson of Theodoric by his daughter Theodegotba, had succeeded his father Alaric in the kingdom of the Visigoths; but as he was only five years old when his father was killed by Clovis, as we have hinted above, his subjects, scorning to be governed by an infant, revolted from him, and raised to the throne Gaselic, the son of Alaric by a concubine. Hereupon Theodoric, who was guardian to the young prince, dispatched Hibba, or, as some call him, Ilba, into Gaul with a numerous army, to drive out the usurper, and restore Amalaric to the throne. Upon his approach, Gaselic fled into Spain, and from thence, hearing that Hibba was marching after him, he crossed the Streights, and took refuge in the court of Thrasimund, king of the Vandals in Africa, who, either pitying his condition, or thinking it high time to give a check to the overgrown power of the Ostrogoths, received him in a friendly manner, though he had married the sister of Theodoric. After he had continued some time in Africa, he passed from thence privately into Gaul, and, having gained over some of the leading men among the Visigoths, he in the end discovered himself, and, being supplied with money by Thrasimund, he levied an army, and re-entered Spain; but, being met and overcome in battle by Hibba about twelve miles from Barcelona, he fled back into Gaul, and there died of grief, four years after he had been declared king. Some authors write, that upon his death Theodoric caused himself to be acknowledged king of the Visigoths in Spain, and that he went into that country. It is true, that to all the synods, which were held at this time in Spain, the name of Theodoric is prefixed, and the years of his reign. But nevertheless the best and most credible authors suppose Amalaric to have been king, and that Theodoric governed only as his guardian. As for Theodoric's expedition into Spain, we cannot persuade ourselves, that such a remarkable event would have been passed over in silence by Cassiodore, and the other writers, who have so minutely described that prince's actions. Some Spanish writers add, that, at Toledo, Theodoric married a woman of the race of the ancient Spaniards; that he was prevailed upon by her to restore to the natives their liberty; and that of this marriage was born Severianus, the father of Leander and Isidore; a story no less repugnant to truth than chronology. Theodoric, according to the best writers, did not go himself into Spain, as we have observed above, but appointed one Theudas to govern that country during the minority of his grandson Amalaric.

Whom he restores to the throne.

- THE king of the Ostrogoths, having settled the affairs of his grandson in Spain, turned his arms against the Alemans; but all we know of this war is, that he in the end obliged them to submit to an annual tribute^a, and subdued the inhabitants of Suevia; for, in one of his letters directed to them, he acquaints them, that he had appointed one Fridelad to be their governor, and strictly enjoined him to restrain thefts and robberies, which were very frequent among them. Hitherto Theodoric had governed with such prudence, equity, and moderation, that he deserved to be proposed as a pattern to all princes; but some think, that these, and his other eminent virtues, were sullied by his putting to death the celebrated Boetius, and his father-in-law Symmachus. Boetius was by rank a patrician, had been at least twice consul, and was descended from one of the most ancient and illustrious families of Rome; for some derive his pedigree from the celebrated Manlius Torquatus. His family had been ennobled in latter times by his great-grandfather Anicius, and by several other persons, who had discharged, with great applause, the first employments both civil and military. We are told, that strangers came to Rome from distant countries, on purpose to behold the splendor and magnificence of the Anician family, which had engrossed, if Zosimus is to be credited, the whole wealth of Rome^b. But Boetius was still more remarkable for his morals and learning, than for the splendor and antiquity of his family. In his younger years he studied at Athens, where the study of philosophy had been restored, and spent in that university near eighteen years. He examined there, with great application, the grounds of the different sects and opinions, and, so all the rest, preferred the sect of the Peripatetics, to which he intirely addicted himself. Till his time, the name of Aristotle, the founder of that sect, was scarce known to the Latins; but the works of that great philosopher being translated by him, and illustrated with learned comments in the Latin tongue, the Peripatetic philosophy began to be, and has been ever since, in great vogue. Besides Aristotle, Boetius translated into the Latin tongue several other Greek writers, viz.

Pythagoras, Ptolemy the astronomer, Nicomachus, Euclid, Plato, Archimedes, &c. He ^a not only excelled all his contemporaries in profane learning, but likewise in the knowledge of the holy scriptures, and was, as we read in Cassiodore^c, the greatest divine, as well as the greatest philosopher, of his time. The book he wrote of the Trinity against Nestorius and Eutyches sufficiently shews how well he was versed in the scriptures. As for his morals, he is highly commended on that score by all the writers of those times. He was impartial in the administration of justice, and employed the great power he had at court in protecting the innocent, relieving the needy, and procuring the redress of such grievances, as gave just occasion of complaint. His espousing, against the great men at court, the cause of those who were unjustly accused or oppressed, gained him many enemies, who, in the end, com- ^b passed his ruin, by suborning three infamous men to accuse him of high treason. These were Basilus, Optilio, and Gudentius, of whom the former had been, for his misdemeanour, dismissed the king's service, and the other two, for their crimes, condemned to banishment. They accused Boetius of attempting to raise the power of the senate above that of the king, and preventing an informer from bringing an impeachment of treason against the senators. Theodoric, though well acquainted with the infamous characters of the accusers, yet upon their deposition, which is very surprising, ordered, without further inquiry, the person, of whom he had hitherto entertained the highest opinion, to be put under arrest, and soon after confiscated his estate, and banished him to Pavia, where he wrote his wonderful book de consolatione. ^c Symmachus, father-in-law to Boetius, 'a man of extraordinary parts and learning, and who had, with an unblemished character, discharged the first employments, was likewise banished to Pavia, as privy to the supposed treason of Boetius. They had not been long there, when, to the great surprize of all, an order came from Ravenna for their execution, their enemies at court having persuaded the king, who was stricken in years, and grown jealous of his power, that he would never be safe so long as they were alive. They were accordingly both beheaded in Pavia; and of the head of Boetius no less wonderful things are related by Martianus, who wrote his life, than those which every one must have read or heard of the famous St. Dennis. The cruel and unjust sentence was scarce put in execution, when Theodoric, ^d returning, in a manner, to himself, and reflecting on his rash conduct in an affair, that required the utmost circumspection, was affected with such sorrow, that his grief may be said to have equalled, if not exceeded, the injustice of the sentence. Not long after, the head of a large fish being served up while he was one night at supper, the injustice of the sentence he had lately pronounced occurring to his mind, he fancied the head of the fish to be the head of Symmachus, threatening him in a ghastly manner. Hereupon, seized with horror and amazement, he was carried from the table to his bed-chamber, where, reflecting anew on his cruelty and injustice to two such eminent and deserving men, he died a few days after of grief, this being the first and last wrong any of his subjects had ever received at his hands^d. Thus Procopius, condemning ^e Theodoric for the injustice of the sentence pronounced against those two great men, and at the same time commending him for the equity by which he had been governed on every other occasion, during the whole course of his long reign. His putting them to death, without making the necessary inquiries in a matter, that required the greatest circumspection, favours, without doubt, both of rashness and cruelty; but his sincere sorrow, and unfeigned repentance; are undeniable testimonies of his mercy and good-nature. However that be, it is certain, that Italy never enjoyed more happy days than under his government, not even in the height of its greatness. He is perhaps the only prince, who, having obtained a kingdom by force and violence, preserved it with mildness and moderation; which two virtues eminently appeared ^f in all his actions and councils, and rendered him no less dear to his new subjects, than if he had been of their own race, and born among them. Tho' he was himself an Arian, and had the power in his hands, yet he was so far from persecuting the orthodox, that, on the contrary, he favoured them no less than those of his own persuasion, extending his protection to both parties, and allowing to all full liberty to profess which of the two religions they pleased. Those therefore are greatly mistaken, who imagine, that Boetius was put to death on account of the book he wrote on the Trinity, and inscribed to his father-in-law Symmachus. Jornandes takes

- a no notice of what we have related above of the head of the fish, upon the authority of Procopius; but supposes Theodoric, stricken in years, to have died quietly. His death ^{He dies.} happened on the second of September in the year 526. the thirty-fourth of his reign, ^{Year after} and seventy-second of his age. He had three daughters by Audefleda the sister of Clovis, viz. Ostrogotha, Theodogotba, and Amalasuntha. Ostrogotha was married to Sigismund king of the Burgundians, by whom she had Sigeric, who, after his mother's decease, was put to death by his father Sigismund in the year 522. as we have related in the history of the Burgundians. Theodogotba was married to Alaric II. king of the Visigoths, who in 507. was killed in the battle of Vouglé, as we have related elsewhere¹; but he left a son behind him by Theodogotba, viz. Amalaric, whose dominions Theodoric governed to the day of his death, as guardian to the young prince his grandson. Amalasuntha, the youngest of the three princesses, was married in 515. to *Eutbaric Cilleca*². Eutbaric was the son of Viteric, and grandson of Beremund, descended from the family of the Amali, who, leaving Scythia, as we read in Jornandes, came into Gaul; and, being honourably entertained by Vallia king of the Visigoths, he settled there. His grandson Eutbaric, from Gaul, removed into Spain, where he became well known to the officers of Theodoric, who governed that kingdom during the minority of Amalaric. Theodoric, hearing him much commended, expressed a great desire to see him; which satisfaction he no sooner had, than, being taken with his engaging behaviour, and extraordinary qualifications, he resolved to give him in marriage his daughter Amalasuntha, the more as he was of Theodoric's own family, viz. that of the Amali, and consequently by his birth not unworthy of such a match. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated with the utmost magnificence, and two years after he was raised to the consulship by his father-in-law; on which occasion the emperor Anastasius presented him with the tunica palmata, and adopted him for his son; an honour which the late emperors used to confer on persons of distinguished merit. Eutbaric went to Rome, to enter there upon his office, and was received by the senate and people with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, every rank and degree of people in that great metropolis striving to outdo each other in honouring one, whom they expected to see in a short time on the throne.
- c On the other hand, Eutbaric made it his chief study to oblige both the senate and people, discharging his office with great care, and diverting the city with most magnificent shows, having, for that effect, procured out of Africa such wild beasts, as had never before been seen at Rome. From Rome Eutbaric returned to his father-in-law at Ravenna, where, by his generosity, condescension, and obliging behaviour, he gained the affections both of the Romans and Goths. Every one expected to find in Eutbaric a second Theodoric; but, to the great grief of all, Eutbaric died before his father-in-law, leaving behind him a son, named Athalaric, ten years old; so that Theodoric had at his death two grandsons, the children of two of his daughters, viz. Amalaric king of the Visigoths, and Athalaric the son of Amalasuntha. To the former Theodoric, at his death, delivered up all the countries in Gaul and Spain belonging to the Visigoths, which he had governed, with a no less absolute sway than his own; ever since the death of Alaric II. The latter, though the son of the younger daughter, he appointed to succeed him in the kingdom of Italy, and in all his other dominions. Theodoric, says Jornandes, being stricken in years, and near his end, assembled the chief men among the Goths, and, in their presence, declared Athalaric, the son of Eutbaric by his daughter Amalasuntha, his successor, charging them to obey him as such, to respect the senate and people of Rome, and, above all, to cultivate the friendship of the emperor of the east. Theodoric died soon after; but as Athalaric was then only eight years old, as we read in *Procopius*³, or ten, as Jornandes will have it⁴, his mother Amalasuntha took upon her the administration, a prince's highly commended by all the writers of those times, for her piety, religion, wisdom, and learning. Theodotus, who succeeded Athalaric, and by whom she was afterwards put to death, in a letter which he wrote in her behalf to the Roman state, styles her the glory of princes, the flower and ornament of his family, the Solomon of women, a princess endued with every good quality becoming her sex, well versed in the Latin, in the Greek, and in many other languages, and thoroughly acquainted with every branch of learning⁵. Theodoric was no sooner dead, than Amalasuntha, mindful of his last advice, wrote in the young prince's name, both to Justin then emperor, and to the Roman senate, acquainting them with his accession to the throne. In the letter to the emperor, the young prince, after telling him, that his grandfather had, before his death, appointed him his heir and successor, goes on thus: "You formerly honoured in your august city my grandfather with the dignity of consul; you sent into Italy to my father the tunica palmata, and, to attach him the more to you, you adopted him for your son, tho' he was almost of the same age with yourself. The name of son will suit me better than it did him. I shall acknowledge so great a favour, by causing your name to be no less respected, and your authority to be no less obeyed, in my dominions, than they are in your own. With this view I have dispatched ambassadors to you, hoping you will honour me with your friendship, upon the same conditions upon which your glorious ancestors granted theirs to my grandfather." From this letter it is manifest, that the kings of the Ostrogoths acknowledged in the emperors of the east a superiority of rank, but not of jurisdiction; and consequently that Zeno, when he sent Theodoric to drive Odoacer out of Italy, renounced in his behalf whatever claim the empire of the east had to that country. At the same time Amalasuntha dispatched ambassadors to Rome with letters from the young prince, both to the senate and people, acquainting them, that his grandfather was dead; that, on his death-bed, he had declared him his heir and successor, and that, as such, he had been acknowledged both by the Goths and Romans, that is, the Italians, who had sworn obedience to him. He desires them to follow the example of his other subjects, telling them, that he had sent count Sigismer, and others, to receive their oath of allegiance, and at the same time to bind himself by the like tie to maintain sacred and inviolable all the rights, privileges and immunities, which had been granted them by his grandfather. He closes his letter to the senate, by encouraging them to ask boldly whatever they thought might any-ways contribute to the safety and splendour of their illustrious and venerable body. In his letter to the people, he promises to cherish the Goths and Romans alike, and to maintain them equally in the possession of their rights and privileges, making no other distinction, than that the Goths should undergo the toils and dangers of war, while the Romans enjoyed a profound peace within the walls of their own city. In the end of his letter he tells them, that, by the mutual oaths of the prince and people, the memory of Trajan's excellent government was renewed, who, at his entering upon the consulship, swore himself, and received the oaths of the senate and people ^P. He wrote two other letters, the one to Tiberius præfetus prætorio of Gaul, wherein he exhorts him, and his other subjects in that country, to pay the same respect and obedience to him, which they had paid to Theodoric, promising on his side, upon oath, to protect them in the full enjoyment of all their ancient rights and privileges (N). The other letter he wrote to Victorinus their bishop, intreating him to maintain, with his example and precepts, peace and tranquillity among those, whom Providence had committed to his care. He ends the letter with begging his prayers, that the Heavenly King would be pleased to con-

(N) The provinces in Gaul, belonging to the Gothic nation, were thus divided by Theodoric between Athalaric and Amalaric: the former had that part, which lay beyond the Rhône next to Italy; and the latter the countries lying on the opposite side of that river, and extending to the confines of the Franks, which we have described in the history of that people. Athalaric kept the city of Arles, which had belonged to the kingdom of Alaric II. and consequently ought to have been yielded to Amalaric. The other places, which he retained, had been taken by his grandfather Theodoric, at different times, from the Burgundians. Whether he gave the Visigoths an equivalent for that important place, formerly the seat of the præfetus prætorio of Gaul, we are not told. The Rhône being fixed as the boundary between the two nations, it was agreed, that such of the Ostrogoths as had settled in the countries that were to be held by the Visigoths, and such of the Visigoths as had settled in the provinces that were to be kept by the Ostrogoths, should have full liberty, either to continue where they were, or to retire into the countries subject to their respective princes (1). Hence it appears, that the Visigoths and Ostrogoths, who were originally but two tribes of one and the same nation, were not yet blended together, though they had, for the space of twenty years and upwards, promiscuously inhabited the same country. It was in virtue of a particular convention, that they were to be deemed citizens of the tribe to which they did not originally belong, though they dwelt with their wives and families in the same country.

- a firm to him his earthly kingdoms, to humble his enemies, to forgive his sins, and to preserve and maintain what he had so bountifully and liberally bestowed upon his ancestors⁹. Such was the beginning of the reign of Athalaric, or rather of Amalasuntha. She retained the same form of government, the same laws, the same magistrates, and the same disposition of provinces, not suffering the least alteration to be made during the minority of her son, and governing with such prudence, that Theodoric was scarce missed, either by the Goths or Romans. Her chief care was to bring up her son after the Roman manner, and to have him, from his tender years, instructed by the ablest men of those times in religion, virtue, and learning. She was herself, as we have hinted above, well versed in all the branches of literature, and consequently a great encourager of learned men; as appears from the letters she wrote to the senate in the king's name, expostulating with them for neglecting to pay the public professors their salaries in due time, and commanding them to be paid punctually for the future. Arts, says she in her letter, are nourished and maintained by rewards, and it is a heinous crime to defraud the teachers of youth of any thing due to them, who ought rather to be further encouraged by an augmentation of their stipend. She orders them to be paid every half year, adding, that men of learning must not depend upon the humours of others; that they must not be diverted from their studies by solicitous thought; and that it is a shame, that players, whose business is only to please and amuse, should be so amply rewarded, and those neglected, who form the manners of youth, instruct them in the liberal sciences, and render them capable of serving their country¹. Amalasuntha was so far from invading the rights and properties of her subjects, that, on the contrary, she restored to the children of Boetius and Symmachus the estates, which had been confiscated in the preceding reign. She took great care to secure the Romans against the avarice and rapaciousness of the great men among the Goths, who, looking upon Italy as a conquered country, were for enriching themselves at the expence of the natives. To her nephew Amalaric she gave up that part of Gaul, which, with respect to Italy, lay beyond the Rhône; but retained what lay on the other side of that river. To the Visigoths she remitted the impositions, which had been laid on them by Theodoric, and restored the treasure of the kings of the Visigoths, which, by her father's order, had been conveyed from Carcassone to *Ravenna*². In the mean time Justin having taken his nephew Justinian for his partner in the empire, Amalasuntha no sooner heard of his promotion, than she dispatched ambassadors to the new emperor, congratulating him upon his accession to the imperial dignity, and begging a continuance of that friendship and alliance, which had long subsisted between the two nations³. What she desired was readily granted, as is manifest from the good understanding that passed between the two princes so long as Athalaric lived, and from the coins stamped at this time by the king of the Ostrogoths, on one side of which is to be seen the image of Justinian, and on the other the name of *Athalaric*⁴.
- c WHILE Amalasuntha was thus governing with the greatest justice, equity, and prudence, and taking all the necessary precautions for the safety of her son, and the welfare of his dominions, the great men among the Goths, not able to bear, that their young prince should be brought up after the Roman manner, began to exclaim against learning, as an enemy to valour; only fit for soft and effeminate princes, and no-ways becoming the king and leader of such an active and warlike nation as theirs. The princess took no notice of these groundless complaints; but having one day chastised her son, and he happening to go, with the tears yet in his eyes, into a room, where some Gothic lords were assembled, they took from thence occasion to complain more loudly of the queen, (so she is called by most writers) as if she designed to remove her son, and reign in her own right; they exclaimed, with more boldness than ever, against the learned education of the young prince; alleged the example of his grandfather, who, tho' utterly ignorant of letters (O), was a warlike and victorious prince; and

and concluded, that his grandson must be brought up in the same manner, if he ^a would be attended with the same fortune. They therefore desired Amalasuntha to dismiss the pedants her son had about him, and give him such companions of his own age, as might, by their conversation, make the customs of his nation familiar to him, and incline him to govern according to their own laws. This they demanded with so much warmth and importunity, that, apprehending greater evils, she thought it advisable to comply with their request. And now the youth, free from all restraint, and seduced by wicked companions, abandoned himself to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, adding to his other vices that of undutifulness to the best of mothers, and unnaturally abandoning her in a faction, which had the arrogance to command her to retire from court; but the queen, exerting her authority, picked out three of ^b the ringleaders of the party, and confined them to the most remote parts of Italy. These, maintaining a private correspondence with their friends and relations, never ceased, by their means, to stir up the people against her; insomuch that Amalasuntha, apprehending the faction might in the end prevail, wrote to the emperor Justinian, begging leave to take refuge in his dominions. The emperor readily complied with her request, offering her a noble palace at Epidamnus, now Durazzo, for her habitation; but the princess having in the mean time caused the three ringleaders of the faction, whom she had banished, to be put to death, and no new disturbances arising thereupon, she did not accept of the emperor's offer, but remained at Ravenna, governing the dominions of her son with her usual prudence and equity. ^c

She causes some of them to be put to death.

In the mean time Atalaric having, by his debaucheries and riotous life, contracted a lingering distemper, Amalasuntha, apprehending that, upon his death, she would be in great danger, most of the chief men among the Goths being highly incensed against her, resolved to save herself, by delivering Italy into the hands of the emperor; and accordingly began to treat with his ambassadors about the manner of putting her design in execution. But her measures were all defeated by the untimely death of her son, which happened in the eighth year of his reign, and threw her into new difficulties. Her design for delivering up Italy to Justinian was not yet ripe for execution; on the other hand, she was well apprised, that the Goths would not suffer her to reign after the death of her son, but would chuse a new king in his room. ^d Having therefore long deliberated with herself how she should act at so critical a conjuncture, she resolved in the end to raise one to the throne herself, hoping that the person, so advanced by her favour, would be contented with the title, and, out of gratitude, suffer her to enjoy the supreme power without controul. With this view, she cast her eyes on Theodatus her cousin, the son of Amalafrida, sister to king Theodoric, and consequently descended from the illustrious family of the Amali. He was a man of great learning, as appears from the letter, which Amalasuntha wrote to the senate, acquainting them with his accession to the throne, well skilled in the doctrine of Plato, thoroughly versed in ecclesiastic learning, and a perfect master of the Latin tongue ^e; but utterly unacquainted both with civil and military matters, timorous, indolent, covetous to the greatest degree, destitute of all honour and probity, and capable of committing the vilest actions, when pushed on by his own passions, or by those of others. He had lived hitherto in Tuscany, where he had large possessions; but, not satisfied with them, he had not only encroached upon his neighbours, but seized on some lands belonging to the crown. These Amalasuntha had obliged him to restore, and likewise restrained him, by her authority, from injuring his neighbours, which had rendered him her implacable enemy; insomuch that he privately agreed with the ambassadors, who had been sent from Constantinople to the bishop of Rome, to betray Tuscany to the emperor, upon his paying him a cer-his name (2). But this is no-ways consistent with what we read in Ennodius, viz. that Theodoric was brought up, not among the barbarians, but in the heart of Greece, which, in return for the pains she had taken to instruct him, promised herself his protection; that she was overjoyed to see the progress he made when yet a child; that his predecessors had preferred ignorance to learning; but that he, agreeable to his polite education, had shewed himself the patron and encourager of letters; that, under him, ingenuity flourished in all its branches; and that he not only admired and rewarded it in others, but thought it an ornament worthy of himself. Thus Ennodius, in the panegyric he pronounced before Theodoric (3), which would have been deemed a satire, rather than a panegyric, had Theodoric been that illiterate prince he is described in the abstracts of Valesius.

a tain sum, and raising him to the dignity of a senator. However, Amalasuntha, imagining that so signal a favour, as her advancing him to the throne, would reconcile him to her, offered to take him for her colleague, on condition he suffered her to enjoy and exercise her former power. This Theodatus promised upon oath to do, and was thereupon declared by the queen her colleague^a. The letters, that were written on this occasion to the Roman senate by the queen, in commendation of Theodatus, and by Theodatus, in commendation of the queen, are still to be seen in Cassiodore^b. He acknowledges himself intirely indebted to her for his new dignity, and, extolling her kindness to him, adds, that he is at a loss how to make a suitable return for such a high and undeserved favour. But the unhappy princess b was soon sensible of her mistake in assuming for her colleague a person, who had been formerly her declared enemy, and was destitute, as she must have known, of all honour and probity. For he had scarce mounted the throne, when, unmindful of the honours she had done him, and the promises he had made, and solemnly confirmed with an oath, he suffered himself to be wholly governed by the friends and relations of those, who, by the princess, had been put to death for their crimes; and, because she took the liberty to remind him of what he had promised, he caused her to be conveyed from Ravenna into Tuscany, and there confined her to an island in the middle of the lake of Bolsena. As he had reason to believe, that the emperor, who had a great value and regard for Amalasuntha, would resent this treatment, he
c obliged her to write to him, that no injury or injustice had been done her. This letter he sent to Constantinople, with one which he wrote himself, filled with heavy complaints against Amalasuntha. The emperor was so far from giving credit to what Theodatus urged against her, that he openly espoused her cause, and wrote a most affectionate letter to her, comforting her in her distress, and assuring her of his protection. But, before the letter reached her, the unhappy princess was, with the consent, if not by the order of Theodatus, barbarously strangled in the bath by the friends of those, whom, in the reign of her son, she had deservedly put to death for raising disturbances in the state. Some writers tell us, that the unhappy queen was dispatched by Theodatus at the instigation of the empress Theodora, who, jealous of d the love the emperor shewed her, began to apprehend he might one day forsake her for the queen of the Goths^c. Be that as it will, Justinian, highly provoked against Theodatus for the murder of a person for whom he had the greatest esteem and veneration, and being at the same time desirous of reuniting Italy to the empire, resolved to make war upon the Goths, his troops being just then returned from Africa, which they had reduced by driving from thence the Vandals.

Justinian, to facilitate the enterprize, used his utmost endeavours to induce the Franks to join him, acquainting them with the motives that had prompted him to undertake that war. The Goths, says he in the letter which he wrote to their princes, have not only seized on Italy, which belongs to us, but, without the least provocation, offered us such insults as we cannot in honour dissemble. This is what induces us to take arms against them; and it is but just, that you should lend us what assistance you can against a nation that bears as great enmity to you as to us, the more as we are both of the same persuasion, and equally abhor the doctrine of Arius, which they profess^a. To the letter the emperor added, says Procopius, a large sum, promising to the princes of the Franks, especially to Theodebert, a considerable subsidy, to be paid them as soon as they should begin hostilities^b. The Franks received the money, and, entering into an alliance with the emperor, promised to assist him to the utmost of their power; but, instead of performing their promise, while Justinian's arms were employed against the Goths, Theodebert, who was deemed the head of the royal e family of the Franks, being the son of Theodoric, or, as they call him, Tbierri, the eldest son of Clovis, seized on several cities in Liguria, on the Alpes Cottiae, and great part of the province of Venice, for himself. Of this treachery Justinian afterwards complained by his ambassador Leontius to Theodebald, the son and successor of Theodebert^c (P). But to leave that treacherous nation, and return to Justinian: Having resolved resolved to make war upon the Goths, and drive them, if possible, out of Italy, he named Mundus and Belisarius for his generals. Mundus, then commander of the troops in Illyricum, was ordered to march into Dalmatia, which was subject to the Goths, and attempt the reduction of Salona, the better to open a passage into Italy. Belisarius was to make a descent upon Sicily; for which purpose a fleet was equipped, on board of which were four thousand legionaries, three thousand Isaurians, three hundred Mauritanians, and two hundred Hunns. Belisarius was vested with the supreme command, and an absolute authority. His instructions were to pretend a voyage to Carthage, but to make an attempt upon Sicily, and, if he thought he could succeed in the attempt, to land there, otherwise to sail directly for Africa, without discovering his intentions. Mundus, without much ado, made himself master of Salona; and Belisarius, landing without opposition in Sicily, reduced that island with more expedition than he himself expected. Palermo held out for some time, the Goths, who depended upon the strength of the place, which was deemed impregnable by land, defending it with great resolution; but Belisarius attacking it by sea, the garrison was forced to surrender upon articles; so that Belisarius entered the city on the last of December of the present year 535. Belisarius, now master of Sicily, from Messina, without loss of time, passed over to Reggio, which opened its gates to him. From Reggio he pursued his march to Rome, the provinces of Abrutum, Lucania, Puglia, Calabria, and Samnium, readily submitting to him. The city of Naples endured a siege; but Belisarius's men having entered it through an aqueduct, it was in the end taken and plundered ^a (Q).

deceased king, to persuade him to join the Romans against the Ostrogoths, and to evacuate the places in Italy, which the Franks had taken, and still held, in defiance of the treaty concluded between them and the emperor. Leontius, in the audience he had of that prince, addressed him thus: There is no prince, to whom unforeseen misfortunes have not happened, and disappointments, which he did not expect; but the conduct of the Franks towards the Romans is perhaps surprising beyond any thing that ever happened before. It is well known, that the emperor no sooner resolved to make war on the Goths, than he imparted his resolution to your nation. He did not take the field till he had entered into an alliance with your predecessor, and engaged him by a large sum, which was paid before-hand, to act, in concert with him, against the Goths, as a common enemy. But he, instead of fulfilling his engagements, acted, to the great surprize of the emperor, more like an enemy than an ally, seizing on several countries belonging to the empire, to which he had not the least claim. I do not mention this, added the ambassador, to reproach your nation with what is past, but to the end that, by a quite contrary conduct, you may, for the future, deserve to be ranked amongst our true friends and allies (1). Justinian had but too much reason to complain of the Franks, but perhaps not more than other princes, who, since his time, have relied on their friendship.

(Q.) The city of Naples held out, as we read in Procopius, twenty days. The castle in the suburbs submitted upon terms, as soon as Belisarius appeared with his army before it. But Theodatus having taken care to put a strong garrison into the city, and they appearing resolved to defend it to the utmost, Belisarius, apprehending the difficulty of the enterprize, attempted first to gain them by the offer of most advantageous and honourable terms. They sent out one Stephanus to treat with the Roman general, who, returning into the city, acquainted the citizens with the conditions offered them by Belisarius, and, with many arguments, endeavoured to persuade them not to reject such offers. But Passtor and Aclepiodotus, two orators greatly attached to, and perhaps well paid by, the Goths, in order to cross and defeat the treaty, advised the inhabitants to demand such terms, as they imagined Belisarius would never grant. But the general, contrary to their expectation, complying with their request, and the citizens being thereupon ready to open their gates to the Romans, the two orators, with their deluding eloquence, persuaded them to change their resolution, since it was uncertain, said they, which side might in the end prevail; and Belisarius could not blame them for their fidelity, but, on the contrary, if they thus tamely submitted, would despise them as traitors and cowards, for abandoning and betraying their old friends. Belisarius, finding he could by no offers prevail upon them to submit, began to batter the city, and made several assaults; but was constantly repulsed with great loss. In order to oblige them by other means to surrender, he cut the great aqueduct, which supplied the city with water; but this inconvenience was easily remedied by the wells within, which sufficiently furnished them with water. Hereupon Belisarius, finding the siege would continue longer than he expected, and oblige him to attack Rome in the winter, resolved to abandon the enterprize, and had already ordered his army to begin their march; when an Isaurian, curiously viewing the structure of the aqueduct, observed, that if a passage, which was cut through a rock, were but a little enlarged, some soldiers might easily get through it, and surprise the city. He acquainted the general with his observation, who, being highly pleased with it, ordered some Isaurians to widen the passage, which they did by firing the rock, to avoid by that means all noise. When every thing was ready, Belisarius sent for Stephanus, whom we have mentioned above, told him, that he was sure he should, in a very short time, be master of the city, and therefore advised him to persuade his fellow-citizens to prevent, by a timely submission, the impending evils. But the inhabitants giving no ear to what Stephanus said, and desiring the Romans from the walls, Belisarius ordered Magnum, general of the horse, and Ennes, commander of the Isaurians, to enter the aqueduct in the dead of the night with about six hundred men, some lights, and two trumpets, to strike terror into the city, and give the

- a Theodatus, who was an utter stranger to military affairs, and had a great aversion to war, alarmed at the unexpected success of the emperor's arms, began under-hand to treat of a peace with an ambassador sent by the emperor for that purpose. In a private conference with him, the king agreed to renounce all pretensions to the island of Sicily, to send the emperor yearly a crown of gold weighing three hundred pounds, to supply him with three thousand men when required, to put no senator or ecclesiastic to death, or confiscate their estates, without the emperor's consent, nor to advance any to the dignity of senator or patrician, but to petition him to confer such honours on those who deserved them. In all acclamations, Justinian's name was to be first mentioned. Whenever a statue was erected to Theodatus, a statue was to be likewise erected to the emperor, and placed on the right-hand. No coin was to be stamped with the image of Theodatus alone, but that also of Justinian, which was always to hold the most honourable place. These proposals, which plainly betrayed the meanness of his spirit, were sent by Theodatus to Constantinople. But apprehending the emperor, not satisfied with them, might pursue the war, he dispatched an express to the ambassador, now as far on his journey as Albania, recalling him for farther orders and instructions. These were to resign the kingdom to Justinian, and content himself with a pension suitable to his quality; but he obliged both the emperor's ambassador, and Agapetus bishop of Rome, whom he sent on his own behalf, to bind themselves by a solemn oath not to mention this proposal, till they found the emperor would not accept of the former. The emperor rejected, as was expected, the first proposals with scorn; whereupon the ambassadors shewed him the second signed by the king, who, in his letter to the emperor, told him, among other things, that, being unacquainted with war, and addicted to the study of philosophy, he preferred his quiet to a kingdom. Justinian, transported with joy, and imagining the war already ended, answered the king in a most obliging manner, extolling his wisdom, and adding to what he demanded the greatest honours of the empire. The agreement being confirmed by mutual oaths, lands were assigned to Theodatus out of the emperor's domain, and orders dispatched to Belisarius to take possession of Italy in his name. In the mean time a body of Goths entering Dalmatia, with a design to recover Salonæ, Mundus sent out his son, with a small party, to observe their motions; but the youth, unadvisedly engaging a detachment from their army far superior in number to his own, was slain, and most of his men cut in pieces. To revenge the death of his son, Mundus marched against the enemy with all the forces under his command, engaged them, and put them to flight; but his men falling into confusion in the pursuit, the Goths, facing unexpectedly about, renewed the fight, killed Mundus himself, and in their turn put the Romans to flight, disheartened with the death of their leader. Upon this defeat, the Romans, abandoning Salonæ, and all Dalmatia, returned home; which Theodatus no sooner understood, than, elated with so small an advantage, he refused with great haughtiness to comply with the articles of the treaty, which he had lately signed; nay, because the emperor's ambassador, by name Peter, a man of great address and experience, expostulated with him for his breach of faith, he told him, that it was not an unusual thing to put even ambassadors to death, when they did not shew that respect, which is due to crowned heads. The ambassador answered, That it was his duty to execute his master's orders, and that he would utter what he had been enjoined to say, whether pleasing or displeasing. Hereupon Theodatus put a strict guard upon the ambassador; at which Justinian being

but Belisarius, riding about, restrained their rage, giving them leave to seize on the effects, but commanding them to spare the lives, of the inhabitants. He caused all those, who had been taken prisoners, to be set at liberty; and taking the Gothic garrison, consisting of eight hundred men, into the emperor's pay, he incorporated them among his own troops (1). Belisarius is highly commended by Procopius for his clemency towards the citizens, though others, but writers of no great authority, tell us, that he put most of the citizens to the sword; that he neither spared churches, priests, nor holy virgins; and that he was severely reprimanded for his cruelty by Sylvester bishop of Rome (3).

highly provoked, he dispatched Constantianus, an officer of great valour and experience, into Illyricum, with orders to raise forces there, and enter Dalmatia. At the same time he wrote to Belisarius, commanding him to pursue the war with the utmost vigour. Constantianus, having, pursuant to his orders, raised an army with great expedition in Illyricum, entered Dalmatia, made himself master of Salona, and obliged the Goths, with their general, by name Grypus, to abandon that province. As for Belisarius, he now drew near to Rome, having reduced all the provinces that compose the present kingdom of Naples. Hereupon the chief men among the Goths, finding their king took no one step to avert the impending ruin of their nation, assembled without his consent; and, not despairing of being able to conclude a peace with Belisarius, they dispatched ambassadors to him, representing the injustice of the war, the just claim they had to Italy, and the moderation and equity with which they had hitherto governed that country. As the ambassadors laid great stress on Theodoric's taking Italy, not from the Romans, but from the barbarians, to whom it was become a prey, and on their king's being prompted and encouraged to that enterprize by the emperor himself, Belisarius, disliking the conditions they offered, answered surlily, That Theodoric had been sent indeed by Zeno to rescue Italy out of the hands of the barbarians, but not to keep it for himself, since it was the same thing to the emperor, so long as it was not restored to the empire, whether it was held by the Goths or the Heruli: that whoever detains the goods, that are not his own, against the will of the owner, is no less guilty, than he who takes them by force. He concluded, that he would hearken to no terms, nor sheath his sword, till Italy was reunited to the empire, to which it belonged.

THE Goths, finding Belisarius unalterably bent upon driving them out of Italy, and, on the other hand, amazed at the cowardice and stupidity of their prince, who made no warlike preparations, as if he either intended to betray Italy to the emperor, or, despairing of success, had laid aside all thoughts of defending it, assembled at Regeta, a place about thirty-five miles from Rome, and having there, with one consent, deposed Theodatus, chose and proclaimed Vitiges king in his room. Vitiges was not descended from an illustrious family among the Goths; but had distinguished himself by his valour in several wars, especially in that, which Theodoric had waged with the Gepidæ. Jornandes writes, that he had been formerly armour-bearer to Theodoric. Upon his accession to the throne, he married Matefuenta, the daughter of Amalasuntha, and grand-daughter of Theodoric, who, despising him on account of his birth, though in every other respect worthy of the crown, is said to have maintained a private correspondence with the Romans, and was even suspected of attempting to betray him into their hands; for she had been averse to the match from the very beginning, and was, in a manner, forced by the king to give her consent. Theodatus, who was then at Rome, hearing the Goths had chosen a new king, fled from thence towards Ravenna. But Vitiges dispatched one Optaris after him, with orders to bring him back dead or alive. Optaris had been highly disoblinded by him, and therefore, pursuing him with great expedition, he soon overtook him, and, putting him to death, brought back his head to the new king. Such was the end of this cowardly, ungrateful, and covetous prince, after he had reigned about three years. Several of his coins have reached our times, on which he is called Theodatus, Theodatus, and Theodabathus. He left a son, by name Theudegiclus, whom Vitiges caused to be first imprisoned, and afterwards to be put to death. And now the new king, having no competitor, applied himself wholly to the re-establishing of the affairs of the Goths. He began with writing a circular letter, wherein he exhorted his countrymen to exert their antient courage, and defend with their usual bravery, against all unjust invaders, the countries which belonged to them by right of conquest. From the place where he was chosen, he marched to Rome; but not thinking himself strong enough to defend that city against Belisarius, who was marching towards it, he resolved to remove to Ravenna, where he might, with more ease, reinforce his army, and make the necessary preparations for taking the field. Upon his departure, he obliged the pope, the senate, and the people, to take an oath of fidelity; and then, leaving four thousand Goths for the defence of the city, he set out for Ravenna with several senators, whom he took with him as hostages for the rest. Being arrived at Ravenna, he assembled the Goths from all parts, and, having raised a considerable army, he a encamped under the walls of that city. In the mean time Belisarius, having garrisoned Naples, Cumæ, and the other strong places in Campania, approached Rome. As he drew near, the inhabitants, dreading the treatment which the Neapolitans were said to have met with, and awed by the reputation of so renowned a general, resolved, notwithstanding the oath they had so lately taken, to open their gates to the emperor's army. Accordingly, they dispatched one Fidelius to invite Belisarius to come and take possession of their city, assuring him, that he should meet with no opposition. Belisarius no sooner received this invitation, than he advanced to the gates of the city; which being opened to him, he entered Rome on the ninth or tenth of December of the year 537. and taking possession of it in the emperor's name, reunited

b it to the empire, sixty years after it had been taken by Odoacer, and thirty-four after it had submitted to Theodoric. The Gothic garrison, finding they could not make head at the same time against the emperor's army and the citizens, retired by the Porta Flaminia, while Belisarius entered by the Porta Asinaria. Leudaris, governor of the city, who staid behind, was sent, together with the keys, to the emperor. Belisarius, now master of the city, applied himself to the repairing of the walls and other fortifications, filled the granaries with corn, which he caused to be brought from Sicily, and stored the place with all manner of provisions, as if he were preparing against a siege; which gave no small uneasiness to the inhabitants, who chose rather, that their city should lie open to every invader, than be liable to the many

c miseries and calamities attending a siege. While Belisarius was thus employed at Rome, Pitzas, governor of Samnium, submitting to him, delivered up great part of that country, with the city of Benevento. In the mean time Vitiges lay not idle at Ravenna, but, having raised an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, resolved to march directly to Rome, and engage Belisarius, or, if he declined engaging, to lay siege to the city. But apprehending that the Franks, who were in confederacy with the emperor, might fall upon him at the same time, with the consent and approbation of the great men among the Goths, d he dispatched ambassadors to their three kings, Theodebert, Childebert, and Clotarius, offering to yield to them whatever the Ostrogoths held in Gaul, and besides to pay them a considerable sum, provided they joined him against the emperor. The Franks, notwithstanding their alliance with Justinian, hearkened with their usual treachery to the proposal, and signed the treaty, the articles whereof were immediately executed by Vitiges, who paid them the sum agreed on, and ordered Martias, who commanded a chosen body of Ostrogoths in Gaul, to deliver up to the Franks the cities he held there, and return with the forces under his command into Italy. The three princes divided equally among them both the money and the cities yielded to them by the Ostrogoths. But when they were to execute on their side the articles of the e agreement, they declared, that the engagements they had lately entered into with Justinian not allowing them to make open war upon the Romans, they could not, by any means, send an army of Franks to the assistance of the Ostrogoths; but they would cause a body of troops, raised in the countries which they had subdued, to join them. Accordingly they sent, not immediately, but the following year, ten thousand Burgundians, subdued by them a few years before, who, upon their entering Italy, declared, pursuant to their private instructions, that they came of their own accord, without so much as asking leave of the kings of the Franks, to whom they paid no regard ¹. Thus early the Franks began to sport with the most solemn treaties, and elude them with quibbles and equivocations, as their descendants are

f well known to do to this day. Vitiges was no sooner joined by Martias, and the troops returned from Gaul, than he began his march to Rome, and pursued it with great expedition, not attempting to reduce any of the towns on the road, which, he knew, were well provided and fortified. Belisarius, being informed of his march, dispatched messengers to Constantianus in Tuscany, and to Bessas, by nation a Goth, but of the emperor's party, in Umbria, ordering them to join him with all possible expedition, with the troops under their command; for his army consisted only of five thousand men, the rest being employed in garrisoning the many towns that had submitted. At the same time he wrote to the emperor, acquainting him with the danger he was in, and pressing him to send into Italy, without loss of time, the necessary supplies (R). Constantianus joined him, pursuant to his orders, and soon after Belisarius, who, falling in with part of the enemy's vanguard, killed a considerable number of them, and put the rest to flight. Belisarius had built a fort upon a bridge about a mile from Rome, and placed a strong garrison in it, to dispute the passage with the enemy; but the garrison, seized with a panic at the approach of so numerous an army, abandoned their post in the night, and fled into Campania; so that Vitiges early next morning passed over great part of his army, and marched on, without opposition, till he was met by Belisarius, who, knowing nothing of what had happened, came very early, attended by a thousand horse, to view the ground near the bridge. He was greatly surprised, when he beheld the enemy marching up against him. However, lest he should heighten their courage by his flight or retreat, he stood his ground, and received the enemy at the head of his small body, exposing himself, without his usual prudence and discretion, to the greatest dangers. Had he been killed, Rome must have fallen; and therefore he is deservedly blamed for thus exposing his own person, since on him the safety of all depended; but this perhaps is the only occasion, on which his conduct favoured of rashness and temerity. Being known by some fugitives, and discovered to the enemy, they all aimed at him alone, and directed their whole force against him; which made his own men the more solicitous to defend him; so that the whole contest was, for some time, about his person. In the end the Goths were driven back to their camp, which the Romans attempted to force; but they met there with such a vigorous resistance, that they soon abandoned the enterprise, and retired with precipitation to a neighbouring eminence, whence they were forced down by the enemy, put to flight, and pursued to the very gates of the city. Here they were in greater danger than ever; for those within, fearing the enemy should, in that confusion, enter with them, refused to admit them. The general himself cried out earnestly to them, telling them who he was, and commanding them to open the gates; but as they had been informed by those who first fled, that he was slain, and they could not distinguish him, his face being covered with blood and dust, they gave no ear to what he said. In this extremity, having encouraged his men, who were now driven into a narrow compass, to make a last effort, he put himself at their head, and attacked the enemy with such fury, that the Goths, imagining fresh troops were sallying out upon them, began to give ground, and, being vigorously pushed by Belisarius, retired in the end to their camp. Upon their retreat, Belisarius, not thinking it adviseable to pursue them, entered the city, where he was received with loud acclamations of joy. A few days after, Vitiges, approaching the city, invested it on all sides, and, in order to distress the garrison and inhabitants for want of water, ordered the aqueducts, which had been built by the Roman emperors at an immense charge, to be broken down. On the other hand, Belisarius omitted nothing for the defence of the city: the useless multitude he sent out; took care to have those, who remained, supplied with all necessaries; to prevent tumults, listed a great number of artificers, who, together with his soldiers, were to watch night and day on the ramparts; placed Moors in the night, with dogs, round the ditch, to give the alarm when the enemy approached; fortified the aqueducts where they opened into the city, &c. The citizens of Rome, concluding from thence, that Belisarius

(R) His letter to the emperor was couched in the following terms: "I have left Sicily, and, landing in Italy, pursuant to your orders, with the army under my command, have reduced great part of that country, and reunited Rome itself to your empire. But as I have been obliged to leave numerous garrisons in the many strong places that have submitted to your arms, the army is reduced to five thousand; whereas the enemy is advancing full march against us with an army an hundred and fifty thousand strong. I therefore earnestly intreat you to cause, with all convenient speed, such supplies of men and arms to be sent to us, as may enable us to face so powerful an enemy. If they prevail, we must abandon Italy to them, and the city of Rome, which, above all others, has exerted its zeal for your majesty's service. At the approach of your army, the citizens, with great joy, returned to their duty, at the risk of their lives and fortunes. To abandon them therefore to the mercy of a provoked enemy, would be highly ungrateful; and, on the other hand, it is a difficult task, if not altogether impossible, to defend so large a city against such a powerful army without a numerous garrison. As for myself, I am indebted to your majesty for my life, and therefore shall not suffer myself to be driven from hence while alive; but the death of Belisarius will no ways redound to your glory." Upon the receipt of this letter, the emperor ordered Valerianus and Martinus to assemble, with all possible expedition, a body of troops to be transported into Italy; and, in his answer to Belisarius, assured him, that he should, in a short time, receive the necessary supplies (4).

- a farius was resolved to hold out to the last extremity, began to assemble in a tumultuous manner, and rail at the general as one, who, without the least regard to the public calamities, was obstinately bent upon defending a place no-ways tenable. Vitiges, being acquainted with the discontent and complaints of the citizens, to heighten them, and drive the inhabitants, if possible, to an open rebellion, dispatched ambassadors to the senate, assuring them of his favour and protection, and at the same time offering a safe retreat to Belisarius, whom the ambassadors, in the presence of the senate, upbraided with temerity and presumption. The senate and people would have willingly hearkened to the king's proposals; but, being awed by the presence of Belisarius, they dared not express their real sentiments; so that the ambassadors
- b were dismissed without an answer. Hereupon Vitiges resolved to pursue the siege with the utmost vigour; which he did accordingly, shewing himself an able commander, both in the contriving of his military engines, and his disposing the attacks. Belisarius made a no less vigorous defence, repulsing the enemy in their repeated attacks, and sallying frequently out upon them with such success, that, in seven months time, Vitiges is said to have lost above forty thousand men; which provoked and incensed him to such a degree, that he caused the Roman senators to be put to death, whom, in the beginning of the war, he had carried with him to Ravenna. In the mean time a small, but seasonable supply of sixteen hundred horse arrived from the emperor, consisting of Hunns, Slavonians, and Antæ dwelling beyond the Danube.
- c As these were all archers on horseback, they did great execution; for we are told, that, in three sallies, under the conduct of Belisarius and their two leaders Martinus and Valerianus, they killed about four thousand Goths. The Romans, elated with this success, were for putting the whole to the issue of a general engagement. This Belisarius opposed with all the arguments his reason and long experience could suggest; but he was in the end obliged, by the importunities both of the soldiers and citizens, to gratify them, and venture a battle. Having therefore exhorted them to render successful, by their valour, that scheme, which he had been put upon by their forwardness, he marched out with his small army, and fell upon the Goths with such resolution, that the Romans at first promised themselves certain victory; but being
- d in the end overpowered with numbers, they were obliged to betake themselves to a precipitous flight. The Romans lost on this occasion several brave officers, and among the rest Principius and Tarmutus, of whom the former was killed in the field of battle; and the latter, being rescued out of the enemy's hands by his brother Ennes, and carried by his men into the city on a target, died two days after of his wounds. The Romans, having obliged Belisarius to give the enemy battle, are defeated.
- e The Romans, now satisfied by their own experience, that it was not safe to engage the enemy's whole army, contented themselves with sallying out upon them in small parties, in which sallies they were generally attended with success, cutting in pieces great numbers of the aggressors. In the mean time Belisarius received advice, that a supply of money to pay the army was already landed in Italy. In order therefore to get it conveyed safe into the city, he marched out at the head of his army, as if he designed to try the fortune of a second battle. Hereupon the Goths, uniting into one body, abandoned the place, through which he had appointed the treasure and its convoy to pass; by which means it got safe into the city. By this stratagem one evil was successfully removed; but the besieged laboured under others more fatal and pernicious, a famine and plague, which made a dreadful havock in the city; in-
Rome afflicted with a famine and plague. so much that the citizens, no longer able to bear their calamities and misfortunes, would have forced the Roman general to venture a second battle, had he not, with great confidence, assured them, that he daily expected great supplies from the emperor; that a vast army was on full march to join him; that a mighty fleet was already
- f arrived, such a fleet as no Roman eye had ever beheld; for it covered the shores of Campania, and the Ionian gulf. To give weight and authority to what he said, he dispatched Procopius the historian to Naples, with orders to head the troops, which he pretended to be already arrived in that city: and truly a considerable supply did

These, in their march through Campania, were joined by five hundred men newly raised in that country, and, marching close to the shore, arrived at Ostia, whence they marched to Rome, which they entered by the Ostian gate, while the enemy's forces were employed against Belisarius, who had sallied out with the greatest part of the garrison at the Flaminian gate on the opposite side of the city, to give his supplies an opportunity

nity of entering without loſs or oppoſition. The Goths hearing of the arrival of a theſe troops, and their numbers being ſaid to be far greater than they really were, as is uſual on ſuch occasions, they began to deſpair of ever being able to maſter the city, the more as they laboured under as great hardſhips as the beſieged themſelves, the famine and plague making a dreadful havock in their army, which was now greatly reduced. They therefore began now to think of abandoning the enterprize, and retreating upon the beſt terms they could obtain. Accordingly, they ſent three deputies into the city to treat with Belifarius; but the only thing they could obtain, was a ceſſation of arms for three months, during which time they might ſend embafſadors to the emperor, who ſhould be allowed to return home unmoleſted, even after the expiration of the truce. No further mention is made of the embafſadors; but, as the ſiege was continued after the expiration of the truce, it is plain from thence, that they did not ſucceed in their negotiations at Conſtantinople. During the truce, Belifarius ſent out of Rome as many of his forces as he could ſpare, under the command of one John, an officer of great experience, with orders to intercept the enemy's convoys as ſoon as the truce was expired, and attempt ſuch places as they thought they could reduce without great loſs. Theſe, entering Picenum, which ſupplied the army before Rome with provisions, laid waſte that province far and near, and, approaching Rimini, killed Ulitheus, uncle to Vitiges, attempting to oppoſe them, and made themſelves maſters of that city. Vitiges had, in the mean time, made ſeveral attempts upon Rome; but tho' all his efforts, and the many ſtratagems he made uſe of to get into the city, were defeated by Belifarius, he ſtill purſued the ſiege with great obſtinacy, till news was brought him of the taking of Rimini; which alarmed him to ſuch a degree, as that city was but a day's journey from Ravenna, that he immediately broke up the ſiege, after it had laſted a year and nine days, and by day-break retired in good order. Belifarius did not let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of annoying the enemy, but, falling upon their rear as they were paſſing the bridge on the Tiber, cut great numbers of them in pieces, while others, ſtruck with a panic, threw themſelves into the river, and were drowned ^m.

FROM Rome Vitiges marched ſtrait to Rimini, being reſolved, at all events, to force that important place out of the enemy's hands. Belifarius, not doubting but that was his deſign, took care to have ſuch ſupplies put into the city as could be ſpared, diſpatching Ildeger and Martinus with a thouſand horſe, and ordering them to draw the foot out of Ancona, and march with them to Rimini. His orders were executed with ſuch expedition, that Vitiges, on his arrival before the town, found it in a condition to hold out for a long time. However, he inveſted it on all ſides, and began to batter it with a great number of engines; but being repulſed with great loſs in ſeveral attacks, he reſolved to reduce it by famine. Belifarius, to make a powerful diverſion, and oblige the king to raiſe the ſiege, ſent a ſtrong detachment, under the conduct of Mundilas, to ſurpriſe Milan; which he took without oppoſition, and, in a ſhort time, made himſelf maſter of all Liguria, the enemy's forces being all employed before Rimini. Vitiges, hearing that Milan was fallen into the enemy's hands, diſpatched Uraia, his ſiſter's ſon, at the head of a ſtrong detachment, to recover that important place, and the reſt of Liguria. Uraia, being joined by the ten thouſand Burgundians, of whom we have ſpoken above, ſent by Theodebert king of the Franks, laid cloſe ſiege to Milan, and, in a ſhort time, reduced it to the laſt extremity. While Vitiges was thus buſied in the ſiege of Rimini, and Uraia in that of Milan, Belifarius, leaving a ſmall gariſon in Rome, marched towards the former place, with a deſign to cut off the communication between the Goths before Rimini and thoſe in Auximum, now Oſimo, a ſtrong town held by them. On his march, he made himſelf maſter of Tudera and Cluſium, and, at the latter place, received intelligence, that the celebrated Narſes was arrived from Conſtantinople in Picenum with freſh ſupplies, viz. with five thouſand Romans, and two thouſand Heruli. They were all commanded in chief by Narſes, and, under him, the Romans by Juſtin, the general of Illyricum, and by Narſes the Armenian. The Heruli were headed by three of their countrymen, Viſigandus, Aloetbes, and Phanetbeus. Upon this intelligence, Belifarius marched into Picenum, and the two armies joined at Firmum, now Fermo, where a council of war was held, wherein they deliberated, whether it was moſt expedient for the emperor's ſervice to beſiege Auximum, or relieve Rimini. If they marched

- a to Rimini, Belisarius apprehended, that the enemy from Auximum would harass and lay waste the neighbouring country, which had submitted to the Romans. On the other hand, it was thought unreasonable to suffer the besieged to perish for want of assistance. As Narses had a great kindness for John, who was shut up in the place, he earnestly pressed Belisarius to deliver him from the imminent danger both he and the garrison were in. Belisarius at first refused to comply with his request; but a messenger seasonably arriving with letters from John, wherein he declared, that, unless he was relieved in seven days, he must deliver up the town, Belisarius agreed to march to his relief. Having therefore left a thousand men at Firmum, under the command of Aratius, to awe the garrison of Auximum, he divided his army into
- b three bodies, whereof one was embarked on a great number of vessels, another marched along the shore under the conduct of Martinus, and the third was led by Belisarius himself, and by Narses, over the mountains. This division of the forces had the desired effect; for Vitiges, seeing a great fleet appear, and at the same time two armies, which, from the many fires they made in the night, he concluded to be very numerous, broke up the siege, and fled in such haste, that the greatest part of the baggage was left behind. The confusion of the Goths was so great, that, had not the garrison been extremely feeble for want of sustenance, they might have easily cut them off in their disorderly retreat, and at once put an end to the war^a. After this success, jealousies began to arise between Belisarius and Narses, which were carried to such a height, that the latter, refusing to obey the former, required, that the army might be divided, that each of them might command a separate body, and act independently of one another, it being reasonable, that they should both have their share in the glory of conquering Italy, and reuniting it to the empire. This gave great uneasiness to Belisarius, who, apprehending that the dividing of the army might prove highly prejudicial to the emperor's service, alleged many reasons against it; but, finding Narses obstinate, he produced the emperor's letter to him, wherein Justinian declared, that he had not sent Narses into Italy to command the army, but to serve under Belisarius, and, with the rest of the officers, to obey and execute his orders in all things relating to his service, and the welfare of the state. Narses,
- d laying hold of the last words of the letter, endeavoured to prove, that what Belisarius proposed was repugnant to the good of the state, and consequently that he was not obliged to obey him. This animosity and misunderstanding between the two generals bred such a division in the army, that Belisarius having undertaken the siege of Urbium, John, with several of the chief officers, and great part of the forces, encamped at a distance from him, and, before he began to batter the place, withdrew with Narses in the night, and returned to Rimini. However, Belisarius, thinking he could master the place without them, prepared for an assault; but as he was marching up to the walls, the besieged, to the great surprize of the Romans, desired to capitulate, and, upon promise of indemnity, opened their gates, and submitted.
- e This unexpected submission was owing to their want of water; for the only fountain the Goths had in the city failed all on a sudden, which unforeseen accident obliged them to submit to the best terms they could obtain. Narses, who lay idle at Rimini, greatly surprized at this sudden success, and looking upon the reduction of the place as a reflection upon himself, (for he had been persuaded by John that it was impregnable) to redeem his reputation, dispatched John, with part of the forces that had followed him, against the city of Cesena; but, the garrison making a vigorous resistance, John, retiring from before it in the night, surprized Forum Cornelii, now Imola, and, by degrees, reduced all Æmilia, the Goths, disheartened with so many losses, not daring to venture an engagement. As for Belisarius, from Urbium he marched to
- f Urbiventum, at a small distance from Rome. As the place was well fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison, under the command of Albilas, an officer of great reputation among the Goths, Belisarius, after several unsuccessful attacks, sat down before it, with a design to reduce it by famine; which he did accordingly, after the besieged had for some time fed upon grass, and skins soaked in water. And now the season being far advanced, both Belisarius and Narses retired with their respective corps to winter-quarters^b.

tion to which the city was reduced, who thereupon ordered Martinus and Uliaris to ^a march with a considerable body to their relief; but these two generals, advancing as far as the Po, encamped on the banks of that river, and, tho' earnestly solicited by their distressed friends to hasten to their assistance, they continued there, excusing themselves to Belisarius, and pretending in the letter they wrote to him, that the Goths and Burgundians in Liguria being too strong for them, they did not think it adviseable to proceed farther, till they were joined by more forces. Upon the receipt of this letter, Belisarius ordered John and Justin to join them with all expedition; which they refused to do, till they received the like orders from Narses, to whom Belisarius immediately wrote on that subject, desiring that the public might not suffer by their unseasonable emulation. Narses, convinced of the reasonableness of this ^b remonstrance, wrote to John, commanding him to obey the general's orders; but, during these delays, the Romans in Milan being reduced by famine to the last extremity, Mundilas was forced by his own men to accept the terms offered him by the Goths, who promised to let the garrison retire unmolested. Thus was Milan surrendered to the enemy, who, in breach of the articles agreed on, made Mundilas and the garrison prisoners of war, demolished the city, put all those to the sword who were able to bear arms, to the number of three hundred thousand, and, making the women slaves, gave them as a reward to the Burgundians. Reparatus, a prefect, and officer of great distinction, was cut in pieces, and his mangled body thrown to the dogs. Bergantinus, with a few more, escaped, and, passing through Venetia ^c and Dalmatia, brought the melancholy news of this disaster to the emperor at Constantinople. Martinus and Uliaris returned with shame and disgrace to Rome, while the Goths, encouraged by this success, pursued their good fortune, and reduced all Liguria. Belisarius acquainted the emperor with what had passed, who, ascribing the loss of Milan to the disagreement between him and Narses, recalled the latter, and confirmed the former in the supreme command, which he had conferred upon him in the beginning of the war ^p. The recalling of Narses was a great disappointment to Vitiges, who had promised himself many advantages from the disagreement of the generals; but finding his hopes defeated, and concluding, from the preparations Belisarius was making during the winter, that he intended to march against him ^d early in the spring with all his forces, and besiege him in Ravenna itself, he was greatly perplexed what measures he should take to avert the impending storm, or to whom he should recur for assistance. He knew there was no depending upon the Franks, by whom he had been lately deceived, and who, he was well apprised, would, under some pretence or other, elude the most solemn treaties and engagements. He therefore had recourse to Vacis or Varis king of the Lombards, whom he endeavoured to draw to his assistance with the offer of a large sum; but finding him unalterably steady to the alliance he had lately concluded with the emperor, he was advised to send ambassadors to Chosroes king of Persia, to try whether he could persuade that prince to invade the Roman territories; for such an enemy, said his counsellors, would ^e make a powerful diversion, oblige the emperor to recal Belisarius, and make him lay aside all thoughts of extending his dominions in the west, since the security and defence of the eastern provinces were of far greater consequence both to his interest and reputation. Vitiges, highly pleased with this advice, found two Ligurian priests, who undertook the journey to the Persian court, and, arriving safe there, persuaded Chosroes to make war upon the empire, by remonstrating to him, that, if he continued unactive, and suffered the Goths to be destroyed, and Italy reunited to the empire, the Romans, by that accession, would recover their antient power, which they would not fail to employ against him, being still prompted by the same ambition, which had proved so fatal to his predecessors ^q. Vitiges was overjoyed, when, ^f upon the return of the ambassadors, he understood, that Chosroes was resolved upon a rupture. However, he received no great advantage from it; for, though it put a stop to the progress of the emperor's arms in Italy, and obliged him to recal Belisarius, this did not happen till the unhappy Vitiges was taken prisoner, and almost all Italy brought under subjection to the emperor; for Belisarius, pursuing the war with great vigour while the ambassadors of Vitiges were negotiating at the Persian court, sat down with eleven thousand men before Auximum, the metropolis of Picenum, and at the same time sent a strong detachment, under the command of Cyprian, one of

- a his lieutenants, to reduce Fesulæ, which, together with Auximum, opened a passage to Ravenna, whither he intended to follow Vitiges, who, from Kimini, had retired to that city. As Auximum was strong by its situation on a high and steep hill, and defended by a numerous garrison, it made a vigorous defence; but Belisarius allowing the besieged no respite, they were, after some time, reduced to such straits, that they dispatched messengers to Vitiges, threatening to surrender, unless they were speedily relieved. Hereupon the king dispatched Uraia, with a strong body of Goths, to their assistance, assuring them, that, in a short time, he himself would follow with his whole army. Uraia, having passed the Po, advanced into the neighbourhood of Auximum; but finding all the avenues to the city well guarded, he
- b encamped at the distance of seven miles from the Romans.

IN the mean time the treacherous Franks, thinking both nations sufficiently weakened by their mutual hostilities, resolved to attack both, and decide the dispute, by seizing on the country for which they disputed. Accordingly Theodebert, unmindful of the oaths he had taken both to the Romans and Goths, passed the Alps at the head of an hundred and fifty thousand, as we read in Procopius, or, as Jornandes will have it, two hundred thousand men, and entered Liguria. As no hostilities were committed by them on their march through that country, the Goths concluded, that they were coming to their assistance, and therefore took care to supply them with what provisions they could spare. Thus they passed the Po without opposition, and,

c having secured the bridge, marched strait to the place where a body of Goths were encamped, who, looking upon them as friends, admitted them into the camp. But they were soon convinced of their mistake; for the Franks, falling unexpectedly upon them, drove them with great slaughter from their camp, and seized on their baggage and provisions. A body of Romans, that lay at a small distance from the Goths, under the command of John and Martinus, observing the sudden flight of the Goths, and concluding that they had been defeated by Belisarius, flew to join him, when the Franks, falling unawares upon them, treated them as they had done the Goths. As the Romans were not able, in that confusion, to recover their camp, they fled into Tuscany, and thence dispatched a messenger to Belisarius, with an account of their

d misfortune. The Franks, thus become masters of both camps, found in them good store of provisions, and a considerable booty; but the provisions being soon consumed by their numerous army, and the country round about quite exhausted, they were obliged, by the famine that began to rage among them, and the diseases that were occasioned by their unwholesome food, and are said to have swept off one third of their army, to give over all thoughts of advancing farther into the country, or making any conquests in Italy, which thus early became, as it is now styled, the tomb of the French. At the same time Belisarius, fearing the Franks might in the end be persuaded by the Goths to join them, wrote to Theodebert, expostulating with him in a friendly manner for his breach of faith, and telling him, that the emperor's affairs

e were not in such a desperate condition, as to render him incapable of resenting in due time, as he ought, affronts of this nature. Theodebert, moved with this letter, but more with the opprobrious language of his men, openly reviling him for suffering them to starve in a barren and impoverished country, decamped with such of them as were able to march, and, passing through Liguria, where he destroyed Genoa, and several other places, he returned home loaded with booty.

ALL this time the two garrisons of Auximum and Fesulæ held out with incredible resolution. The former, being reduced to the utmost extremity, resolved once more to solicit the king for relief; but, not being able to send any messenger out of the town, which was closely blocked up on all sides, they corrupted with a large sum a f soldier in the Roman army, who was placed near the walls, to prevent the inhabitants from cutting the grass that grew there, the only food they now had, to carry a letter to the king, wherein they acquainted him with the condition to which they were reduced. The king returned answer, That, without fail, they should be relieved in a few days, and, with friendly words, encouraged them to bear but a little while longer their hardships, which he might call his own, since he felt them no less than they. The besieged were so encouraged with this answer, that they rejected all the offers made them by Belisarius. But, finding the king did not come to their relief, they dispatched the same soldier to him a second time, acquainting him, that, unless they were relieved in five days, they should be obliged to surrender. The king ^a replied as he had done before, giving them hopes of a speedy relief. Belisarius in the mean time, who was well acquainted with the streights to which they were reduced, in order to discover what encouraged them to hold out with so much obstinacy, appointed some of his men to watch those, who came out of the town to gather grass, and to take, if possible, some of them prisoners. They had the good luck to surprise one, who, being brought before the general, owned to him, that, by means of one of his men, they had corresponded with the king, who had assured them, that they should be speedily relieved. Hereupon the soldier, by name Barcensiris, by nation a Bessian, was seized, and, upon his confessing the fact, delivered up to be punished by his countrymen, who condemned him to be burnt alive. Belisarius, ^b finding them still obstinate, marched in person, at the head of a strong detachment, to demolish an aqueduct, which was near the walls, and supplied them with water. The besieged, sallying out to defend it, though quite spent with famine and hardships, made a great havock of his men; but were in the end, after a most obstinate dispute, driven back into the city. On this occasion Belisarius was in imminent danger of his life; but one of his guards saved him with the loss of his own hand. After all, the Romans found the aqueduct so strongly built, that they could not by any means demolish it; but Belisarius caused all the springs to be poisoned, hoping thereby to oblige them to surrender. The garrison in Fesulæ held out against ^c Cyprian with no less obstinacy; but in the end, despairing of relief, they surrendered upon terms. Hereupon Cyprian, leaving part of his army in the town, with the rest brought the inhabitants before Auximum, where Belisarius shewed them to the besieged, who, concluding from the surrender of that place, that the king was incapable of relieving them, desired to capitulate, offering to deliver up the town, on condition they might enjoy their lives and effects. This the general was inclined to grant; but the soldiers opposed it, declaring, that the wealth of the city was the due reward of their wounds, and the many toils and dangers they had undergone in the siege. At length it was agreed on both sides, that the soldiers should have one half, and that the other should remain to the inhabitants, who were to take an oath of allegiance to the emperor. Upon these terms the gates were opened to the Romans, who took ^d possession of the city in the emperor's name.

Belisarius did not continue long at Auximum, but marched from thence with his whole army to Ravenna, which he invested on all sides, both by sea and land, to prevent the importation of provisions. The place was defended by a very numerous garrison, commanded by the king in person, who exerted all his courage and bravery in the defence of the metropolis of his kingdom; but Belisarius pursuing the siege with incredible vigour, and great success, the kings of the Franks, especially Theodebert, alarmed at the progress of the emperor's arms, and not doubting but, if Italy were united anew to the empire, he would fall next upon them, dispatched ambassadors to Vitiges, offering to assist him with an army of five hundred thousand men, on ^e condition he would share the country with them. Belisarius, informed of this negotiation, in order to defeat the ambitious views of the Franks, sent ambassadors to Vitiges, to put him in mind of the perfidy of the Franks, of which he had but a very fresh instance, and to assure him, that the emperor, on whom he might depend, was ready to grant him very honourable terms. The king, by the advice of the great men about him, rejected the proposals of the Franks, and shewed himself inclined to come to an agreement with the emperor. In the mean time Belisarius, to bring the king to his own terms, bribed with a large sum a citizen of Ravenna to set fire to a magazine of corn, which was the chief dependence of the besieged. This was done with such secrecy, that they knew not whether they ought to impute it to chance, or ^f to design. They began to distrust each other, and some to conclude, that Heaven itself fought against them. At the same time Belisarius detached one Thomas with a body of troops against the Goths inhabiting the Alpes Cottiae, who, at his approach, submitted, with Sisigis their leader. Of this Uraia receiving intelligence while on his march to the relief of Ravenna with four thousand men, he changed his resolution, and went to attack Thomas, hoping to surprise him; but John and Martinus, who lay encamped on the banks of the Po, suspecting his design, marched against him, and obliged him to retire into Liguria, where he continued, expecting better fortune.

- a Vitiges, upon his rejecting the offers of the Franks, had dispatched ambassadors to Constantinople, to conclude a peace with the emperor upon the best terms they could obtain. These now returned, and with them two senators, Dominicus and Maximinus, sent by Justinian to conclude a peace upon the following terms, viz. that the country beyond the Po, with respect to Rome, should remain to the Goths; but that the rest of Italy should be yielded to the emperor; and the royal treasure of the Goths should be equally divided between him and the king. These conditions Vitiges and the Goths embraced with great joy; for they were already reduced to great straits.
 But Belisarius, not able to bear, that he should be thus bereft of the glory of ending the war, and carrying Vitiges, as he had lately done Gelimer king of the Vandals, b captive to Constantinople, peremptorily refused to sign the treaty, and pursued the siege with more vigour than ever, without hearkening to the complaints of his officers and soldiers, who were quite tired with the length of the siege: he only obliged such of the officers as were of opinion, that the town could not be taken, to express what they said in writing, that they might not deny it afterwards. The great men among the Goths, finding that Belisarius refused to obey the instructions he had received from Constantinople, and to sign the treaty, concluded from thence, that he designed to revolt from the emperor, and conquer Italy for himself. On the other hand, being weary of Vitiges, and unwilling to submit to Justinian, who, they apprehended, would transplant them into Thrace, or some other barren country, they privately
 c agreed among themselves to declare Belisarius emperor of the west, and accordingly dispatched a messenger to him, assuring him, that they were ready to swear allegiance to him. Belisarius abhorred in his heart the name of usurper; but nevertheless, to forward the surrender of the city, and put an end to the war, he pretended to accept of the offer, after having acquainted the chief officers of the army with all that passed, lest they should imagine, that he really designed to usurp the kingdom of Italy, and thereupon revolt from him. In the mean time Vitiges, having discovered the plot, and finding himself no ways in a condition to defeat it, commended the resolution of the Goths, and even wrote to Belisarius, encouraging him to take upon him the title of king, and assuring him of his assistance. Hereupon Belisarius pressing the d Goths to perform their promise, ambassadors were dispatched to him from the chief men of the Gothic nation, requiring him, before they acknowledged him for their king, to swear, that he would treat the Goths with humanity, and maintain them in the enjoyment of all their antient rights and privileges. This oath Belisarius took, and was thereupon by the Goths proclaimed king of Italy, and admitted into Ravenna.
 He behaved with great moderation towards the Goths in the city, not suffering his soldiers to do them any injury; but seized on the royal treasure, and secured the person of the king. The Roman army, when it entered Ravenna, appeared so inconsiderable, that the Gothic women, in beholding it, could not forbear spitting in their husbands faces, and reviling them as cowards. Procopius, from whom we have copied e this account, and who was an eye-witness of the triumphal ingress of Belisarius into Ravenna, tells us, that he was thence convinced, that, in human affairs, success does not depend on multitudes of men, or their valour or strength, but that some higher and greater power steers, governs and directs all things to the pre-ordained ends *.

In the mean time Cbofroes invading with a mighty army the Roman dominions in the east, Justinian, looking upon the Persian war as of far greater consequence than the Gothic, recalled Belisarius to take upon him the management of it. It was believed by some, that the jealousy, which, at the instigation of the court sycophants, the emperor, say they, began to entertain of Belisarius, prompted him to recal this general. Procopius writes, that he was accused to the emperor by the other generals, as f if he aspired at the sovereignty of Italy; that the emperor gave no credit to such calumnies; but nevertheless recalled him, because he wanted a general of his abilities to conduct the Persian war *. Be that as it will, Belisarius, in compliance with the emperor's orders, began, as soon as he received them, to prepare for his departure, to the great surprize of the Goths, who could not persuade themselves, that, to obey the emperor, he would relinquish a crown. They did all that lay in their power to divert him from his resolution and intended journey, but to no purpose; for Belisa- rius, inviolably attached to the service of his master, having settled affairs in the

wife Matefuenta, several of the Gothic nobility, and the royal treasure. He was ^a received by the emperor without the least tokens of distrust, who nevertheless did not ordain him a triumph, as he had done on his return from the conquest of Africa. Vitiges the emperor treated with all the respect due to his rank, and conferred on him the dignity of patrician. The king died two years after, and, upon his death, Justinian married Matefuenta to Germanus his own nephew. The other great men among the Goths, whom Belisarius brought with him to Constantinople, attended that general to the Persian war. It is remarkable, that the emperor caused the royal treasure of the Goths to be exposed to the view of the senate; but would not shew it, as he had done that which Belisarius had brought out of Africa, to the people, fearing perhaps to heighten his reputation among the multitude, by whom he was already ^b almost adored. Upon the departure of Belisarius, the chief men among the Goths dwelling beyond the Po, in a great assembly, resolved to raise one of their own nation to the throne, in the room of Belisarius. Accordingly, they applied themselves first to Uraia, the nephew of Vitiges; but he, out of respect to his uncle, not caring to take upon him the title of king during his life-time, declined the burden; but at the same time advised them to make choice of Ildebald, at that time governor of Verona, a man of great address, and experience in affairs both civil and military, and nephew to Theudis king of the Visigoths, who, in all likelihood, would espouse his cause. The Goths, pleased with the advice of Uraia, sent immediately for Ildebald, and proclaimed him king. The new prince undertook, and not without success, the re-esta- ^c blishing of the Gothic affairs in Italy. He had at first no more than a thousand men; but the Goths flocking to him from all parts, and with them great numbers of discontented Romans, his army in a short time grew very considerable. The Romans were highly displeased with the conduct of Alexander, who, from his clipping the coin, was nicknamed Forficula. He had been sent into Italy by the emperor, to state the accounts of the army, in which office he disobliged both the soldiers and officers to such a degree, that they became very ill affected to the emperor, and great numbers of them, finding themselves defrauded, not only of the rewards they expected, but even of the pay that was due to them, abandoned the emperor's service, and fled over to the Goths. Besides, Bessas, John, and Constantianus, whom Belisarius had ^d appointed to command the troops in Italy, disagreeing among themselves, nothing of any moment was undertaken by them. However, Vitalis, governor of Venetia, having drawn together what troops he could, and taken into the emperor's pay a considerable body of Feruli, took the field, and, marching against Ildebald, met him in the neighbourhood of Tarvisium, where, in the battle that ensued, most of Vitalis's men were cut in pieces, and he, with the few that escaped, obliged to save himself by a precipitous flight. After this victory, Ildebald made himself master of the whole province of Venetia: but he did not live long enough to improve his victory farther; for a contest arising between his queen and the wife of Uraia, the king, giving ear to the complaints of his wife, first accused Uraia of maintaining a private correspondence ^e with the emperor, and afterwards, with the utmost treachery and ingratitude, caused him to be murdered. As, by the murder of so worthy a man, he incurred the displeasure of the whole nation, one of his guards, by name Vilas, a Gepid by nation, whom he had disobliged, by giving in marriage to another a woman whom he passionately loved, resolved to lay hold of this opportunity to revenge the injury. Accordingly, while the king was one day feasting the nobility, attended by his guards, Vilas gave him such a blow on the neck with his sword, that his head dropped on the table while he yet held the meat between his fingers ^f.

Ildebald being thus dispatched, the leading men among the Goths, without loss of time, chose Eraric, by birth a Rugian, to succeed him. The Rugians were a Gothic ^f nation; but their tribe differed in manners and customs from that of the Ostrogoths, whence the people and soldiery were, with much-ado, brought to acknowledge him for king, though they knew him to be a man of great valour, and experience in war. In the beginning of his reign, with the consent and approbation of the Goths, he dispatched ambassadors to the emperor, to sue, as he pretended, for a peace, upon the same terms that had been formerly offered to Vitiges, viz. that the Goths should hold all the provinces beyond the Po, and the Romans the rest of Italy. But the ambassadors had private instructions to acquaint the emperor, that Eraric was ready to

- a deliver up Italy to him, upon condition he paid him a certain sum, and raised him to the dignity of a patrician^c. This private negotiation was not known till after the king's death. However, the Goths, generally discontented with the government of their new king, began to think of deposing him, and raising another to the throne. They cast their eyes on Totila, nephew to Ildebald, a person of extraordinary merit, and one who had eminently distinguished himself in war. He commanded at that time the Goths in Tervisium, and, upon the news of his uncle's death, had sent to Constantianus, who governed for the emperor in Ravenna, offering, upon assurance of indemnity, to deliver up to him both the place and the garrison. Constantianus readily accepted the offer, and, having promised upon oath to perform the articles,
- b a day was appointed for the surrender of the place. But in the mean time a messenger from the chief men among the Goths arriving at Tervisium, acquainted Totila with the design they had formed of deposing Eraric, and raising him to the throne. Totila frankly discovered to them the agreement he had made with Constantianus; but told them at the same time, that he was willing to accept of their offer, provided they dispatched Eraric before the day appointed for the surrender of the place. Upon the return of the messenger, the Goths fell immediately upon Eraric, and, having murdered him after a short reign of five months, with one voice declared Totila king^a. He is murdered, and Totila proclaimed king. Year after Christ 542.
- THE emperor, informed of the death of Eraric, of the promotion of Totila, and of the distracted state of affairs in Italy, sharply reprimanded his officers, who com-
- c manded there, ascribing the whole to their indolence and bad conduct. Hereupon they assembled in Ravenna, where it was agreed in a council of war, that siege should be laid forthwith to Verona, at that time the chief city of the Goths, and, upon the reduction of that place, the whole army should march against Totila, who was at the head of a small body in Picenum. Pursuant to this plan, the army, consisting of about twelve thousand men, marched, under the command of eleven generals, of whom Constantianus and Alexander were the chief, and, arriving in the neighbourhood of Verona, encamped within seven miles of that city. Marcianus, a man of great interest in the country, and well affected to the emperor's service, had engaged a citizen of Verona to betray the place. A centinel, privy to the plot, was to open
- d one of the gates in the night, and admit a party of Romans, who were to secure the gate, till the rest of the army came up. This was a dangerous undertaking, there being a strong garrison in the town, and the safety of those, who were to be sent on the party, depending intirely on the fidelity of the centinel. The service was therefore, to the great disgrace of the Roman name, declined by all the Romans, but with great joy undertaken by one Artabanes an Armenian, who, advancing at the head of one hundred men, was admitted within the gate, which he secured with some of them, while others killed the centinels on the walls, and made themselves masters of the adjoining houses. Artabanes immediately acquainted the generals with his success, requiring them to hasten the march of the army; but the commanders, being advanced within five miles of the place, ordered the army to halt, till they had settled among themselves in what manner the plunder of so wealthy a city was to be divided. This occasioned great disputes; so that the night was spent before they could agree. In the mean time the Goths, who, hearing that the Romans were masters of one gate, had fled out at another, and retired to a high rock not far from the city, discovering from thence the small number of the Romans in the town, and the army yet at a distance, returned into the city by the same gate they had gone out, and, falling upon the Romans, obliged them to abandon the gate, and fly to the battlements, where they defended themselves with unparalleled valour. By this time the commanders, having agreed about the plunder of the city, approached the gates; but,
- f finding them shut, they shamefully retired, though their companions, overpowered with numbers, earnestly called out for their assistance. Artabanes therefore, and such of his men as were still alive, seeing themselves thus basely abandoned, and despairing of succour, leaped down from the walls. Those who fell on the stones were killed by the fall, or rendered incapable of saving themselves by flight; but Artabanes, with a few more, having the good luck to pitch upon the ground, got safe to the camp, where he upbraided the commanders with their ill conduct, and want of courage. The Romans, after this disappointment, having passed the Po, marched to Faventia, now Faenza, where they were met by Totila at the head of his small army, consisting only of five thousand men. Hereupon the Roman generals having called a council ^a of war, Artabanes advised them not to despise the enemy, though far inferior to them in number, but to fall upon them before the whole body had passed the river Lamone, on which stands the town of Faventia. But the commanders disagreeing among themselves, as it generally happens when they are equal in power, Totila passed the river without opposition; so that the two armies approached each other in order of battle. While they stood thus drawn up, waiting the signal, one Valiaris, a Goth of a gigantic size, and proportionable strength, advancing before the ranks, challenged any Roman to a single combat. Artabanes accepted the challenge, and, at the first encounter, ran him through the right-side with his lance; but imagining, as the Goth did not fall immediately, that the wound was not mortal, he gave him a ^b second wound in the belly, when the head of Valiaris's lance, which stood upright, falling upon Artabanes's neck, unfortunately cut one of the arteries. The brave champion however, not apprehending any danger, rode back to the army; but, as the blood could not be stopped, he died three days after, to the great grief of all the emperor's true friends, who, from his experience, courage, and prudence, promised themselves great things. He had served first with great reputation in the Persian army; but, being taken prisoner by Belisarius in the castle of Sisaurum, with all the Persians under his command, and sent to Constantinople, he offered his service to the emperor, who sent him, with the Persians he had formerly commanded, to his army in Italy, where he distinguished himself, as we have related, in an eminent manner. ^c The single combat was succeeded by a general engagement, in which the Romans, confiding in their numbers, behaved at first with great bravery. But three hundred Goths, who had been ordered by Totila to pass the river at some distance, falling unexpectedly upon their rear, pursuant to their orders, they began to give ground, imagining that body to be far more numerous than it really was. Hereupon Totila charging them in front with new vigour, they first fell into great confusion, and then betook themselves to a precipitous flight. The Goths pursued them with great slaughter, took a great number of prisoners, and all their ensigns, and obliged the few, who had the good luck to make their escape, to take refuge, with their commanders, in the neighbouring towns ^b.

Totila, to improve this victory, marched without loss of time to Florence, and ^d invested that city; but a considerable army being sent from Ravenna to the relief of the place, Totila thought it advisable to raise the siege, and retire to Micole, a town about a day's journey from Florence. The Romans, leaving a small garrison in the town, pursued them with the rest of their forces; and it was agreed, that one of the commanders, marching with all possible expedition after them, should keep them in play till the others came up. The lot fell upon John; but unseasonable disputes arising among the commanders, and a report being spread, that John was killed by one of his own men, the army halted; and in the mean time John being forced to engage the enemy with his own troops only, he was utterly defeated. When news of this defeat was brought to the army, seized with a sudden panic, they all dispersed, ^e every one shifting for himself in the best manner he could. Totila treated the prisoners he took in this and the former engagement with so much humanity, that most of them entering into his service, his army was by that means considerably increased. The following year, the eighth of the Gothic war, Totila, taking the field early in the spring, made himself master of all the strong places in Tuscany, and, marching from thence into Campania and Samnium, reduced and dismantled the strong town of Beneventum, and laid siege to Naples; during which several detachments from his army took Cumæ, and recovered all Brutia, Lucania, Apulia, and Calabria, where they found considerable sums, which had been gathered for the emperor. The Goths having thus seized on the tributes, and the money that had been levied to pay ^f the army, the emperor's troops were reduced to great straits, and thereupon began to mutiny, and refuse to take the field; so that Constantianus lay idle at Ravenna, John at Rome, Bessas at Spoletum, Justin at Florence, and Cyprian at Perugia, the places to which they had fled after the late defeat. The emperor, informed of the bad situation of his affairs in Italy, ordered a considerable fleet to be equipped, and a great number of forces to be raised, committing both to the conduct of Maximinus, whom he honoured with the title of præfectus prætorio of Italy; but as he was a man quite

- a unacquainted with military affairs, naturally timorous, and pointed Demetrius to command under him, who had formerly as general of the foot. Demetrius, to retrieve the reputation of Italy, resolved to attempt the relief of Naples, already reduced to With this view, leaving Maximinus on the coasts of Epirus, he sailed the fleet to Sicily; and there, as he had but a small number of forces assembled a great many vessels, with a design to terrify the enemy, who conclude, that so considerable a fleet had a proportionable army on board; but failing him after he had put to sea, instead of sailing directly to Naples, he altered his course to Rome, in order to raise soldiers, and then return to Naples; but the Romans refusing to serve against the victorious king of the Goths, he was obliged either to lie idle, or to attempt the relief of Naples with the few troops he had brought with him. The latter expedient he chose; but Totila, having timely notice of his design, manned with incredible expedition a great number of light vessels, which, unexpectedly falling upon him as he was riding at anchor on the coast of Naples, took or sunk every ship of his fleet, and made all on board prisoners, except a few, who betook themselves to their boats, among whom was Demetrius himself. The besieged being greatly disheartened by this loss, Conon, who commanded in Naples, dispatched a messenger to Maximinus, acquainting him with the deplorable condition to which the city was reduced, and earnestly pressing him to hasten to their relief. Maximinus was already advanced as far as Syracuse; but could not be persuaded to stir from thence for some time. At length, being threatened with the emperor's displeasure, importuned by repeated messages from the besieged, and openly reviled for cowardice by the soldiers, he sent the fleet to Naples under the command of others; but, indulging his natural timidity, staid himself behind. As the fleet put to sea in the depth of winter, it was, by a violent storm, driven ashore near the enemy's camp, who sunk the ships, and, without resistance, made what slaughter they pleased of the seamen and soldiers. Few of them escaped being either taken or killed. Among the prisoners was Demetrius, who, after the loss of his own fleet, had gone aboard that of Maximinus. Totila ordered him to be led, with a rope about his neck, to the town wall, and there obliged him to exhort the inhabitants to surrender, by assuring them, that they were to expect no further succours, and that all hopes of relief were lost with the navy. At the same time Totila offered them honourable terms, upon condition they submitted immediately; which they did accordingly, and were treated by him with the utmost humanity. As they had been pinched with a long famine, Totila, apprehending they might endanger their lives by indulging at first their ravenous appetites, placed guards at the gates to prevent their going out, taking care at the same time to supply them sparingly with provisions, but increasing their allowance every day. Being thus, by degrees, restored to their former strength, he ordered the gates to be set open, and gave every one full liberty to stay, or retire to what place he thought fit. He treated Conon and the garrison in a most friendly and obliging manner; for, upon their pretending to return to Constantinople, he supplied them with ships; and having discovered, that their real design was to sail to Rome, and reinforce the garrison of that city, which he intended in the next place to besiege, he was so far from punishing them as they expected, or even upbraiding them for thus imposing upon him, that, on the contrary, the winds not proving favourable for a long time, he furnished them with horses, waggons, and provisions, and ordered a body of Goths to escorte them to Rome. He dismantled Naples, as he had done Beneventum, not caring to weaken his army by garrisoning the many strong-holds that submitted to him.
- f Totila, now master of Naples, and most of the fortresses in those parts, began to turn his thoughts upon Rome. In the first place, he wrote a letter to the senate, whom he earnestly desired to draw over to his party, taxing them in gentle terms with the ingratitude they had shewn to the family and nation of the great Theodoric and Amalasuntha. He advised and intreated them to return to their duty; put them in mind of the treatment they had met with from the emperor and his officers; and concluded by assuring both them and the people of his favour and protection; provided they returned to their allegiance. John, who commanded in Rome, would not suffer the senate to answer this, or receive more letters from Totila, who never, thelefs found means to convey other papers into the city, which were poffed up by a night in the moft frequented places. The Arian priefts were fufpected of holding a private correpondence with the Goths and their king, who profefled the fame doctrine, and on that account were banifhed Rome. Totila, finding his letters and manifeftoes had no effect on the fenate and people of Rome, refolved to purfue other methods; and accordingly, having fent a detachment into Calabria to reduce Otranto, which had not yet fubmitted, he marched, with the reft of his forces, againft the towns in the neighbourhood of Rome. The city of Tibur, now Tivoli, about eighteen miles from Rome, was betrayed to him by one of the inhabitants; and, upon his entering it, he put all the citizens to the fword, together with their bifhop. Several other ftrong-holds in that neighbourhood he took by ftorm; fo that Rome was, in a manner, blocked up by land, all communication with the neighbouring country being cut off. The emperor, greatly perplexed at the bad news he received daily out of Italy, and unwilling to lofe Rome, which was now in imminent danger of falling anew into the enemy's hands, refolved to call Belifarius out of Persia, notwithstanding the fuccefs that attended him there, and fend him again into Italy. Accordingly he wrote to Belifarius, ordering him to repair forthwith to Italy, and to take upon him the command of his armies in that country. Belifarius no fooner received this order, than, leaving Comagene, where he then was, he fet out for the weft. In his way through Thrace, he raifed above four thoufand men at his own expence, and, arriving with them at Salona, he difpatched from thence Vitalius, general of Illyricum, with a body of troops to the relief of Otranto, at whose approach the Goths retired; fo that the town was reinforced with frefh fupplies both of men and provisions. As for Belifarius himfelf, he embarked in Dalmatia, and came by fea to Ravenna, whence he fent feveral parties againft the cities of Emilia; but without fuccefs, though they defeated a fmall body of troops difpatched by Totila to drive them out of that province. After this, they threw themfelves into Auximum, then befieged by the Goths; but finding there were not fufficient provisions in the place to maintain fo numerous a garrifon, they refolved to fally out, and march to Pifaurus, now Pefaro, which ftood at a fmall diftance, and was ftill held by the Romans. In their retreat, two hundred of them were flain by the befiegers; but the reft reached Pifaurus, whither Totila purfued them, hoping to take the place by ftorm; but, being vigorously repulfed by the garrifon, he returned to the fiege of Auximum; and at the fame time, finding that Belifarius was not in a condition to take the field, he fent out detachments to befiege Firmum and Afculum, two places of great importance in the province of Picenum. Belifarius, chiefly concerned for Rome, appointed Biffas governor of that city, and fent Artafiris a Persian, and Barbation a Thracian, men of valour, and great experience in war, to command under Biffas, ftrictly injoining them to make no fallies, in cafe the town was befieged. Being himfelf utterly unable to relieve the befieged towns, or put a ftop to the progrefs of the Goths, he difpatched John to Conftantinople, with a letter to the emperor, wherein he acquainted him with the fituation of his affairs in Italy, telling him at the fame time, that, being deftitute of men, arms, and money, it was impoffible for him to profecute the war. Juftinian, upon the receipt of this letter, ordered new levies to be made, the veterans being all employed againft the Persians. But in the mean time Totila, purfuing his good fortune, took feveral ftrong-holds and cities of great confequence, viz. Firmum, Afculum, Auximum, Spoletum, &c. and at length approached Rome, which he invefted on all fides. As he drew near the city, Artafiris and Barbation, contrary to the exprefs command of Belifarius, made a fally, thinking they fhould furprife the Goths; but they were themfelves taken in an ambufcade, and, moft of their men being cut in pieces, they narrowly efaped falling into the enemy's hands. The town had not been long befieged, when Belifarius was informed, that a confiderable number of troops, fent by the emperor, were in full march to join him. Hereupon Belifarius, committing the care of Ravenna to Juftin, marched with a fmall body of forces to Epidamnus, where he met them. Soon after, Narfes the eunuch arrived with fome auxiliary troops raifed among the Heruli, and commanded by Phelimuth, and other leaders of their own nation. With part of this reinforcement Belifarius failed to the port of Rome, which he was mighty defirous of relieving; and fent the reft, under the command of John, into Calabria, with orders to drive the Goths out of thofe parts, and then join him in the neighbourhood of Rome. John took fome places; but, being afraid to pafs by the city of Capua, or to make any attempt upon it, though

- a defended only by three hundred Goths, he did not, pursuant to his orders, join Belisarius at the time appointed ^e. In the mean time Rome being so closely blocked up, that no provisions could be imported either by land or water, a dreadful famine began to rage in the city. The unhappy citizens, having consumed every thing that could give them any nourishment, and even the grass that grew near the walls, were in the end obliged to feed on their excrements. Several, to avoid the calamities they groaned under, laid violent hands on themselves. In this extremity they flocked in great multitudes to Bessas their governor, earnestly intreating him to supply them with food, and, if that was not in his power, either to give them leave to go out of the town, or to deliver them from their miseries by putting them to death. Bessas replied, That to supply them with food, was impossible; to let them go, unsafe; and to kill them, impious. To raise their drooping spirits, he assured them, that an army was hourly expected from Constantinople, which, under the command of Belisarius, would oblige the Goths to abandon the siege, and retire ^f. Vigilius, bishop of Rome, sent from Sicily, where he then was, several ships laden with corn, to relieve the city; but they were all intercepted by the enemy, who, after the reduction of Naples, kept a great number of vessels constantly cruising between Sicily and Rome. In the end, Bessas suffered such of the citizens as were willing to retire, to go out of the city, upon their paying him a sum of money; but most of them either died on the road, or, falling into the enemy's hands, were by them cut in pieces. Belisarius, well apprised of the miserable condition to which the besieged were reduced, used all possible means to relieve them; but fortune, or rather Providence, seemed to fight against him; for his attempts, however well concerted, proved all unsuccessful; which gave him so much uneasiness, that he fell into a fever, and was thought, for some time, to be in great danger. In the mean time the besieged, no longer able to bear the miseries with which they were afflicted, and despairing of relief, began to mutiny, and press Bessas to come to an agreement with Totila; which he refusing to do, four of the Isaurians, who guarded the Porta Asinaria, letting themselves down from the wall by ropes fastened to the battlements in the dead of the night, while their companions were asleep, went to Totila, and undertook to receive his army into the city. The king with great joy embraced the overture, and, sending four Goths of great strength, intrepidity, and resolution, into the city with the Isaurians, he silently approached the gates with his whole army; which being opened by the Isaurians, with the assistance of the four Goths within, he entered the city at the head of his troops. Upon the first alarm, Bessas, with the other commanders, and most of the soldiers, fled out at another gate. Such as remained behind, took sanctuary in the churches, whither the inhabitants likewise fled. Totila, who had kept his men under arms all night, and united in a body, through fear of an ambuscade, finding he had nothing to apprehend, went early in the morning to St. Peter's church, to return thanks for the success of the enterprize. His men, in their way, killed six-and-twenty soldiers, with about sixty of the inhabitants; and this is all the blood that was shed; for Pelagius the deacon, throwing himself at his feet when he entered the church, with the book of the gospels in his hand, earnestly intreated him to spare the inhabitants. Totila, highly provoked against the inhabitants, refused at first to comply with his demand; but was in the end prevailed upon to forbid his Goths, under the severest penalties, to put any, either of the citizens or soldiers, to death. However, he gave them full liberty to plunder the city, which they did for several days together, stripping the inhabitants of all their wealth, and leaving nothing in their houses but the naked walls. Thus many persons of great distinction, and among the rest Rusticiana, the widow of Boetius, and daughter of Symmachus, a matron of exemplary piety, were reduced to beg their bread from door to door. In the house of Bessas they found an immense treasure, which he had scandalously amassed during the siege, by selling to the people, at an exorbitant price, the corn that had been stored up for the use of the garrison. The Goths were for putting Rusticiana to death, because she had persuaded, as they pretended, the Romans to pull down the images, and destroy the statues, of Theodoric, to revenge, by that means, the death of her father and husband. But Totila, taking her and all the women under his protection, secured them against the cruelty and insolence of the soldiery ^g. Thus was Rome recovered by the Goths in the year of the christian æra 547. the twentieth of Justinian's reign, and the twelfth of the war. Totila, according to the most probable opinion, entered Rome a on the seventeenth of January.

He upbraids
the senate, but spares them.

Totila, now master of the capital of Italy, sent for the senate, and putting them in mind of the favours they had received from the Goths, and the severe treatment they had met with from the emperor and his officers, he bitterly reproached them for behaving so ungratefully to their benefactors, and, in the transport of his passion, threatened to make them all slaves; but his anger soon asswaging, he pardoned them at the intercession of Pelagius, and dismissed them untouched. Soon after, he dispatched Pelagius, and one Theodorus a Roman orator, as his ambassadors to Justinian, with letters full of respect, in which he desired to live in peace and amity with him, as Theodoric had done with Anastasius, promising, in that case, to respect him as his father, and to assist him, when wanted, with all his forces, against any other nation whatsoever. On the contrary, if the emperor rejected his offers, he threatened to level Rome with the ground, to put the whole senate to the sword, and carry the war into Illyricum. The emperor returned no other answer, than that he referred the whole to Belisarius, who had full power to manage all things of that nature as he pleased. Totila, provoked at this answer, and at the defeat of a body of troops, which he had sent to open a passage into Lucania, resolved to demolish Rome, so as not to leave one stone upon another. Accordingly he began with the wall, of which he threw down a third part, and was ready to set fire to the most stately and beautiful buildings of the city, when he received a letter from Belisarius, dissuading him from the resolution he had taken. Belisarius laid great stress on the grandeur and majesty of that antient city, which being raised to such a height of fame and greatness by the industry and valour of so many celebrated and eminent men, posterity would look upon him, who destroyed it, as an enemy to mankind, since he deprived them of so many monuments of the worth and merit of their ancestors. He added, that if, in the end, the Goths should prove victorious, he would never forgive himself for destroying the most beautiful city in his dominions, nay, the most beautiful and magnificent in the whole world. On the other hand, if, in the course of the war, fortune should happen to abandon him, he would, by preserving so favourite a city, highly oblige the conqueror, who would not fail to make him a suitable return; whereas, by demolishing it, he would preclude himself from all favour. Totila, having seriously considered the contents of this letter, and weighed, with attention, the arguments alleged by Belisarius, resolved to follow his advice, and, laying aside all thoughts of destroying Rome, he marched with his army into Lucania. The senate he carried with him, and the rest of the inhabitants, with their wives and children, he sent, under a strong guard, into Lucania before him, not leaving a single inhabitant in Rome. Being arrived in Lucania, he reduced all that country, and then marched with his army towards Ravenna^b. Upon his departure, John seized on Tarentum, which he fortified with a ditch cut through the isthmus. The city of Spoletum was likewise recovered by the Romans, being betrayed to them by one Martianus, a Roman soldier, who pretended to be a deserter. Belisarius had continued all this time at Portus, about ten miles from Rome; but being informed, that Totila had bent his march towards Ravenna, and being mighty desirous of recovering once more the capital of

Italy, he led his small army thither; and, finding the city quite destitute of inhabitants, and a third part of the walls levelled with the ground, he undertook the re-peopling of the place, and began to repair the walls. He cleared the ditch round the city, which had been filled up by Totila, and, for the present, contented himself with heaping huge stones, one upon another, in the many breaches, which he had made in the wall. The whole work being finished in the space of twenty-five days, and the city supplied with great store of provisions, which Belisarius took care to have imported by water, the antient inhabitants, who had been dispersed up and down Italy, returned in flocks, and were kindly received by Belisarius, who restored to every one his own house and possessions, and promised an immunity from taxes to such as were willing to settle there. Upon this news, Totila hastened back to Rome, not doubting but, at his approach, Belisarius would abandon the place, and return to Portus, which was strongly fortified; but finding, contrary to his expectation, that the Roman general was determined not to quit the city, but to defend it to the last, he encamped at a small distance from the walls, and early next morning advanced

a in battle-array, and began the attack with incredible fury. The Romans, animated by the example of their general, defended themselves with no less valour and intrepidity; so that the fight lasted from morning to night, when the Goths, who had lost a great number of men, returned to their camp. The assault was renewed the three following days; but Totila, being constantly repulsed with great loss, abandoned the enterprize, and retired to Tibur, where he continued for some time, leaving Belisarius at full leisure to complete the fortifications of Rome; which he did accordingly, and once more sent the keys of the city to the emperor. But the Goths, who had hitherto extolled their king, and, equalling him to the greatest heroes of antiquity, had accounted themselves happy in the choice, began to complain loudly of his conduct, and, with great liberty, to blame him for not having either intirely demolished Rome, or left a strong garrison in it, to prevent its falling anew into the enemy's hands. The whole army grew so discontented, that, when he prepared to march to the siege of Perugia, they betrayed a great reluctance to follow him thither, till, in a set speech, he made an apology for his late conduct, ascribing his bad success, not to any want of foresight or neglect on his side, but to the inconstancy of fortune, which in all human affairs, but more especially in matters of war, bears a chief sway. Having thus regained the esteem and affection of his soldiers, he left Tibur, and, marching with his whole army to Perugia, he sat down before that city. Upon his departure, John, who had continued in those parts, being master of Otranto, hastened into Campania, and there set at liberty the Roman senators and their wives, after having routed a strong party of Goths, that had been left by Totila to guard them. Hereupon Totila, to be revenged on John, rising from before Perugia, hastened, over mountains, and through by-ways, into Apulia, where he then was; but, falling unadvisedly upon him in the night, the Romans, by favour of the darkness, made their escape, with the loss of no more than an hundred men, and got safe into Taranto. This was a great oversight in Totila; for, as his army was ten times their number, had he waited with patience till day-light, he might have surrounded them, and cut them off to a man. In the mean time Belisarius, having received from Constantinople a supply of twelve hundred men, sailed with them for Sicily, being informed, that Totila designed to pass over into that island, which was then quite unguarded. But Totila, instead of making any attempt upon Sicily, invested with his whole army Rusciana, a city of great strength in Calabria. Hereupon Belisarius, leaving Sicily, sailed to Otranto, where he received a second supply from Constantinople of two thousand foot, under the command of Valerianus. He then ordered John to join him with the body he commanded; and, having assembled a great number of transports, he set sail for Rusciana, with a design to relieve that place; but, finding the Goths drawn up on the shore, and ready to receive him, he abandoned the enterprize, and returned to Rome, sending John and Valerian, with part of the forces, to lay waste Picenum, and by that means oblige Totila to raise the siege of Rusciana. But the king of the Goths, pursuing the siege with more vigour than ever, detached two thousand horse into Picenum, who, being joined by the Goths in that province, obliged the Romans sent by Belisarius to retire. In the mean while the garrison of Rusciana, being reduced to great streights, and despairing of relief, submitted to Totila, who, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance they made, treated them with great humanity, receiving such of them as were willing to serve under him into his army, and suffering the rest to retire unmolested whither they pleased. Only Chalazar, who had formerly broken his word to him, he put to death, after having caused his hands and privy parts to be cut off¹.

DURING these transactions in Italy, the Persians having gained considerable advantages over the Romans, Justinian was easily persuaded by Antonia, the wife of Belisarius, to recal her husband, and employ him anew against that nation. Belisarius therefore left Italy, having rather lost the reputation he had gained by his former expedition, than acquired a greater; for, during the five years he commanded against Totila, he scarce performed any thing worthy of notice, being, as it were, in a perpetual flight, and sailing from one sea-port to another². Procopius, in his books of the Gothic war, which were published while Justinian and Belisarius were yet alive, lays the whole blame on fortune; but, in the anecdota or secret history, he, or some other writer, charges him with several mistakes, and besides, accuses him of levying vast sums on the inhabitants of Ravenna, of Sicily, and of all the places that had submitted to the Romans, on pretence of punishing them for having once sided with the Goths. He adds, that Herodian, governor of Spoletum, not being able to supply him with the money he required, renounced his allegiance to the emperor, and delivered up the place to the Goths, having no other means to redeem himself from the importunity of the avaricious and ever-craving commander. The same writer ascribes the misunderstanding between him and John, which greatly retarded the emperor's service, to Antonia, the general's wife, who, to ingratiate herself with the empress Theodora, the declared enemy of John, pressed her husband to dispatch him by some means or other; which John being apprised of, declined, as much as he could, joining or assisting him. But to return to Totila: Upon the departure of Belisarius, he returned before Perugia, which he took by storm; but, according to his custom, spared both the inhabitants and the garrison. And now the Franks, who had long continued quiet, concluding the Goths, as well as the Romans, to be greatly weakened by such a long and destructive war, thought it high time to lay hold of the opportunity, and, breaking into Italy, to seize, without distinction, on the countries belonging to both. In the very beginning of the war, the Ostrogoths, as we have related above, not able to make head at the same time against the Romans and the Franks, attempted to gain over the latter to their party, by yielding to them the provinces they held in Gaul. This Justinian was so far from opposing, that, on the contrary, carefully avoiding to give the Franks the least pretence of making war upon him, he solemnly confirmed them in the possession of the countries the Goths had yielded to them, renouncing in their behalf all claims to the said countries. Thus, adds our historian, the kings of the Franks, whom he commonly styles Germans, became masters of Marseilles, an ancient colony of the Phocæans, and of the other maritime towns, with the sea itself. And now, continues Procopius, they preside at the equestrian combats in the city of Arles, and coin the gold, which they draw from the mines of Gaul, not with the image of the emperor, as they have done hitherto, but with their own¹. Thus the Franks became lawful sovereigns of the countries formerly held by the Ostrogoths in Gaul, and behaved as such, according to the observation of Procopius, by presiding at the equestrian sports in Arles, at that time the capital of Gaul, and coining gold with their own images. But no favours, no grants, could make the Franks forget their natural treachery, or stand to their engagements, when they had the least prospect of advantage from their acting contrary to them. The Ostrogoths had yielded to them the rich countries, which they held in Gaul; Justinian had transferred to them the claim and title he had to those countries. By their treaty with the Goths, they were to assist them against the Romans; by their treaty with the Romans, they were to stand neuter; and both treaties they equally observed; for, thinking both nations greatly weakened by so long a war, they laid hold of that opportunity to fall upon both; and accordingly, entering the province of Venetia, belonging partly to the Romans, and partly to the Goths, they seized it for themselves. In the mean time Totila, having received a reinforcement of six thousand Lombards, commanded by Ildiges, one of their princes, resolved to march to Rome, and once more attempt the reduction of that city. Belisarius had left there three thousand chosen men, under the command of Diogenes, an officer of great experience, and known valour, who held out, for a considerable time, against the repeated assaults of the enemy. Totila invested the city on all sides, and, from the very beginning of the siege, made himself master of Portus; so that, all communication being cut off both by sea and land, he hoped to reduce the garrison in a short time by famine. But against this evil Diogenes wisely provided, by causing corn to be sowed within the walls; so that the town would, in all likelihood, have held out till the arrival of the promised succours from Constantinople, had it not been betrayed a second time by the Isaurians. One of the gates was guarded by a body of that nation, who, being discontented for want of their pay, which they had not received for some years, and hearing that their countrymen, who had formerly betrayed the city, had been preferred and enriched by the Goths, resolved to follow their example; and accordingly, some of them having first had a private conference with Totila, they opened, at the time agreed on, the gate which they guarded, and received him, with his whole army, into the city. As Totila had caused the trumpets to sound at the opposite

- a gate, pretending to attack the city on that side, the garrison hastened thither; so that he met with no opposition. When the inhabitants found the town was taken, they fled out at the opposite gate towards Centumcellæ, the only strong place held by the Romans in that neighbourhood; but great numbers of them, and likewise of the soldiers who took the same route, were cut off by the Goths, whom Totila had placed in ambushes on the road, not doubting but they would fly that way. Diogenes escaped with a slight wound; but Paul a Cilician, whom Belisarius had appointed to command under him, retired with a body of four hundred horse to Adrian's tomb, and possessed himself of the bridge leading to St. Peter's church, now Ponte Santi' Angelo. There they defended themselves with incredible valour against the enemy's whole army, till they had no provisions left; when they resolved to sally out, and either open themselves a way through the midst of the enemy, or die in the attempt. Having taken this resolution, they embraced and took leave of each other, as ready to die; which Totila hearing, and dreading the effects of such a desperate resolution, thought it adviseable to offer them terms. Accordingly he let them know by a messenger, that, upon their delivering up their horses and arms, and swearing never to serve more against the Goths, he was ready to grant them leave to return to Constantinople; but that, if they chose rather to stay in Italy, and serve under him, they should have all their effects restored to them, and be treated upon the same footing with the Goths. They chose at first to return to Constantinople; but afterwards, changing their mind, they listed themselves among the troops of Totila. Only Paul, and one Mindus an Isaurian, begged leave to return home; which Totila not only granted, but allowed them a safe conduct, and money to bear their charges. About three hundred more of the garrison, who had taken sanctuary in the churches, abandoning their asylum, submitted to Totila, upon his promising to spare their lives. He was formerly bent upon destroying Rome, as we have hinted above, but diverted from it by Belisarius. Now he made it his chief study to embellish the city, repairing, at a great expence, what he had formerly destroyed. He recalled the senate, and restored them to their antient rank and splendor, invited the citizens to take possession of their estates, supplied the city with plenty of provisions, and, peopling it with Goths and Italians, exhibited the Circensian games, after the manner of the Roman emperors, and presided at them in person. This, so different from his former conduct, was owing to the answer given him by the king of the Franks, when he asked his daughter in marriage, viz. that he would not dispose of his daughter to any but a king; and that Totila ought not to be looked upon as such, since he was not able to preserve the capital city, but had been obliged to demolish part of it, and abandon the rest to the enemy^m. And now Totila, once more master of Rome, dispatched ambassadors to Constantinople, with proposals for a peace, offering, upon the emperor's relinquishing Italy to him, to assist him as a faithful ally against any other nation whatsoever. But Justinian was so far from hearkening to the overture, that he would not even admit the ambassadors to his presence. Hereupon Totila, determined to pursue the war with more vigour than ever, having left a strong garrison in Rome, marched with the rest of his army to Circumcellæ, now Civita Vecchia, which he invested; but Diogenes making a vigorous resistance, it was agreed between him and Totila, that he should acquaint the emperor with his situation, and that if, by a time prefixed, he received no relief, the place should be delivered up, and thirty hostages were given. After this, he passed with his army into Sicily, and, in his passage, made an attempt upon Rhegium; but finding the place strongly garrisoned, he left part of the army to block it up, in order to reduce it by famine; and with the rest crossed over into Sicily, after having made himself master of Tarentum. As he was embarquing his forces, news was brought him, that Ariminum had been betrayed to the Goths he had left in Picenum. Having crossed the streights, he landed without opposition at Messina; but, not being able to reduce that city, he laid waste the neighbouring country, destroying all with fire and sword. In the mean time the garrison of Rhegium, being reduced to the last extremity for want of provisions, submitted upon terms, and delivered up the city to the troops left by Totila before itⁿ.

nephew Germanus general against the Goths in Italy, allowing him a large sum to raise a troops in Thrace and Illyricum, whence he was to march into Italy with Pbilimuth commander of the Heruli, and John then general of Illyricum. As Germanus was a man of a generous temper, and greatly beloved by the soldiery, he soon raised a very considerable army, not only the Romans, but the barbarians, flocking to him from all parts. With this army, the best the emperor had ever sent into Italy, he hoped to add to the reputation, which he had lately acquired against the Vandals in Africa, the glory of driving the Goths out of Italy, and reuniting that country to the empire. This, he thought, he might the more easily accomplish, as he had married Mata-suntha, the daughter of Amalasuntha, and grand-daughter of Theodoric, who, he hoped, would draw great numbers of the Goths over to his party; for he designed to take her with him into Italy. The Goths were greatly dispirited, when they heard, that a general of consummate experience, universally beloved by the soldiery, and so nearly allied to Theodoric, whose memory they adored, was to command against them. On the other hand, the Romans began to take courage anew, and such of them as had been dispersed by their frequent defeats, assembling in one body on the borders of Istria, waited his arrival there. And now Germanus, having drawn together all his forces in the neighbourhood of Sardica, ordered them to be ready within three days to march into Italy. But Providence had otherwise disposed of affairs; for Germanus was suddenly seized with a violent distemper, which, in a few days, put an end to his life, and all his great designs. The emperor, upon the news of his death, which gave him the utmost concern, ordered Justin, the son of Germanus; and John, who had married his daughter, to lead the army into Italy. But as the winter approached, and they wanted ships to convey the troops thither by sea, they marched into Dalmatia, and there put them into winter-quarters, taking up their own in Salona. In the mean time Totila, having laid waste great part of Sicily, sat down with his army before Syracuse; but Liberius, whom Justinian had sent with a squadron to protect that coast, having forced his way into the haven, relieved the garrison with a considerable supply both of men and provisions. However, Totila pursued the siege with great vigour, though valiantly opposed by the Romans within, who, hearing that Artabanes was coming to their relief with a mighty fleet, would hearken to no terms. But the fleet being dispersed on the coast of Calabria by a violent storm, and Artabanes driven to the island of Malta, where, with much difficulty, he saved himself, Liberius, despairing of relief, abandoned Syracuse to the enemy, and conveyed the garrison by sea to Palermo. And now Totila, having no enemy in Sicily to oppose him, intirely reduced that island, and, leaving four strong garrisons in it to awe the inhabitants, he returned to Italy, loaded with booty. Early in the spring, Justin and John, who had passed the winter in Salona, having drawn together their forces, set out on their march to Ravenna. But in the mean time the Slavi, passing the Danube, either at the instigation of Totila, or prompted by a desire of booty, broke into the Roman provinces, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. This greatly retarded the march of the army, the Roman generals being obliged to send strong detachments against them; which in the end obliged them to repass the Danube, and return home. But, before the two generals reached the confines of Italy, they received orders from the emperor to proceed no farther, but to wait the arrival of Narses, whom he had appointed commander in chief of all his forces in those parts with an absolute and uncontrouled authority. But, while Narses was making the necessary preparations for his intended expedition, Totila, having equipped a fleet of three hundred galleys, sent them to pillage the coasts of Greece, where they got an immense booty. They made a descent upon the island of Corfu; and, having laid it waste, they sailed to Epirus, where they surprised and plundered the cities of Nicopolis and Anchialus, and took upon the coast many ships, and some among the rest laden with provisions for the army of Narses. At the same time Totila blocked up the city of Ancona by sea and land, and by that means soon reduced it to great streights; which Valerianus, who was then in Ravenna, being well apprised of, he acquainted John, who, pursuant to the emperor's orders, was waiting the arrival of Narses in Dalmatia, with the condition the city was in, earnestly soliciting him to hasten to the relief of the only place the emperor had in those parts, and promising to join him with all the forces under his command. John had been ordered not to stir

- a from Dalmatia till the arrival of Narfes; but, venturing on this occasion to disobey his orders, he put the flower of his army on board forty vessels, and sailed with them to Ancona, where Valerianus joined him with a Squadron of twelve ships more. Upon their appearing before Ancona, the Goths, having manned forty-seven of their best ships, sailed out against them; whereupon an engagement ensued, in which the Goths, quite ignorant of sea affairs, were utterly defeated, thirty-six of their ships being taken or sunk, with all the men on board, and the rest driven ashore, where they were set on fire by the Goths themselves, lest they should fall into the enemy's hands. The Goths, after this defeat, broke up the siege, and, retiring in great haste, left their camp, and part of their baggage, to the Roman generals, who, having reinforced the garrison, returned, Valerianus to Ravenna, and John to Salonæ. At the same time Artabanes, having assembled his fleet, which, as we have related above, had been dispersed by a storm, landed in Sicily, and, every-where driving out the Goths, recovered all the castles held by them in that island. These losses disheartened the Goths, and Totila himself, to such a degree, that he once more dispatched ambassadors to Constantinople, offering to yield Sicily and Dalmatia to the emperor, to pay an annual tribute for Italy, and to assist the Romans as a faithful ally in all their wars. But Justinian, bent upon driving the Goths out of Italy, ordered the ambassadors to return home, without suffering them to appear in his presence ^a.
- b Totila, finding Justinian would hearken to no terms, began to levy new forces and make vast preparations both by sea and land. Having equipped a considerable fleet, he sent it against Corseca and Sardinia, both which islands were soon reduced. On the other hand, the city of Croton in Calabria, which had been long besieged by the Goths, was relieved by the garrison of Thermopylae in Greece, conveyed by sea into Italy. But now Narfes drew near at the head of a formidable army, bringing with him an immense treasure to supply the wants of the troops, and to pay the emperor's forces in Italy their arrears, which had been due ever since the beginning of the war. His army consisted not only of Romans levied by him in Thrace and Illyricum, but of barbarians, who had flocked to him from all parts. Besides, Auduin king of the Lombards, sent him a body of five thousand chosen men; Philimuth, prince of the Heruli, joined him with three thousand of his countrymen; Aruth, another prince of the same nation, came to his assistance at the head of a chosen body of veterans. A great number of Gepidae, Hunns, Persians, &c. cheerfully followed his banner, some in acknowledgment of his former favours, (for he had been always kind to the barbarians) and others in expectation of spoil and booty; for they were all convinced, that the Goths could not make head against so numerous an army, commanded by a general of great valour, and consummate experience. Narfes, on his entering Dalmatia, was joined by John, and the army under his command; but being advanced as far as the confines of Venetia, the Franks, who, as we have related above, had seized on that province, refused him a passage; so that, not caring, at so critical a conjuncture, to provoke that nation, by the advice of John, who was well acquainted with those parts, he changed his route, and, marching along the sea-coast, he got safe, with his whole army, to Ravenna, where he was joined by the remainder of the Roman forces, under the command of Valerianus and Justin. Having staid nine days in Ravenna to refresh his army, and appointed Justin governor of that city, he began his march towards Rome. Being arrived at Ariminum, Ufdrilas, governor of the place, sallied unexpectedly out upon him with part of the garrison, as he was looking for a ford, attended by a small guard; but a party of Heruli coming seasonably up, put the Goths to flight, and killed Ufdrilas in the pursuit. The Romans might have easily made themselves masters of the city, the garrison being greatly disheartened by the death of their governor; but Narfes, pursuing his main design, and avoiding every thing that could retard it, proceeded on his march, the Goths suffering him to pass the river undisturbed. He left the Via Flaminia, being informed, that a strong body of Goths guarded the narrow pass in the mountains called Petra Periusa, now the Furlo, and, turning to the left, pursued his march towards Rome. In the mean time Totila, having assembled all his forces in the neighbourhood of that city, marched through Tuscany towards the Apennine, and, having reached that mountain, encamped at a village called Tagiria, with a design to give the Romans battle upon the first advantage that offered. He had scarce formed his camp, when Narfes came to

morable for the defeat of the Gauls by Camillus, and was called Busta Gallorum, because the Gauls slain by him were buried there. Narfes, upon his arrival, dispatched a messenger to Totila, advising him not to contend with the whole strength of the empire, commanding the messenger at the same time, if he found Totila bent upon war, to bid him appoint a day for a pitched battle. Totila, without betraying the least fear, told the messenger, that the dispute must be decided with the sword; and that, eight days after, he would not fail to meet the Roman general. Narfes, suspecting some design in this delay, made the necessary preparations, as if he were to fight the day following: and acted therein very wisely; for the next day Totila advanced with his whole army in order of battle. Narfes had in the night detached fifty men b to seize on an eminence at a small distance; which they did accordingly. But Totila, equally desirous to gain it, sent several detachments of horse, one after the other, to dislodge them. The Romans stood their ground, and, being animated by the example of their leader, named Paul, who behaved with unparalleled bravery, they continually repulsed the enemy, and obliged them in the end to give over the attempt, though far superior to the Romans in number, and supported by fresh supplies. While both armies stood in battle-array, waiting the signal, a Goth, by name Cocas, who had formerly served in the emperor's army, advancing before the ranks, challenged any on the Roman side to a single combat. The challenge was readily accepted by one Anzelas an Armenian, who slew his insulting adversary at the first c encounter; and, returning to his companions, was received with joyful shouts by the whole army, who looked upon his success as an omen of their future victory.
Totila, being informed, that a body of two thousand horse, whom he had long expected, were near at hand, in order to gain time, desired an interview with Narfes;
but, before the place was agreed on where they were to meet, the two thousand horse joined the army; and then Totila drew off his troops, and ordered them to refresh themselves, as if he did not intend to engage that day, it being already noon; but soon after, he suddenly led them out against the enemy, hoping, by so unexpected an onset, to surprise them. But Narfes, who suspected his design, and therefore had kept his men in battle-array, received him with great resolution. Both armies d fought for some time with a fury hardly to be expressed; but in the end the Gothic horse being put to the rout, and retiring in great confusion among the foot, their infantry was by that means thrown into such disorder, that they could never afterwards rally. Narfes, observing the enemy's army thus disordered, encouraged his men to make a last effort; which the Goths not being able to withstand, they betook themselves to flight, leaving six thousand of their men dead on the spot. Totila, finding the day irrecoverably lost, fled, attended only by five horsemen; but was pursued, and mortally wounded, by a commander of the Gepidae, named Asbades.
However, he continued his flight till he arrived at a place called Capra, where he halted, and had his wound dressed; but he expired soon after, and was privately buried by those who attended him in his flight. As Asbades, who gave him the mor- e tal wound, did not know him, the report of his death was not believed by the Ro- mans, till a Gothic woman having discovered the place where he was buried, they opened the grave, and viewed the body. Thus Procopius. But other writers tell us, that Totila was mortally wounded in the engagement; that he withdrew to have his wound dressed, but died under the cure; and that his men missing him, and concluding he was killed, betook themselves to a precipitous flight. Totila is highly commended by all the writers of those times, not only for his valour, but for his humanity, temperance, moderation, and, above all, for his justice and equity. Upon his accession to the throne, he found the affairs of the Goths in a most deplorable condition; but brought them, in the eleven years he reigned, almost to the same state, f in which Theodoric had left them. Totila, says Paulus Diaconus, though a Goth, lived with the Romans like a father with his children, without making the least alteration in their laws, or form of government. Procopius, though a Greek, and consequently no friend to the Goths, could not help extolling, on several occasions, his mildness and clemency to the vanquished. The same writer often commends him as a great lover of justice and equity. In the many cities he reduced, he took particular care, that no affront should be offered to the women; and even put to death one of his

- a officers for abusing the daughter of a Roman in Calabria, though he was a man of known valour, and the whole army interceded in his behalf: his estate, which was very considerable, he bestowed on the woman, to make some amends for the affront that had been offered her. In short, all the writers who speak of Totila, represent him as a person endued with every good quality becoming a prince.

SUCH of the Goths as had the good luck to escape the swords of the Romans, fled over the Po, and assembling at Ticinum, now Pavia, chose Teia for their king. He was deservedly esteemed one of the most valiant men of their nation, and had, on several occasions, distinguished himself in a most eminent manner. His first care was to assemble the Goths, who, after the late defeat, had taken refuge in the several strong-holds beyond the Po. Having secured the treasure, which his predecessor had left in Pavia, he endeavoured to draw the Franks to his assistance by the offer of a large sum, and by representing to Theodebald their king, that, if the Romans once recovered Italy, they would, in the next place, attempt, under some specious pretence, to drive them out of Gaul, to which they had no better claim, than the Goths had to Italy. The speech, which the ambassadors of the Goths made on this occasion to Theodebald, has been transmitted to us by *Agathias*¹, and is well worth perusing. But the Franks, says Procopius, could not be prevailed upon to lend the Goths any assistance, chusing rather to seize on Italy for themselves, than to employ their arms in securing it either to the Goths, or the *Romans*².

- b In the mean time Narfes, informed that the Goths had raised Teia to the throne, and that he was assembling his countrymen beyond the Po, detached Valerianus, with part of the army, to watch their motions, and prevent, if possible, their uniting, while he himself marched with the rest towards Rome. On his march, he made himself master of Narnia, Spoletum, and Perugia; and then, approaching Rome, invested it with his whole army. Totila, before the arrival of Narfes in Italy, had burnt great part of the city; and, not having a sufficient number of men to guard the whole circuit of so large a place, he had surrounded with a new wall that part of it near Adrian's tomb, which seemed to him the most strong and defensible. Into this, as we may call it, fortress or castle, the Goths retired with their best effects, at the

- d approach of Narfes, leaving but a small number of men to defend the walls where they seemed weakest; so that the Romans, by the help of scaling ladders, got into the city without opposition. Then Narfes marched against the castle, which held out for some time; but the garrison, despairing of relief, surrendered in the end upon a promise from Narfes, that their lives should be spared. Thus was Rome once more recovered by the Romans, and the keys sent again to the emperor. And now the Goths, despairing of being able to maintain themselves in Italy, vented their rage on the Roman senators, killing them where-ever they fell into their hands. Such of that body as had been confined by Totila to Campania, and were now returning to Rome, upon the report, that the city was in the emperor's hands, were all murdered

- e by the Goths quartered in those parts. Totila, upon his leaving Rome to march against Narfes, had taken with him, as hostages, the children of the principal Romans, to the number of three hundred, and sent them beyond the Po; and now Teia, finding them there, ordered them all to be put to the sword. At the same time Ragnaris, a Goth, who commanded in Calabria, cut in pieces fifty Roman soldiers, who had been delivered to him as hostages. Teia, during the siege of Rome, had conveyed the best part of the royal treasures to the castle of Cumæ, and secured it there with a strong garrison. Hereupon Narfes detached from Rome, where he continued to repair the ruins in the walls, a strong detachment to besiege Cumæ, and at the same time another to attempt the reduction of Centumcellæ. But Teia, fearing the royal treasure might fall into the enemy's hands, resolved at all events to relieve the city of Cumæ, where it was lodged. Pursuant to this resolution, he drew together all his forces, and, passing the Po, bent his march through Tuscany. Narfes, informed of the route he had taken, detached the greater part of his army to keep him at bay, till Cumæ had submitted. But he, avoiding the nearest way, and fetching a great compass by the sea-coast, got, without meeting the enemy, into Campania. Hereupon Narfes, recalling his forces, marched with his whole army into Campania, with a design to oblige the Goths, if they attempted the relief of Cumæ, to come to a general engagement. Both armies encamped at the foot of mount Vesuvius, being parted by the river Draco, now Sarno, and continued there two months, Narſes not daring a either to paſs the river, the Goths being maſters of the bridge, or retire, left they ſhould relieve the city of Cumæ. But at length Narſes having erected on his ſide of the river ſeveral wooden towers, whence the Goths were galled with continual ſhowers of arrows, and, by a fleet ſent him from Sicily, cut off their communication with the ſea, they were forced, through want of proviſions, to abandon their camp, and retire to a neighbouring mountain, by Procopius called Mons Laſtarius. Thither Narſes followed them; but, not thinking it ſafe to attack them, he made himſelf maſter of all the avenues leading to the mountain, and by that means reduced them to ſuch ſtreights, that they reſolved in the end to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle.

Purſuant to this reſolution, they came down unexpectedly upon the Romans, and b Atuly battle gave a beginning to one of the moſt bloody battles, if Procopius is to be credited, that ever was fought. The Goths, like men in deſpair, exerted their utmoſt efforts; and the Romans choſe rather to die on the ſpot, than ſhamefully yield to an enemy ſo much inferior to them in number. During the action, Teia gave moſt ſurpriſing proofs of his valour and conduct, ſuch as equalled him, in the opinion of Procopius, to the moſt renowned heroes of antiquity. Being well apprized, that the whole lay at ſtake, and that the fate of Italy depended upon the ſucceſs of that day, he placed himſelf in the firſt rank, to encourage his men by his example. The Romans, diſcovering him, and knowing that his death would put an end to the diſpute, and, in all likelihood, to the war, directed their whole force againſt him, ſome attacking him c with their ſpears, and others diſcharging at him ſhowers of darts and arrows, which he received on his ſhield, killing in the mean time great numbers of the enemy, who, with all their efforts, were not able to make him retire, or yield one inch of ground. When his ſhield was ſo loaded with darts, that he could not eaſily wield it, he called for another, and, renewing the fight, made a great ſlaughter of the Romans. Thus he ſhifted his ſhield three times; but, in the third change, having left his breaſt expoſed, he was, in that moment, wounded with a javelin, and inſtantly died of the wound, falling in the place where he had ſtood from the beginning of the battle, and upon heaps of the enemy, whom he had killed with his own hand. The Romans, d ſeeing him fall, cut off his head, and, fixing it upon a long pole, carried it about, expoſed to the view of the Goths, not doubting but, diſheartened at that ſight, they would yield in the end, and retire. But, notwithſtanding the death of their king, they continued the fight, till night coming on, both armies were obliged to retire. Early next morning they engaged anew, and fought with unparallelled bravery, till night again parted them. The third day, the Goths, deſpairing of being able to overcome the Romans, ſo much ſuperior to them in numbers, reſolved to come to an agreement with them; and accordingly ſent deputies to Narſes, offering to lay down their arms, provided ſuch of them, as choſe to live in Italy, were allowed to enjoy their eſtates and poſſeſſions without moleſtation, as ſubjects of the empire; and thoſe, e who were willing to retire elſewhere, were ſuffered to carry with them all their goods and effects. Theſe terms being readily agreed to by Narſes, and the other commanders of the army, the Goths, laying down their arms, either repaired to their reſpective dwellings in Italy, or, abandoning that country, retired with their effects elſewhere, after having promiſed never to bear arms againſt the Romans. Thus ended the dominion of the Goths in Italy, in the twenty-fixth year of Juſtinian's reign, the eighteenth of the Gothic war, and of the chriſtian æra 553. after they had reigned ſixty-four years in that country from Theodoric to Teia.

SUCH of the Goths however, as had been left by Teia in the ſtrong-holds, reſuſing to ſtand to the agreement made by their countrymen, had recourſe to the Franks, f who, thinking this a favourable opportunity of ſeizing on Italy for themſelves, promiſed to aſſiſt them againſt the Romans to the utmoſt of their power. Accordingly, they entered Italy, notwithſtanding their alliance with the emperor, to the number of ſixty thouſand men, moſt of them the ſubjects of Theudebald king of Metz, under the conduct of the two brothers Lautbaris and Bucilin, giving out, that they were come to aſſiſt the Goths, but with a view to make themſelves maſters of Italy, with the aſſiſtance of thoſe whom they pretended to protect. Narſes, informed of their march, reſolved to reduce, if poſſible, before their arrival, ſuch towns as were ſtill held by the Goths. Having therefore left part of his army before Cumæ, which city

- a Teis had committed to the charge of his brother Aligern, who refused to deliver it up to the Romans, even after the agreement, he marched into Tuscan, where the cities of Volaterra, Pisa, Fesula, and several others, submitted to him; but Lucca held out with great obstinacy, the Goths there expecting to be relieved by the Franks. But the march of their pretended allies being retarded by the troops, which Narjes had sent to dispute with them the passage of the Po, the city, after three months siege, was obliged to submit. By this time Aligern, being reduced to great straits in Cuma, began to consider with himself, that if the Franks, who were coming to his assistance, should in the end drive the Romans out of Italy, the Goths would be no gainers by their victory, since it was not to be doubted, but the Franks, whose treachery was well known, instead of reinstating the Goths, would secure the country in dispute to themselves. He therefore judged it more reasonable to deliver it up to the ancient owners, than to strangers; and accordingly, opening the gates to the Romans, he put them in possession of the town, and the royal treasure of the Goths. There were still remaining seven thousand Goths, who, being headed by one Regnares, had seized on a strong-hold near Capua, called Cassinum. Against them Narjes marched with his whole army; but, finding he could not storm the place without great loss of men, he resolved to reduce it by famine. The Goths, who had laid up great store of provisions, held out all winter; but, early in the spring, Regnares demanded a conference with Narjes; which being granted him, he insisted upon such unreasonable terms, that the general dismissed him with indignation. This Regnares resented to such a degree, that, having gained a hill near the walls, he let fly an arrow at Narjes, with a design to kill him; but, having missed his aim, the general's guards sent a shower of arrows after him, with one of which being mortally wounded, he was carried by his own men into the castle, where he died two days after. The besieged, disheartened by the death of their leader, submitted, upon promise that their lives should be spared. Narjes, being admitted into the place, spared their lives, agreeable to his promise; but, to prevent their raising any further disturbance in Italy, he sent them all to Constantinople. As for the Franks, who had entered Italy under the conduct of Leutharis and Bucelinus, their numerous army was intirely destroyed, partly by the sword, and partly by sickness, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place; so that now all Italy was anew brought under subjection to the emperor, and united to the eastern empire, some of the Goths retiring elsewhere, but most of them remaining in Italy, where they continued to enjoy, pursuant to their agreement with Narjes, the lands and possessions which they held there. Narjes, who had delivered that country from the dominion of the Goths, was appointed by Justinian to govern it as a province of the eastern empire, which he did, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants, till the year 568. when he was recalled by the emperor Justin II. the successor of Justinian, at the instigation of his wife Sophia, and Longinus was sent to govern Italy in his room. As Longinus introduced a new form of government, we shall, in a few words, acquaint the reader with the alterations he made, and then proceed to the history of the Lombards, with which that of the exarchs, the successors of Longinus, is inseparably interwoven. The provinces of Italy had, ever since the time of Constantine the Great, been governed by consulares, correctores, and præsides, no alteration in the government having been made, either by the emperors who succeeded Constantine, or by the kings of the Goths. But Longinus, being sent to succeed Narjes with an absolute power and authority, suppressed those magistrates, and, in their room placed, in each city of note, a governor, whom he distinguished with the title of duke. The city of Rome was not more honoured than any other; for Longinus, having abolished the very name of senate and consuls, appointed one to govern that metropolis with the title of duke, common to the governors of the other cities. For himself, he took the title of exarch, which, by the Greeks, was given to those who presided over a diocese, and consequently over the many provinces, of which the diocese was composed. Thus likewise in the ecclesiastic hierarchy, which was formed upon the model of the civil government, the bishop, who was put over one single province, was styled metropolitan; but he, who governed a diocese, and consequently several provinces, was distinguished with the title of exarch. This title was adopted by the successors of Longinus, who, residing, as he had done, at Ravenna, were thence called the exarchs of Ravenna. They governed all Italy, naming and removing the dukes at their pleasure, and to them the people had recourse in all matters of moment. Longinus was sent by Justin to govern all Italy; but great part of that country, in the first year of his government, was seized on by the Lombards, called in by Narses, as we have related at length elsewhere^a. This magistrate maintained the power and authority of the emperors of the east in Italy for the space of an hundred and eighty-three years, that is, from the year 568. when Longinus was sent into Italy, to the year 751. when Eutychius, the last exarch, was driven out, and Ravenna taken by Astulphus king of the Lombards. The exarchs, who governed Italy during this time, were in all seventeen, viz. Longinus, Zamaragdus, Romanus, Callinicus, Zamaragdus, Joannes Lernigius, Eleutherius, Isaaci, Theodorus, Olympius, Theodorus, Joannes, Theophylactus, Joannes Tyzocopus, Scholasticus, Paulus, and Eutychius^b. But as the Lombards were the only people that invaded Italy during their time, and with whom they waged war in defence of that country, we cannot, without repeating the same things, separately deliver their respective histories; and therefore shall now, pursuant to our plan, resume the history of the Lombards, in which the reader will find whatever has been transmitted to us concerning the exarchs, till the taking of Ravenna by Astulphus, and the end of the exarchate.

IN the foregoing chapter, we have delivered the history of the Lombards, from their first original to the death of Clephis, the successor of Alboin, and second king of Italy^a, and shall now proceed to the history of the other princes of that nation, to Desiderius their last king, taken captive by Charlemagne. The Lombards, upon the death of Clephis, who had treated them with great cruelty, resolved to be no more governed by kings; and accordingly chose none for the space of ten years, but, during that time, lived subject to their dukes, as we have related elsewhere^b. The most powerful among these dukes, uniting their forces, entered Gaul, and committed there dreadful ravages. Contran, king of Orleans, dispatched a considerable army against them, under the conduct of Amalus a patrician, who engaged them, but was cut off with the greater part of the army. After this victory, the Lombards ravaged Burgundy without controul, made a dreadful slaughter of the Burgundians, who attempted to oppose them, and then returned home, enriched with an immense booty. Encouraged with this success, they returned soon after, and, laying the country waste, advanced as far as Ebrodunum or Ambrun, where they were met by Ennius, called also Mummulus, at the head of a strong body of Burgundians, who cut them off almost to a man^c. About this time, that is, about the year 578. the Saxons, who, as we have related elsewhere^d, had attended the Lombards into Italy, and were, by an agreement with Alboinus, to share with him his future conquests, falling out with their old friends and allies, resolved to quit Italy, and return to their own country. They pretended to live quite independent of the Lombards, and in a distinct body; which the Lombards not consenting to, they left Italy with their wives and families, and took their route homewards through Gaul. But Mummulus, one of Contran's captains, meeting them on the confines, killed a great number of them, took many prisoners, and forced the rest to repass the Alps. However, they returned anew, and having, with a considerable sum, purchased a passage of Mummulus, who met them at the Rhône, they returned to their antient seats; but found them possessed by the Suani, who, unwilling to quarrel with them, offered them two-thirds of the lands. This offer being rejected with indignation by the Saxons, a bloody battle was fought, in which twenty thousand Saxons were killed, and on the side of the Suani only four hundred and eighty. The Saxons, who remained alive, being about six thousand in number, renewed the battle; but were again defeated, and obliged to submit to the terms, which the Suani were pleased to grant them^e. But to return

- a to the Lombards: Three of their dukes, viz. Amo, Zaban, and Rhodanus, notwithstanding the overthrow their countrymen had lately received in Gaul, broke anew into that country, and, dividing themselves into three bodies, laid it waste far and near. But Mummulus, falling upon them before they could unite their forces, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to quit their booty, and return through by-ways into Italy. Thither a party of Franks followed them, who made themselves masters of a strong-hold in the neighbourhood of Trent, and, having killed Ragilo, who came to oppose them, pillaged the country to the very gates of Trent. But Euin, duke of that city, sallying unexpectedly out against them, cut most of them off, with their leader Gbarammicbis, and pursued the rest to the Alps, which they passed, leaving their booty behind them, and returned home^d. At the same time the Lombards extended their conquests in Italy, and, having defeated the forces of the exarch Longinus, reduced the cities of Sutri, Bommarzo, Orta, Todi, Amelia, Perugia, Luccoli, and several others of less importance. But in the mean time Tiberius, who had succeeded Justin, dying, Mauritius, who was chosen in his room, alarmed at the progress the Lombards made in Italy, resolved to put a stop to their victories, and, if possible, to drive them quite out. With this view, he recalled Longinus, whom he judged no-ways equal to such an undertaking, and sent Zamaragdus in his room, a person of great prudence, and well skilled in military affairs. Zamaragdus landed at Ravenna with a considerable army in the beginning of the year
- c 584. and, taking the field early in the spring, made himself master of Broxillus, now Brissello, a place of great strength on the Po. He likewise prevailed upon Droctulf, an officer of great experience, to revolt from the Lombards, who had raised him, though by nation a Suevian, to the rank of a duke, and to bring over with him a considerable number of men. At the same time Mauritius, concerting other measures to deliver Italy from the yoke of the Lombards, had recourse to Childebert king of the Franks, and, with a large sum, prevailed upon him to engage in the war against the Lombards. This confederacy, and the vast preparations made both by Zamaragdus and Childebert, alarmed the Lombards to such a degree, that, apprehending they should not be able to withstand two such powerful enemies, so long as they
- d continued divided, as it were, into so many petty kingdoms, they resolved to restore their antient form of government, to submit anew to the authority of one single person, and to commit to him the whole management of so dangerous a war. Pursuant to this resolution, they assembled in 585. and, with one voice, raised Autbaris, the son of Clephis, to the throne. Autbaris, with his valour and prudence, so established the kingdom of the Lombards, that, in spite of the utmost efforts of the Roman emperors, it lasted for the space of two hundred years. He had no sooner mounted the throne, than he undertook the recovery of Brissello, being resolved, as it was a place of the utmost importance, to force it, by all means, out of the enemy's hands. But Droctulf, who was in the town, and expected, if he were taken, to be
- e treated with the utmost severity by the Lombards, made such a vigorous defence, that the siege continued a long time; but the garrison being in the end reduced to great straits, Droctulf found means to withdraw in the night, and repair to Ravenna, with such of his men as were able to follow him. Autbaris, being thus master of the place, dismantled it, that it might no longer serve as a place of refuge to the enemy, in case it should fall again into their hands. After the reduction of Brissello, he put his troops into winter-quarters, the season being already far advanced, and employed himself till the following spring, partly in settling the affairs of the kingdom, and partly in making the necessary preparations for the ensuing campaign^e. In the first place, he took upon him the name of Flavius, and ordered it to be used, in imitation
- f of the Roman emperors, by all the Lombard kings his successors^f. In the second place, considering that the dukes, who, for the space of ten years, had ruled with an absolute sway over their respective dukedoms, would not willingly part with all their authority, he allowed them to continue in their governments; but obliged them to contribute one moiety of their revenues towards the maintenance and support of his royal dignity, suffering them to dispose of the other as they pleased. He reserved to himself the supreme dominion and authority, and took an oath of the dukes, that, in time of war, they would readily assist him to the utmost of their power. Tho' he could remove the dukes at his pleasure, yet he deprived none of their dukedoms, except in cases of treason, nor gave them to others, but when their male issue failed ^a. And this was the origin of the fiefs in Italy. Some have imagined, that fiefs were first introduced by the Lombards, and, in imitation of them, adopted by other nations. But they are therein certainly mistaken, since it is manifest from Aimoinus ^b and Gregory of Tours ^c, that fiefs had been introduced into Gaul by the Franks some years before the reign of Autbaris, who first established them in Italy. Gregory of Tours tells us, that in the year 574. that is, eleven years before Autbaris was raised to the throne, king Guntan deprived one Erpon of his dukedom, and created another in his room ^d. Paulus Æmilius and Cujacius observe, that, when dukedoms were first instituted in Gaul, the king removed the dukes at his pleasure; but that a custom afterwards obtained, that they were not to be removed, unless convicted of treason, or some other enormous crime. At last the kings, by an oath, confirmed them in the dukedoms, which at first they held only during pleasure ^e. Thus were fiefs first introduced by the Franks into Gaul, and a few years after by the Lombards, in imitation of the Franks, into Italy ^f. However, it must be owned, that fiefs, in some degree, owe their origin to the Roman emperors, who, for the greater security of the frontiers of the empire, used to grant to the officers and soldiers lands on the confines, as a reward for their long service. By this grant, which was called beneficium, the soldiers were encouraged to defend, with all their might, the frontiers of the empire, since they defended, at the same time, their lands and estates ^g. All the customs and laws, which were afterwards introduced and published concerning fiefs, are owing to the Lombards, who gave them a certain and regular form; so that, among all other nations, successions, acquisitions, investitures, and every thing else relating to fiefs, were regulated by the customs and laws of the Lombards. Hereupon a new body of laws sprung up, which were called feudal laws, and still are in some provinces of Italy, especially in the present kingdom of Naples, the chief part of the jurisprudence. But to return to Autbaris: Having settled matters with the dukes in the manner we have related above, he enacted several wholesome and seasonable laws against theft, rapine, murder, adultery, and other crimes, which, at that time, prevailed among his subjects. He was the first of the Lombard kings, who, renouncing paganism, embraced the christian religion; and his example was followed by most of his subjects. But as they were all instructed by Arian bishops, they continued long infected with that heresy; which occasioned great disputes between them and the orthodox bishops of the cities subject to them. ^d

Franks, enters Italy; but is

Autbaris to re-

Autbaris, having settled the affairs of his kingdom during the winter, received news early in the spring, that Childebert king of the Franks had, pursuant to his agreement with the emperor Mauritius, passed the Alps at the head of a powerful army. Hereupon, being well apprised, that he had not sufficient strength to withstand him in the field, he ordered his dukes to provide their cities with strong garrisons, and to wait on their walls the arrival of the enemy, sending at the same time ambassadors to Childebert, with rich presents, to sue for peace. This conduct was attended with the wished for success; for Childebert, considering it would prove a very tedious and difficult undertaking to lay siege to so many cities, accepted the presents sent him by Autbaris, and returned home. Of this the emperor Mauritius loudly complained, and, reproaching Childebert with breach of faith, insisted upon his returning the money he had received, viz. fifty thousand solidi, for making war on the Lombards, if he did not, within a time prefixed, perform his engagements. Hereupon Childebert, unwilling to return the money, and, on the other hand, thinking himself bound in honour to perform some remarkable service in favour of his ally worthy of so large a sum, raised a far more numerous army than he had before; and, having supplied them with every thing necessary for the expedition, he ordered them to march, under the conduct of his best generals, into Italy. Autbaris had formerly, as we have related above, declined coming to a battle, and, acting only defensively, had kept his troops within the fortified towns. But now, considering, that if he should have the good luck to crush so powerful an enemy, other nations, as well as the Franks, would be thereby deterred from invading his dominions, he resolved to alter his conduct, and meet the enemy in the open field. With this view, he drew together all the forces he

- 1 had, and, having encouraged them with a seasonable speech, he marched in quest of the enemy, and offered them battle. The challenge being readily accepted by the Franks, a bloody engagement ensued; in which both armies fought with a fury hardly to be expressed; but the Franks were in the end utterly defeated. The Lombards pursued them in their flight with great slaughter, and obliged such of them as had the good luck to escape, to take refuge among the barren mountains, where most of them perished with hunger and cold; so that very few of them got safe to their own country. Childebert, to revenge the loss of this army, sent another, twenty thousand men strong, under the conduct of Anduald, Oto, and Cedinus, three generals of known valour, and long experience in war. Oló laid siege to a strong castle called Blisio, where he was killed with an arrow, and most of his men cut off in a sally by the besieged. Cedinus took some strong-holds in Cisalpine Gaul, now Lombardy. And Anduald, advancing as far as Verona, laid some open places in ashes, carrying with him the inhabitants into captivity; contrary to the articles of the treaty between him and the emperor. But in the mean time distempers beginning to rage among the Franks, occasioned by the hot season, and want of provisions, and the Lombards keeping, as they had done formerly, within their fortified towns, the generals of the Franks thought it advisable to return home, lest the Lombards should fall upon them, after their army had been considerably weakened by the distempers that daily swept off great numbers. On their return, they were reduced to such straits, that they were forced first to sell their clothes, and at last their arms, to purchase provisions. Autharis, thus delivered from all fear of so powerful an enemy, resolved to employ his whole strength in subjecting such provinces of Italy, as were still held by the Romans. He had already made himself master of all the hither Italy, except the dukedom of Rome, and the exarchate, which was at that time governed by Romanus, who had succeeded Zamaragdus, and comprised the present Bolognese, Romagna, the duchy of Urbino, and great part of Picenum, now La Marca. The provinces, which make up the present kingdom of Naples, were still in the hands of the Romans, the chief cities being governed, according to the form of government which Longinus had introduced, by their dukes, who were all immediately under the exarch. But the most powerful among them, viz. the dukes of Naples, Surrento, Amalfi, Taranto, and Garni, despising the exarchs, ruled almost with an absolute way; which has induced some to imagine, that these cities were absolutely free; whereas nothing is more certain in history, than that they acknowledged the emperor for their sovereign, tho' they often refused to obey the exarch. As these provinces lay at a great distance from Pavia, the royal seat of the Lombards, and could receive speedy succours by sea, in case they were attacked, the emperors kept but small garrisons in the cities, being obliged to employ all the forces they could spare in the Persian war, which lay heavy upon them at the same time. Of this Autharis was well apprised, and therefore, leaving Rome and Ravenna behind him, which were defended by numerous garrisons, in the spring of the year 589. he appointed his troops to rendezvous at Spoleto, and, pretending to march elsewhere, turned all on a sudden, and entered Samnium, which province, together with the city of Benevento, he reduced almost without opposition. Encouraged with this success, he over-ran all Calabria, and, advancing as far as Rhegium on the farthest point of Italy, he rid into the sea, and striking with his lance a pillar, that stood near the shore. Thus far, said he, shall the bounds of the Lombards extend. This pillar was still standing in the days of our historians, and known by the name of Autharis's pillar. Autharis, on his return into Samnium, reduced that province to a dukedom, appointing Zoto, or Zotto, first duke of Benevento, which he made the metropolis of Samnium. Thus to the two famous dukedoms of Prinli and Spoleti was added a third, which, in process of time, became as much superior to the other two, as they exceeded the other dukedoms of Italy. Some authors, and among the rest Camillus Peregrinus, are of opinion, that the dukedom of Benevento was founded before the time of Autharis; but all agree, that Zotto was the first who governed that city and province with the title of duke. This dukedom, by degrees, extended its limits, so as to comprise the far greater part of the present kingdom of Naples. Autharis, after the reduction of Samnium, resolved to carry the war into the exarchate and the dukedom of Rome; but, apprehending he might be diverted anew by Childebert king of the Franks from pursuing his conquests, he thought it adviseable to conclude a peace, if possible, with so troublesome and powerful an enemy. Accordingly, he dispatched ambassadors to Guntran, uncle to Childebert, hoping, by his mediation, to lay the foundations of a lasting peace with the king of the Franks. Guntran readily interposed; but Autbaris did not live to see the success of the mediation, being in the mean time taken off by poison. He died in Pavia on the thirteenth of September 590. after having reigned about six years; but the author of his death was never known^a. Autbaris had married Theudelinda, the daughter of Garibald, king of the Boioarians; but, as he had no children by her, the Lombards, upon the news of his death, assembled in Pavia to chuse a new king; but, not being able to agree among themselves in the choice, they referred the whole affair to Theudelinda, having first settled among themselves, that the person she should chuse among the dukes for her husband, should be invested with the royal dignity; so great was the opinion they had of the wisdom and prudence of that excellent princess, who, to shew herself worthy of the confidence they reposed in her, after having consulted the wisest men of the nation, by their advice, bestowed herself and the kingdom on Agilulf duke of Turin, a person of extraordinary merit, and nearly related to the late king. Her choice being applauded by the whole nation, Agilulf, after his marriage, was crowned king of the Lombards in a full assembly held at Milan in the month of May 591. b

In the first year of his reign died Zotto, the first duke of Benevento, of whom we find nothing in history worthy of notice, except his plundering and destroying the famous monastery of Monte Casino, built about sixty years before by St. Benedict, and already wonderfully enriched with the donations of several princes^c. Upon his death, Agilulf appointed Arechis, cousin to Gilulphus duke of Friuli, to succeed him in the dukedom of Benevento. The dukes, according to the regulations introduced by Autbaris, could only in cases of treason be deprived of their dukedoms; and, upon their death, they were succeeded by their male issue, if the king judged them capable of so great a command. If the duke died without issue male, the king was at full liberty either to chuse another in his room, or to suppress the dukedom: and truly several dukedoms were suppressed by the present king, the dukes having attempted to shake off all dependency, and to usurp an absolute power in their respective districts. d
The example of Agilulf was followed by his successors, who, declining to appoint new dukes in the room of those who died without issue male, reduced, by degrees, the dukedoms to a very small number. During the government of Arechis, which lasted for the space of fifty years, that is, from the year 591. to 641. the bounds of the dukedom of Benevento were greatly extended; for, at that prince's death, they reached on one side to the city of Naples, and on the other to Sipontum, at the foot of mount Garganus in Apulia. But to return to Agilulf: He was, soon after his election, persuaded by Theudelinda, who had been brought up in the catholic religion, to renounce the errors of Arius; and his example was followed by great numbers of his subjects, some of them abjuring paganism, and others the doctrine of Arius, to embrace the orthodox faith. Hence Theudelinda is highly commended by Gregory the Great, who inscribed to her the four books of the lives of the saints, which he had composed. She had done all that lay in her power to induce Autbaris, her first husband, to profess the catholic faith; but to no purpose, that prince refusing to quit the religion in which he had been brought up^e. Agilulf, in the third year of his reign, was forced to turn his arms against his own countrymen; for two of the dukes, viz. Minulf duke of the island of St. Julian, and Gaidulf duke of Bergamo, revolting from him, claimed an absolute authority in their respective districts. Agilulf marched against them, and, having found means to get Minulf into his power, he put him to death, because he had formerly revolted to the Franks, and joined Childebert in the irruption he made into Italy. As for Gaidulf, he besieged him in the city of Pergamo; but, upon his suing for peace, and submitting, he received him again into favour. About the same time Ulfaris, another duke, but of what place, we are not told, refusing to acknowledge the authority of Agilulf, raised great disturbances, which were quelled not without bloodshed; but Ulfaris not only obtained his pardon, but was confirmed by the king in his dukedom^f. While the arms of Agilulf were thus employed against the rebellious dukes, Romanus, who, as we have related above, had succeeded Zamagadus in the exarchate, laying hold of so favourable an opportunity, broke the truce cities. Hereupon the king, drawing together all his forces, marched against the exarch, who, at his approach, retired to Ravenna, leaving small garrisons in the towns he had taken. Upon his retreat, Agilulf easily recovered the cities he had seized. Only Which are re-

Agilulf. the city of Perugia held out for some time, being defended by Maurisus duke of the place, who had delivered it up to the Romans; but in the end the city was forced to surrender. Maurisus attempted to make his escape, but was taken, and, by the king's order, put to death². From Perugia Agilulf marched into the Roman dukedom, and, having laid it waste, encamped with his army at a small distance from the city; but Theudelinda, at the earnest request of Gregory the Great, then bishop of
- b Rome, prevailed upon her husband to grant a peace to the inhabitants of that city, and retire³. The prisoners taken by the Lombards on this occasion, were all ransomed by Gregory the Great, the other catholic bishops generously contributing to so good a work⁴. Paulus Diaconus takes no notice of the ravages committed by the Lombards in the dukedom of Rome; but supposes them to have returned to Pavia after the taking of Perugia. However, from the letters of Gregory the Great, who flourished at that time, it is manifest, that they invaded the Roman dukedom, and laid it waste with fire and sword, for several months together. From a letter of this bishop to the empress Constantina it appears, that the inhabitants of those parts suffered more The emperor's
- c in particular were loaded with such taxes, as obliged them to sell even their children, in order to raise money for the collectors; and that thereupon they repaired in great numbers to the Lombards in Italy, leaving the island, in a manner, desolate. In Sicily one Stephen, sent from Constantinople to guard the coasts of that island, committed such rapines, so many acts of violence and injustice, as hardly could be contained, says our prelate, in one volume. He therefore earnestly intreats the empress to acquaint her husband with these grievances, that, by speedily redressing them, he may avert the judgments, that must otherwise fall upon him and his family. He concludes his letter by telling her, it were far better Italy should want supplies of money, than that they should be raised in so scandalous a manner; and that the emperor's
- d ministers, being at so great a distance from their master, promised themselves impunity, though guilty of the greatest extortions; and therefore defeated all his endeavours for concluding a peace with the Lombards, which, they knew, would take away all pretence of levying such heavy taxes⁵. A peace however was soon after concluded, by means of the holy prelate, between Agilulf and the exarch Callinicus, who, upon the death of Romanus, had been sent from Constantinople to succeed him. At the same time Theodebert, the successor of Childebert, was in the end persuaded, not only to conclude a peace, but to enter into an alliance, with the king of the Lombards. Agilulf con-

- e civil war. These were Zangrulf duke of Verona, Gaidulf or Gandulf duke of Bergamo, and Warnecaut a third duke, but of what place, we are not told. Agilulf, marching against them, gave them a total overthrow; and, having taken them prisoners, he ordered them all three to be put to death, in order to deter, by their punishment, the other dukes from following their example. While he was yet engaged in this domestic war, the exarch Callinicus, with a manifest breach of treaty, which had been lately concluded, surprised the city of Parma, in which he found a considerable treasure, and took the king's daughter, and her husband Godescalc prisoners. This breach of faith in the exarch provoked the king of the Lombards to such a degree, that he resolved to pursue the war, which had been thus begun by the Romans, with
- f the utmost vigour, and not to lay down his arms, till he had driven them, if possible, quite out of Italy. Pursuant to this resolution, he entered into an alliance with Cba-gan king of the Avars, who was to make a powerful diversion in Thrace, while Agilulf carried on the war in Italy. The king of the Lombards, having raised a considerable army, and finding, that the exarch declined meeting him in the field, marched from Milan, where his troops had assembled, to Cremona, which city he invested on all sides. The Roman garrison made a vigorous resistance; but, despairing of relief, they were obliged, after having held out for a month, to deliver up the place, which, by the king's orders, was levelled with the ground. mona he led his army, reinforced by a body of Sclavi sent him by his ally the king ^a of the Avars, against the cities of Padua and Mantua, which were both taken, plundered, and laid in ashes, the garrisons being allowed to retire to Ravenna, and the inhabitants to what place they thought fit. While Agilulf thus pursued his conquests in Italy, Cbagan, breaking into Thrace, committed dreadful ravages there; and, having over-run both that province, and all Mæsia, approached the imperial city with his numerous army; which alarmed the inhabitants to such a degree, that they thought of quitting Europe, and retiring with their best effects to Chalcedon, and other places in Asia. But in the mean time Cbagan was obliged to return home by a plague, which broke out in his army, and carried off seven of his sons in one day. Upon his departure, he offered to release all his prisoners, of whom he had twelve thousand, ^b at a crown a head; but his offer being rejected by Mauritius, who was a prince of a narrow, parsimonious temper, Cbagan, in great indignation, caused all the captives to be put to the sword. During this war died the exarch Callinicus, who had first begun it, as we have related above; and in his room was sent Zamaragdus to govern Italy a second time, with orders from the emperor to set at liberty the king's daughter, with her husband, and to restore the whole treasure, that had been seized by his predecessor in the city of Parma. By this obliging behaviour, Agilulf was so far won, as to grant the Romans a truce from the month of September till the following April ^b.

DURING the truce, Agilulf, having assembled the chief men of the nation at Milan, ^c declared, in their presence, his son Adalwald, or, as others call him, Aldonald, yet an infant, his colleague, and caused him to be crowned in the open circus with great solemnity. After this, the peace was renewed with Theodebert king of the Franks, whose ambassadors were present at the inauguration of the young prince, and a perpetual league concluded between the two nations. And now the truce with the Romans being expired, the Lombards began hostilities anew, seizing on two important posts, viz. Orbitum and Balneoregium; but the exarch, with twelve thousand solidi, prevailed upon the king to restore them, and to renew the truce for a whole year, which the king employed in embellishing and fortifying Ferrara, till that time an inconsiderable village, but conveniently situated on the Po, and on that account ^d surrounded by Agilulf with walls, and beautified with several stately buildings; by which means it became, by degrees, one of the most considerable cities in those parts, and has continued as such ever since. In the mean time the truce between the king and the exarch expiring, Zamaragdus prevailed upon the king to renew it for three years longer. But, notwithstanding this truce, the inhabitants of Italy did not enjoy the tranquillity they had promised themselves; for Cacanus king of the Hunns, leaving Pannonia, made a sudden irruption into the dukedom of Friuli, destroying all with fire and sword. Hereupon duke Gilulf, having drawn together what forces he could, marched out against him; but, in the battle that ensued, he was overpowered by the enemy, and cut off, with most of his men. Cacanus, elated with this victory, ^e laid siege to Forum Julii, the metropolis of the dukedom, which was betrayed to him by Romilda, the deceased duke's widow, upon his promising to marry her; for she is said to have been greatly taken with the comeliness of the young prince in seeing him from the walls; but he, instead of performing his promise, caused her to be put to an ignominious death, after having abused her himself, and caused her to be in like manner abused by several of his soldiers, to gratify, as he said, her vicious inclination. The duke's sons, Tato, Caco, Rodoald, and Grimoald, found means to make their escape on horseback; but the latter, being yet a child, was overtaken by some of the enemy's horse, and delivered to the custody of one of them, while the others pursued the rest. But while the Hunn rid before him leading his horse, he all on a ^f sudden gave him such a blow on the head with his sword, that he left him dead on the spot, and then riding full speed, overtook his brothers, and, together with them, reached a neighbouring castle. The Hunns, upon their departure, carried with them all the inhabitants who had fallen into their hands, giving out, that they designed to allot them lands in Pannonia; but, having reached the confines, they put all the men to the sword, and carried the women and children into captivity ^c. While the Hunns were thus ravaging the dukedom of Friuli, great disturbances happened in Ravenna; for Joannes Lemigius, who had been sent by the emperor Heraclius to succeed Zama-

- a ragdus in the exarchate, levying heavier taxes on the people than they had formerly paid, the multitude, rising all on a sudden, broke into the palace, and there tore the exarch to pieces, together with the judges, whom he had called together for the administration of justice. When news of this mutiny was brought to Naples, Joannes Compositus, who governed that city for the emperor with the title of duke (S), thought he could not have a more favourable opportunity of shaking off all dependence, and making himself absolute lord of the city committed to his charge. Accordingly, he caused himself to be acknowledged by the inhabitants for their prince, and provided the city with a strong garrison, not doubting but forces would be soon dispatched against him either from Ravenna or Constantinople. And truly Heraclius, upon the first notice he had of the murder of the exarch, and the rebellion of the duke, appointed Eleutherius his chamberlain, a person highly esteemed for his prudence and valour, to succeed Lemigius in the exarchate, injoining him to appease the mutiny in Ravenna, and then march, with all the troops under his command, against Compositus, the rebellious duke of Naples. Eleutherius, arriving at Ravenna, punished with death such as he found guilty of the murder of his predecessor; and, having thus quelled the tumult, he set out on his march for Naples, with all the troops he could assemble. He took his route through Rome, where he was received with high demonstrations of joy by the inhabitants, who were greatly attached to the emperors, and bore an utter aversion to the Lombards. From Rome the exarch pursued his march to Naples, where he was, for some time, vigorously opposed by the garrison; but having in the end made himself master of the city, he put the duke to death, and, appointing another in his room, he returned to Ravenna (T). During these disturbances, Agilulf died in the twenty-fifth year of his reign. He was the first of the Lombard kings who embraced the catholic faith; and his example being followed by great numbers of his subjects, the Lombards, by that means, became less odious to the inhabitants of Italy, and their government more tolerable. By the advice of his queen Theudelinda, he rebuilt the churches, which had been ruined in the former wars, repaired the monasteries, and enriched both with large possessions, there being few

(S) The present kingdom of Naples was, at this time, held partly by the Romans, and partly by the Lombards. The dukedom of Benevento was governed by its own duke, who was subject to the king of the Lombards; Apulia, Calabria, Lucania, the country of the Bruttii, the dukedoms of Naples, Gaeta, Surrento, Amalfi, and other smaller dukedoms, were governed by their dukes, according to the new polity introduced by Longinus the first exarch. These dukes were subject to the exarch, and he to the emperor. The dukedom of Naples had at first very narrow bounds; for it comprised only the city of Naples, and its territory. But it was greatly enlarged by the emperor Mauritius, who added to it the islands of Ischia, Nisida, and Procida, and afterwards the cities of Cume, Stabia, Surrento, and Amalfi (1); which were comprised under the dukedom of Naples till the time of pope Adrian and Charles the Great, as is evident from a letter of that pope quoted by the learned Camillus Pellegrinus (2). This dukedom being, by such additions, become a province, the name of Campania was given it, and the duke took the title of dux Campaniæ, or duke of Campania; which title Gregory the Great often bestows on Scolasticus and Gudiscalcus, dukes of Naples (3). This dukedom held out against the Lombards, after they had reduced almost all the cities in that part of Italy; nay, it was never by them intirely subdued, but only obliged to pay a yearly tribute to the dukes of Benevento, who, in process of time, became very powerful. The dukes, who governed Naples, were usually appointed by the emperor himself; but, upon urgent occasions, the exarch was impowered to name a new duke. Thus Eleutherius, having put Compositus to death, appointed another in his room; and several years before, the duke of Naples being dead, and the two dukes of Benevento and Spoleto uniting their forces, with a design, as was supposed, to fall upon the dukedom of Naples, Gregory the Great, apprehending that, if the Lombards made themselves masters of that dukedom, they would easily reduce the rest of Italy, and Rome itself, wrote to John bishop of Ravenna, earnestly intreating him to represent to the exarch the danger that dukedom was in, and prevail upon him to lend, without loss of time, a new duke (4).

(T) Some modern writers tell us, that Compositus not only made himself master of Naples, but likewise of Apulia, Calabria, and several other cities, with their territories; that he caused himself to be acknowledged king of the countries he had usurped; that he was first crowned with an iron crown at Bari, and afterwards with a golden crown at Naples. They add, that the Norman princes, who reigned in Naples, following his example, were first crowned at Bari with an iron crown, and afterwards at Palermo with a crown of gold (5). But it is plain from history, that Compositus was never master of Apulia or Calabria, which at this time were held by the Lombards; and that he only seized on the city of Naples, and its territory, being taken and put to death by Eleutherius before he had time to make himself master of other places (6).

Agilulf was succeeded by his son Adalulf, whom he had taken some years before for his colleague, as we have related above. As he was yet very young, he suffered himself to be intirely governed by his mother Theudelinda, who applied herself wholly to works of piety and religion; so that, during his reign, the Lombards enjoyed a profound tranquillity. But great disturbances happened in the exarchate; for Eleutherius the exarch, elated with the success that had attended him against the duke of Naples, and forgetting that virtue and moderation, which till then had recommended him to the esteem of the emperor, and all the Romans, began to entertain thoughts of usurping the sovereignty of Italy. The great distance between him and the emperor, the authority he had in those parts, and the war with the Saracens, in which the emperor was then engaged, offered him, he thought, a favourable opportunity of accomplishing his design. Having therefore, in the first place, gained the affection of the soldiery by several popular acts of condescension, but above all by paying them their arrears, which had been long due, he resolved to set out for Rome with his whole army, and cause himself to be acknowledged there king of Italy. He was encouraged to this by the news he received of the death of Desjdedis bishop of that city; for he thought, that, while the people were busied in the election of a successor, he might, with great ease, seize on the city, and then influence the election, so as to have one of his own friends raised to the see. But on his march he was informed, that Boniface, the fifth of that name, was already elected; which obliged him to alter his measures: for having commanded the army to halt, he made them a plausible speech, inveighing against the disorders and abuses which then prevailed, promised to redress them to their satisfaction, and assured them of his favour and protection. Having by this speech attached them, as he imagined to his interest, he openly assumed the title of king, telling them at the same time, that he was marching to Rome, in order to be invested there, as in the most proper place, with the ensigns of royalty. The army was not a little surprised at the conduct of their general; but did not however openly oppose it till some days after, when, arriving at Luceoli, they began to mutiny, and, no longer looking upon Eleutherius as their general, but as a traitor and usurper, they slew him, and, sending his head to the emperor at Constantinople, returned to Ravenna^b.

The treachery of Gregory, one
officers.

Heraclius appointed Isaacius, a patrician, to govern Italy in his room. In the beginning of his administration, one Gregory a patrician, who governed for the emperor those parts, which bordered on the duchy of Friuli, pretending great kindness for Tato, who in that dukedom had succeeded his father Gisulf or Gilulf, killed by the Hunns, as we have related above, invited the youth to Optigerium, where he resided, in order to adopt him there, as he pretended, for his son. Tato, not suspecting the least treachery, readily complied with the invitation, taking with him his second brother Caco, and several other persons of distinction. But they had no sooner entered the town, than Gregory, having caused the gates to be shut, ordered his men to fall upon them. The two brothers and their followers defended themselves for some time with great courage, killing great numbers of the aggressors; but being pursued from street to street, overpowered with multitudes, and quite spent, they were in the end all cut off. Gregory, by this inhuman piece of treachery, hoped to make himself master of the whole duchy, the two remaining brothers, Rodoald and Grimoald, being yet very young. But their uncle Grafulf, informed of what had happened, hastened to Forum Julii, and, taking upon him the administration, ordered matters so, that Gregory thought it adviseable to make no further attempts. Grafulf kept the dukedom for himself, and the two brothers Rodoald and Grimoald, not thinking themselves safe while in his power, fled to Archis the second duke of Beneventum, by whom they were kindly received, and entertained in a manner suitable to their rank^c. This happened, according to some, during the exarchate of Eleutherius, and soon after the death of Agilulf^d. In the eighth year of Adalulf's reign, one Eusebius was sent by the emperor Heraclius, with the character of ambassador, to conclude a lasting peace with the king of the Lombards, and to settle other affairs of great importance. He, having gained the confidence of the king, either of his own head, or in compliance with his private instructions, presented him, as he came out of the bath, with a draught, which soon

- a deprived him of the right use of his senses, and brought him to a kind of melancholy madness. While he was in this condition, Eusebius, pretending that his nobles had entered into a conspiracy against him, advised him to put the most powerful among them to death. The king followed his advice, and immediately caused twelve of the chief nobility to be inhumanly massacred; which alarmed the rest to such a degree, that, taking up arms, they removed both him and his mother Theudelinda from the government, and raised to the throne Ariovald duke of Turin, who had married Gundeberg the sister of Adalwald. This revolution occasioned great disturbances among the Lombards, and rent their kingdom into two parties. Ariovald was supported by the nobles, who had deposed Adalwald, and all the bishops beyond the Po, who earnestly laboured to draw the rest to their party. On the other hand, Honorius, bishop of Rome, espoused with great zeal the cause of the deposed king, and left no stone unturned to have him restored to the throne, being prompted thereto by the regard he had for Theudelinda, to whose piety the catholic religion was highly indebted, and by his aversion to Arisvald, who held the tenets of Arius, and had been brought up in that persuasion. He found means to gain Isaaccius the exarch over to his party, and prevailed upon him to join the friends of Adalwald with all the troops under his command. He likewise obliged, with threats and menaces, the bishops who had espoused the cause of Ariovald, to abandon that prince, and declare for Adalwald. But, in spite of the utmost efforts both of the pope and the exarch, Ariovald maintained himself on the throne; and Adalwald dying seasonably, some say of poison, an end was put to the domestic troubles, that threatened the kingdom of the Lombards almost with utter destruction^b. Theudelinda was so affected with the misfortunes of her son, that she fell into a consumption, which, in a short time, brought her to her grave. She was a princess no less commendable for her exemplary piety, than for the excellent endowments of her mind, and worthy, on account of both, to be ranked among the most illustrious women mentioned in history. Ariovald reigned nine years after the death of Theudelinda, during which time the Lombards enjoyed a profound tranquillity both at home and abroad. Only some disturbances happened in the royal family, which gave the king no small uneasiness. One of the chief lords at court, by name Adalulf, having solicited the queen, with whom he was passionately in love, to comply with his unlawful desire, and his proposal being rejected by her with the utmost indignation, the lover, apprehending she would discover the whole to her husband, resolved to be before-hand with her, and prepossess the king against the virtuous princess. Accordingly, pretending great zeal for his safety, he assured him, that the queen was conspiring against his life with Tato duke of Etruria, who was to marry her after his death. Hereupon Ariovald, transported with rage and jealousy, without further inquiry, ordered the innocent queen to be kept under close confinement in the castle of Amellum, where she continued, till Cletair king of the Franks, pitying her condition, expostulated with her husband for thus treating one of the royal blood of the Franks, and stripping her of her dignity, upon the deposition of a single evidence. Ariovald replied, That he was fully convinced of her guilt; whereupon the ambassadors of the Franks, pursuant to their instructions, proposed the trying of the cause by a single combat between the accuser and one of the queen's friends, according to the custom that then prevailed among the Lombards, and most of the northern nations. As the king could not well reject this proposal, Adalulf was obliged to enter the lists against one Pillo, by Paulus Diaconus called Carell, who having with great ease overcome the accuser, the queen was released, and restored to her former dignity^c. Not long after, Ariovald died; and, as he left no issue male behind him, the dukes assembled, upon the news of his death, to chuse another in his room; but not being able to agree in the choice, they resolved to pay the same regard to Gundeberg, which they had formerly paid to Theudelinda, allowing her to chuse whom she pleased for her husband, and their king. Hereupon Gundeberg made choice of Rotbaris duke of Brescia, a person equal in every respect to that sublime station, but tainted with the Arian heresy; whence, in his time, there were two bishops in most cities of Italy, the one catholic, and the other Arian^d. He is no less commended by the writers of those times for his equity and moderation, than for his valour and prudence, and was the first who gave written laws to the Lombards. His example was followed by the other kings his successors; so that, in process of time,

a new volume of laws appeared, called the Longobard laws, which prevailed in all the provinces subject to that nation, that is, all over Italy, except the exarchate of Ravenna, and dukedoms of Rome, Naples, Gaeta, and Amalfi, and the maritime cities of Apulia, Calabria, and Lucania, which continued subject to the emperors, the Lombards being masters of all the other cities and provinces. The Lombards had no written laws till the time of Rotharis; but had been governed by customs handed down to them by tradition. Rotharis therefore, in imitation of the Romans and Goths, undertook the publishing of written laws; and to those he enacted, many were added by the succeeding princes. The incomparable Grotius prefers the method, which the Lombards followed in making laws, to that which was practised by the Romans themselves. Among the latter the emperor was the sole lawgiver; so that whatever pleased him, had the force of a law. But the Lombard kings did not assume that power to themselves, since their laws were enacted in public assemblies, convened for that purpose, after they had been maturely examined, and approved of by all the lords of the kingdom. From these assemblies were excluded the ecclesiastic order, and the people; so that the legislative power was lodged in the king and the nobles alone¹. Rotharis, the first lawgiver among the Lombards, having summoned, in the year 643. a general diet in Pavia, enacted, with the approbation of his nobles, several laws, which he caused to be committed to writing, and inserted in an edict. This edict, containing no fewer than three hundred and eighty-six laws, was published in the eighth year of king Rotharis's reign, that is, in the year 644. in all the provinces under his dominion, especially in the dukedom of Benevento, which was reputed at this time, as it had greatly extended its bounds, the best part of the kingdom of the Lombards. The example of Rotharis was followed by the other Lombard kings his successors, especially by Grimoald, Luitprand, Rachis, and Aistolfus; but the laws of Rotharis far exceeded in number those of the other princes (U). The reign of

(U) To the laws of king Rotharis, comprised in the above-mentioned edict, is prefixed the following preface: "Here begins the edict, which, with the advice of my principal judges, I have composed, I, in the name of God, king Rotharis, the seventh king of the nation of the Lombards, in the eighth year of my reign, and thirty-eighth year of my age, the second indiction, and, since the coming of the Lombards into the province of Italy under Alboin, at that time, by divine clemency, king, the seventy-sixth. Given at Pavia in the palace. How great our care and anxiety is, and has ever been, for our subjects, the following decree sufficiently declares." He then says, that he thought it incumbent upon him to make those laws, in order to relieve the poor from the oppression they groined under, and to restrain the insolence of the rich, and of men in power, that every one might live in peace, and enjoy his property undisturbed. He declares, that these, and no other laws, should, for the future, be in force, reserving however to himself the power of adding such other laws to them, as should be approved of by the wise men of the nation. He orders all controversies, that were not yet decided, and such as should arise after the twenty-second day of November, the day of the publication of the edict, to be determined according to the laws comprised in it; but at the same time forbids the causes already decided to be re-examined, and orders the parties to acquiesce to the sentence given by proper judges. He concludes by declaring, that no other copy or copies should be of any authority, but such as were written, revised, or approved of, by Ansfald his notary, to prevent, by that means, litigious persons from taking advantage of the mistakes, to which writers or copyists are liable (1). In the famous monastery of the Benedictines at Cava, in the kingdom of Naples, is still to be seen, amongst other monuments of antiquity, an ancient manuscript in Lombard characters, containing, besides this edict of Rotharis, the laws of the other Lombard kings, and those likewise of the French and German emperors, who were kings of Italy. In the edict of Rotharis, after the preface, come the titles of each chapter, and then the chapters or laws, in all three hundred and eighty-six, according to the order of the preceding chapters. To the laws of Rotharis, and of the other Lombard kings his successors, the Roman laws in the end gave way. Justinian indeed had taken care to have the volumes of his laws spread all over Italy, and, annulling all other laws, had ordered them alone, and the novelle constitutiones, to be observed. But, in spite of all the pains he had taken to establish them, their authority ended in Italy almost with his life; for that country being in great part reduced by the Lombards in the reign of Justin, the successor of Justinian, the Roman laws were only observed in such places, as continued subject to the emperor, that is, in the exarchate of Ravenna, in the dukedom of Rome, in the small dukedoms of Naples, Gaeta, and Amalfi, and in some maritime towns of Apulia, Calabria, and Lucania. The Lombards, to the reign of Rotharis, were governed only by their ancient customs. As for the natives of Italy subject to the Lombards, they were allowed to retain the Roman laws, but such only as were contained in the Theodosian code, which was in greater repute among the Lombards, than the Justinian code. The former therefore, and the compendium made by order of Alaric, were the only books that had any authority, either among the Lombards, or the Visigoths, at this time masters of Spain. In Rome the popes strove with all their power and might to maintain the authority of the Justinian laws, having much at heart the interest of the emperors, to whom they chose rather to live subject, than to the Lombards. Their zeal for the service of the emperors was, as the a of king Rotharis is not only memorable for the laws that prince enacted, but for the conquests he made; for, not thinking himself bound by the treaty, which his predecessor had concluded with the exarch, he broke all on a sudden into the Alpes Cottiae, and having, almost without opposition, made himself master of that province, he led his army against the cities of Opitergium, now Oderzo, and Treviſo, which he easily reduced, with all the cities in the province of Venetia, till that time held by the Romans. Iſuaccius, then exarch, alarmed at this sudden and unexpected invasion, drew together all his forces; but not having been able to assemble them in time to cover the above-mentioned places, he broke with great violence into the dominions of the Lombards, laying them waste with fire and sword. Rotharis was then busied in the siege of Perugia; which city he had no sooner reduced, than he marched with his whole army in quest of the exarch, whom he met on the confines of Æmilia, and offered him battle. The exarch accepted the challenge; so that an engagement ensued, in which the Romans were utterly defeated, eight thousand of them being killed on the spot, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight. From this time to the reign of Luitprand, no acts of hostility passed between the exarchs and the kings of the Lombards, the latter being satisfied with their new conquests, and the former glad to enjoy unmolested the territories that remained under the dominion of the emperors^m.

ABOUT this time Mauritius, who had been, by Heraclius, appointed duke or governor of Rome, taking advantage of the distracted state of the empire, occasioned by the usurpation of Heracleon, and the invasion of the Saracens, usurped the sovereignty of the city committed to his charge. But an end was soon put both to his life and usurpation; for the exarch Iſuaccius was no sooner informed of what had passed at Rome, than he dispatched against the usurper one of his officers, a person of great authority, with a considerable sum of money, and at the head of his best troops. This commander, marching up to the walls of the city, caused a declaration to be read, wherein Mauritius was declared a rebel, and not only a pardon promised, but a considerable gratuity, to all who should quit the traitor, and return to their duty. Upon this encouragement, Mauritius was abandoned by all his troops, and forced, as he had no other resource, to take sanctuary in a church; but he was dragged from thence, and, by an order from the exarch, beheaded, after he had been for some time kept in chains. Not long after, Iſuaccius died, and Theodorus Calliopa was sent by the emperor to succeed him in the exarchate. Theodorus governed Italy with great applause for the space of seven years, that is, from the year 643. to 650. when Olympius was appointed exarch in his room. Olympius gained several advantages over the Saracens in Sicily, and at last drove them out of that island; but died in the third year of his exarchate, being quite spent and worn out by the toils and fatigues he underwent in that expedition. Upon his death, the emperor Constantinus II. sent Theodorus Calliopa to govern Italy once more. In the second year of the exarchate of Olympius, that is, in 652. died king Rotharis, after he had governed the Lombards for the space of sixteen years with such prudence, equity, and moderation, that he was deservedly esteemed the most illustrious prince of his age. He himself professed the doctrine of Arius, but allowed his subjects full liberty to embrace which of the two religions they liked best; and therefore took care, that, in all the cities of his kingdom, there should be constantly two bishops, the one catholic, and the other Arian.

IN the fifth year of the reign of king Rotharis, that is, in 641. died Arechis the second duke of Benevento, after he had governed that dukedom for the space of fifty years, and so enlarged it at the expence of the Romans, that on one side it reached to Naples, and on the other to Sipontum in *Apulia*ⁿ. He was succeeded by his son Aio, whom he had taken for his partner in the government five months before his death^o.

learned Pietro Giannone, a most impartial writer, rightly observes, nothing at the bottom but self-interest. As the emperors lived at a great distance, they could not easily discover or defeat the design the popes had of making themselves, by degrees, masters of Rome; whereas, if the Lombards had once got possession of that city, they must have laid aside all thoughts of ever usurping the sovereign authority over the metropolis of Italy. Hence Rome was no sooner threatened by the Lombards, than the popes, pretending great zeal for the emperor's service, solicited succours with great earnestness, both from the emperor and the exarch. By this means they preserved Rome, not for the emperors, but for themselves, as we shall relate hereafter.

Aio was a man of very slender parts, and sometimes, as Paulus Diaconus insinuates, ^a distracted in his mind; which that writer ascribes to a potion given him by the Romans. The father therefore, sensible of the incapacity of his son, recommended him on his death-bed to Rodoald and Grimoald, the sons of Gisulf duke of Friuli, who, as we have related above, had fled to him, and were now in the flower of their age. These Arechis looked upon as his own children, and therefore appointed them by his last will to succeed in the dukedom, in case his son should die without issue male. While Aio governed the dukedom, the Sclavonians, passing by sea from Dalmatia, which they had seized, into Italy, landed at Sipontum, and laid waste great part of Apulia. They dwelt originally on the banks of the Borysthenes, now the Nieper, in European Sarmatia, and from thence advancing to the Danube, they passed that river ^b in the reign of Justinian, and made themselves masters of that part of Illyricum, which lies between the Drave and the Save, and is to this day from them called Sclavonia. Upon their landing in Apulia, they encamped in the neighbourhood of Sipontum, and surrounded their camp with deep ditches, which they covered with branches of trees, laying some earth and green turf over them. As Apulia was for the most part subject at that time to the duke of Benevento, Aio, hearing of their invasion, marched against them with what troops he could assemble, without waiting the return of Rodoald and Grimoald, who were then absent. But, having attacked their camp, he fell into one of the above-mentioned ditches, and was there slain by the enemy, after he had governed the dukedom five months with his father, and one year alone. Rodoald, hearing what had happened, assembled with incredible expedition a considerable body of forces, and, falling upon the enemy before they had the least intelligence of his march, he gave them a total overthrow, and drove them quite out of the dukedom. Having thus revenged the death of Aio, he took, together with his brother Grimoald, possession of the dukedom, pursuant to the last will of Arechis, who had appointed them to succeed himself and his son ^c. These two princes governed jointly for the space of five years, during which time they laid siege to Surrento, still held by the Romans; but the inhabitants, encouraged by Agapitus their bishop, made such a vigorous resistance, that the Lombards, after having attempted in vain to take the place by storm, raised the siege, and returned home. Rodoald died in Benevento, in the year 647. but his brother Grimoald held the dukedom sixteen years ^d after his death, and is said to have gained several victories over the Neapolitans and Romans, and to have greatly extended the bounds of his dukedom. After he had governed the dukedom five years with his brother, and sixteen alone, he possessed himself of the throne, and reigned nine years more over the whole nation of the Lombards, as we shall relate anon.

BUT to return to the Lombard kings: Rotbaris was succeeded by his son Rodoald, who, as he was a prince of a peaceable disposition, performed nothing which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity. He was tainted, as his father had been, with the Arian heresy, which occasioned some religious contests between him and the orthodox bishops; but these disturbances were soon appeased. ^e He had reigned four years with his father, but scarce reigned one after his father's death, being killed by a Lombard, whose wife he had debauched. He had married Gundeberg the daughter of Agilulf and Theudelinda; but, as he had no children by her, the Lombards, upon his death, assembled, in order to chuse a new king, when the choice fell on Aripert or Aribert, the son of Gundoald, and brother of Theudelinda. The only thing we find recorded of him in history, is his building in Pavia the oratory of St. Saviour. He died, after he had reigned, according to Paulus Diaconus, nine years, though Sigonius allows him but five at most. He left two sons behind him, Partharist and Gundebert, between whom he most imprudently divided his kingdom. Partharist, the eldest, chose Milan for the place of his residence, and Gundebert Pavia. But the latter, not satisfied with the part allotted him, began to quarrel with his brother; and, being pushed on by his ambition, and encouraged by the evil counsellors about him, he resolved in the end to drive his brother from the throne, and make himself master of the whole kingdom. He was well apprised, that he could not accomplish this with his own strength; and therefore he dispatched Garibald duke of Turin as his ambassador to Grimoald duke of Benevento, at that time by far the most powerful of all the Lombard dukes, inviting him to his assistance, and promising

- a to give him his sister in marriage, if he succeeded in the undertaking. But the duke of Turin, acting quite contrary to his instructions, instead of persuading Grimoald to assist his master, advised him to lay hold of the present opportunity, and to decide the controversy between the two brothers, by driving them both out, and seizing on the kingdom for himself. He told him, That the two brothers were young, rash, and unexperienced; that the affairs of the Lombards required a prince of prudence, valour, and experience; and that the disagreement between the two princes would, in all likelihood, end in the ruin of the whole nation. Grimoald, being naturally of an active and ambitious temper, was easily persuaded to follow the advice of the ambassador; and accordingly, having raised a considerable army, he marched at the head of it towards Pavia, leaving his son Romuald to govern the dukedom in his absence. Being advanced as far as Placentia, he dispatched Garibald to acquaint the king with his arrival. The inconsiderate prince received the news of his approach with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable; and, being at a loss where he should lodge and entertain his supposed friend and ally, Garibald told him, that his own palace was the only proper place for the reception of a person, to whom he had promised his sister in marriage. He added, that, if he did not repose an intire confidence in Grimoald, or had the least suspicion of treachery, he ought, for his greater safety, to receive him with armour under his royal robes. The king put on armour accordingly, and the duke, with unheard-of treachery, returning to Grimoald, advised him to be upon his guard, since the king was coming to meet him in armour, no doubt with a design to murder him. Grimoald could not persuade himself, that the king had any such design, till they met, when, upon their embracing each other, he found, that Gundebert was really in armour; and, not doubting in the least but that it was with a design to murder him, in order to be before-hand with him, he drew his sword that instant, and killed the unhappy prince on the spot. Upon his death, he seized on the royal palace, and the treasures lodged there, causing himself to be acknowledged king of the Lombards in his room. Gundebert left a son named Rambert or Reginbert, who was privately conveyed away, and brought up with great care by the friends of the deceased king, Grimoald making no great inquisition after him, as he was but an infant. Partbarit no sooner heard of his brother's fate, than, abandoning Milan in the utmost confusion, he fled to Chagan king of the Avars, and took refuge in his court. He left his queen Rodolind, and his son Cunibert, yet an infant, to shift for themselves; so that they both fell into the hands of Grimoald, by whom they were sent to Benevento, and kept under confinement in that city. The inhabitants of Milan, finding themselves abandoned by their king, opened their gates to Grimoald, who, having taken possession of that important place, marched from thence to Pavia, where, in the latter end of the year 662. he was with one voice proclaimed by the people king of the Lombards. To gain the affection of the Lombards, and by that means establish himself more firmly in his new kingdom, to the great joy of the whole nation, he married Gundebert, sister to the two unhappy young princes. He then sent back his army to Benevento, having first distributed considerable sums amongst them, but kept with him some of his most trusty friends, whom he raised to the first employments of the kingdom.

THE new king, though confirmed in the power he had usurped by the general consent of the nation, yet, reflecting on the fickleness and inconstancy of the multitude, did not think himself safe, so long as Partbarit, his competitor, resided at the court of the king of the Avars, at that time a powerful prince. He did not doubt but the banished king would watch all opportunities of attempting the recovery of his paternal kingdom, and would, in such an attempt, be seconded by great numbers of the Lombards. To prevent therefore the disturbances that would thence ensue, he dispatched ambassadors to Chagan, complaining of the protection he had given to his rival, and threatening to make war upon him, if he not did forthwith banish him his dominions. The king of the Avars, though greatly affected with the misfortunes of the unhappy prince, yet did not think it advisable to engage in a war for his sake; and therefore, to avoid it, commanded him to quit his dominions. Partbarit, seeing himself thus abandoned by his friend and ally, and not knowing where to find an asylum, resolved, in that desperate condition, to throw himself upon the honour and generosity of his greatest enemy. Accordingly, he dispatched one of his trusty friends, by name Unulf, to acquaint Grimoald with his resolution, and ^a obtain leave for him to reside at Pavia. Grimoald, highly pleased with the confidence the unfortunate prince reposed in him, and glad of such an opportunity to shew his generosity, complied with the request, and ordered a house to be got ready for him in Pavia every way fit for his reception. Upon his arrival, he received him with the greatest demonstrations of friendship and kindness; but observing, that the multitude attended his entry with unusual marks of joy, and that persons of distinction flocked to him night and day, and seemed, in a manner, to respect him still as their prince, he began to be apprehensive, lest they should attempt to restore him to the throne. This jealousy increased daily, and at length wrought upon him so far, that, after some time, he placed a guard upon him; and his fears, by degrees, getting ^b

the better of his generosity, he one day sent private orders to the guard to dispatch him the following night. These orders, however private, did not escape the vigilancy of his trusty friend Unulf, who, acquainting Partbarit with them, advised him to change cloaths with him, and, thus disguised, to attempt his escape. Partbarit followed his advice, and, having by that means deceived the centinels, he passed the Tesino undiscovered, and finding, on the other side the river, horses and guides provided for him by the care of Unulf, he escaped first to Hassa, thence to Turin, and at last into Gaul.

Grimoald, being informed the next morning of what had happened, was so far from punishing Unulf, that, on the contrary, he bestowed the highest commendations upon him for his unshaken fidelity, leaving it to his choice either to ^c stay at home, or follow his master. Clotaire III. then king of the Franks, was so touched with the misfortunes of Partbarit and his family, that the following year he sent a powerful army into Italy to replace him on the throne. Grimoald, well apprised that he was far inferior in strength to the Franks, had recourse to the following stratagem: at their approach he pretended to fly, leaving his camp well stored with all manner of provisions, especially with wine. Hereupon the inconsiderate Franks, instead of pursuing the enemy, began to plunder the camp; and, finding in it great plenty of provisions, they abandoned themselves to eating and drinking, which when they had done to excess, they betook themselves to rest, without the least apprehension of an enemy. But Grimoald, returning in the dead of the night, fell upon them ^d while they lay fast asleep, and made such a dreadful havock of them before they could betake themselves to their arms, that few of them were left alive to carry home the news of their defeat.

Grimoald, thus happily delivered from one war, was soon involved in another. Hitherto the emperors, neglecting the affairs of Italy, seemed to have laid aside all thoughts of reuniting it to the empire, being well satisfied if they could but keep the few provinces and cities they held there, viz. the exarchate of Ravenna, the dukedom of Rome, and those of Naples, Gaeta, and Amalfi, with some cities of Calabria and Brutium. But Constantine, the son of Constantine, and grandson of Heraclius, having settled the affairs of the empire rent into parties and factions, resolved to ^e employ his whole strength in driving the Lombards quite out of Italy. Pursuant to this resolution, he caused a powerful fleet to be fitted out in Sicily; and, not satisfied with appointing the best officers he had to command in this expedition, he left Constantinople, and, coming into Italy, put himself at the head of his army. Some writers tell us, that, having murdered his brother Theodore, he was so haunted with ghastly spectres, and terrible dreams, that, being no longer able to bear the sight of the place where the murder had been committed, he left Constantinople, and repaired to Italy, hoping to find there some relief for his tormented conscience. Others ascribe his departure from the imperial seat to the hatred, which the Constantinopolitans bore him, on account of his having embraced the tenets of the Monothelites; and ^f add, that he designed to transfer the seat of the empire from Constantinople to Rome. But the most credible writers, and among the rest Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and Paulus Diaconus, ^g suppose him to have undertaken his journey into Italy upon no other account, but to drive the Lombards quite out of that country. Be that as it will, he landed at Tarentum in the spring of the year 663, and thence marched directly to Benevento, being joined on his march by the troops in the dukedom of Naples. This unexpected invasion with a very considerable army, commanded by the emperor in person, struck the Lombards of Benevento with such terror and consternation, that
